The unanimous decision reversed a lower court ruling exculpating GM in a suit brought by the Justice Dept. to enjoin the practice. However, it did not rule on the government's claim that the company's dealership franchise contracts violate the anti-trust laws when used to prevent sales at discounts. Nor did it rule on the validity of unilateral action by GM to enforce such contracts.

The case goes back to 1960 when about a dozen franchised dealers sold cars to discount houses, which in turn sold them to the public at prices under those demanded by the dealers. Three dealers' associations protested to GM.

The firm quickly persuaded the offending dealers to agree not to sell to discount houses. Justice Abe Fortas, who wrote the opinion, observed that they were "treated to unprecedented individual confrontations" with the Chevrolet regional manager, Roy Cash. He recalled that one dealer testified Cash told him: "I can tell them to stop something. If they don't do it . . . I can knock their teeth down their throats."

"The protection of price competition from conspiratorial restraint is an object of special solicitude under the anti-trust laws," said Fortas' opinion. "We cannot respect that solicitude by closing our eyes to the effect upon price competition of the removal from the market, by a combination or conspiracy of a class of traders."

Sherman Act Cited

"Nor do we propose to construe the Sherman Act to prohibit conspiracies to fix prices at which competitors may sell, but to allow conspiracies or combinations to put competitors out of business entirely."

Because of the court's failure to rule on the validity of the dealer contracts or on unilateral enforcement action by GM, the decision is not expected to lead to an immediate boom in the discount selling of autos. In a separate concurring opinion, Justice John M. Harlan expressed the belief that GM "is not precluded" from enforcing the "location clause" by unilateral action, but the courts would have to decide before the way to large-scale discount operations would be clear.

Justice Dept. spokesmen said that in the past, discount sales of autos have been made only in sections where competition is at a minimum and where prices have become "inflated."

GM and other auto manufacturers withheld comment pending detailed study of the decision.

CSA Meeting To Focus on Family Needs

Community-based action to meet emergency human needs will be the subject of a four-day AFL-CIO conference in Washington, May 16 through 19.

The 11th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services will examine the unmet needs of families stricken by personal or natural disasters and map a program of education and action to meet them through the cooperation of local unions and their members with other community agencies.

Attending the conference at the International Inn will be 400 union representatives who participate in community service programs in their states and communities. Leaders in health, welfare, disaster aid and consumer problems have also been invited.

Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Service Activities, announced that conference topics will include debt counselling, money management, community disaster aid, unemployment relief and strike assistance. Special emphasis will be placed on how unions and union members can more effectively draw together all community help in finding emergency solutions to emergency problems, he said.

The conference will conclude with the annual Murray-Green award dinner May 19, at which Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Shriver will be honored with a joint award for their work in behalf of retarded children. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, will present the award.

O'Sullivan Workers Bring Unionism Back

Workers having agreed not to assert their interest in their former unit.

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher welcomed the O'Sullivan workers back into the labor movement and expressed his appreciation to the UAW and the URW.

The two affiliates, he said, "displayed the finest example of trade union statesmanship, fraternal cooperation, and commitment to the best interests of the workers."

Kircher stressed the claim the URW could have made because of its former status as the legal bargaining agent, its support of a lengthy and costly strike and a sustained boycott. In waiving its primary organizing rights, he said, the rubber union was "clearly motivated by a concern for the welfare of the workers which it placed above the union's legitimate claim."

The new UAW unit will draft contract proposals after the election result is certified by the NLRB, Staff Rep. Cecil Strickland said. Management has until May 9 to contest the conduct of the election.

The first O'Sullivan union struck May 13, 1956, when the company refused to discuss contract terms. Originally a directly-chartered federal local, it had become an affiliate of the URW. The latter union supported the strikers and waged a nationwide boycott against O'Sullivan as "America's No. 1 Heel."

The firm hired strikebreakers and the URW eventually was decertified. When the strikers continued to picket, the NLRB upheld charges against the union, holding that it was illegal for former O'Sullivan employes to picket after being replaced and after losing an election in which, as economic strikers, they were not allowed to vote because of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act at that time.

Court rulings upholding the board action later were reversed by the Supreme Court. The URW continued to picket until Sept. 4, 1961, but the plant stayed non-union until the recent UAW drive.

Court Ruling Upholds UAW In Card Check

Chicago—The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled there was nothing ambiguous about the wording on union cards authorizing the Auto Workers to seek their recognition by an employer as a National Labor Relations Board election.

In a 2-1 decision the court rejected the claim of the C. J. Glasgow Co., Dixon, Ill., that it was justified in refusing to bargain with the UAW in 1962 because the wording on the membership application cards had an unclear meaning, and therefore the cards could not be used as proof that the union represented a clear majority of the workers at Glasgow's shipping container plant.

When the UAW asked the firm to recognize it and bargain, it held signed authorization cards from 18 of 32 employes. Each card stated that the employe authorized the union to bargain and also, in wording at the bottom, that the card was "for use in support of the demand for recognition or for an NLRB election."

Richard J. Gray Dies; Headed Building Crafts

Richard J. Gray, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. from Jan. 1, 1947, until his retirement on Apr. 1, 1960, died in a Washington hospital following surgery for lung cancer. He was 79.

A union member since 1904, when he began his apprenticeship as a Bricklayer in Albany, N.Y., he held numerous local offices after attaining journeyman status until he was named a special deputy on the international union staff in the 1920s. He was elected international treasurer in 1928 and secretary in 1936, and was named a BCTD vice president in 1934.

He founded in 1955 the department's National Legislative Conference, which annually draws to Washington some 4,000 local and international union delegates from all parts of the country to advance the legislative program of the department and the AFL-CIO.

During World War II he was one of the principals on the labor side in establishing the Seabees.

The sorrow of the labor movement at his death was expressed to his widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Gray, by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler. In sending their condolences they said he "will long be remembered and honored by his many friends in the labor movement, in government and in every walk of life where he labored successfully to better the life of the worker and his family."

Johnson, Meany Hail Union Label Show

Baltimore—Harmony through labor-management cooperation was the keynote as the 21st AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show opened a six-day stay with a ribbon-cutting ceremony at the Fifth Regiment Armory and friendly salutes from Pres. Johnson, Federation Pres. George Meany, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

It was the show's first visit to this strongly organized city since the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. in 1958 began its annual exhibition of union-label processes and products.

Admission was free and the more than 130 exhibitors gave away tons of information and thousands of gifts and prizes.

Pres. Johnson's message, read by Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, noted the nation's unprecedented economic growth in the past six years and observed:

"Nowhere is this vitality better reflected. . . . Nowhere is the mutual cooperation of labor and management better represented than in this exhibition of quality goods and services."

Meany's message called the show "one of the year's highlights" for labor, since it "demonstrates beyond challenge that free workers and free management, operating in a free economy, can produce the best goods at the lowest prices for the greatest number of people."

Labor is proud of the show and the tribute it pays to labor-management cooperation and harmony, said Meany, adding: "We are equally proud of the union label and the union shop card, the hallmark of the American free democratic labor movement."

Henning praised the union label for representing the "dynamism, freedom and independence of trade unionism."

Schnitzler sounded the keynote: "The mutual respect you see here is reflected in the understanding which makes possible 50,000 union contracts successfully negotiated without a strike" in the U.S.

Visitors who saw the exhibits of AFL-CIO unions at the show could see the type of work done by members of those unions in the federation's own exhibit, set up as a theater. Shown frequently throughout the six-day show were a number of AFL-CIO films from the "Americans at Work" series and such others as "Land of Promise," "When Day's Work Is Done" and "In Common Brotherhood."

Back in the show for his 13th appearance was Val Hamer, 69, Baltimore glassblower who says only about two dozen of his fellow craftsmen are still on the job. A member of Glass Bottle Blowers Local 118, he drew crowds several times a day to his union's booth with its 2,700-degree furnace.

Ancient Press

The Printing Pressmen had a 94-year-old Washington flatbed press on which they printed maps, posters, and patriotic selections like the Declaration of Independence.

Heavily guarded was the exhibit of the Bureau of Printing & Engraving, which showed treasury bonds up to $500 million denomination and currency in bills from $10,000 down. Union men on duty included Plate Printer John J. Goggin, Engraver Robert Jones and Assistant Chief of Printing Kenneth DeHart, all members of Local 2, Intl. Plate Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers.

Among other exhibits were a union barber shop, sheep-shearing by the Meat Cutters, several members of the Bricklayers showing how to build a wall, new pumper brought by the Baltimore Fire Fighters local, and a showing of projectors by the Theatrical Stage Employes.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, who heads IATSE, presided over the opening luncheon as president of the Label Trades Dept.

Factory Hirings Show Sharp Jump

The strongest demand for workers since 1953 is indicated by factory labor turnover rates for March, according to the Labor Dept. Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Accession rates—new hires plus recalls of workers on layoff—rose to 51 from 48 per 1,000 workers in February, after seasonal adjustment and mostly as a result of new hiring, the report showed. The layoff rate continued to drop, slipping down to 1 per 1,000 workers from 1.1 in February. The quit rate jumped to 27 from 24 per 1,000 workers in February.

The accession rate was 20 percent higher than a year earlier, the BLS said, and the layoff rate was 25 percent lower.

Green Berets Bear Hat Workers Label

Framingham, Mass.—The green berets of song and story, so proudly worn by the Army's elite Special Forces, carry the union label.

They are turned out by members of Cap Makers Local 4, with headquarters in Boston, at the plant here of the Bancroft Cap Co., which has been making military headwear for 70 years. The firm is opening a new plant in Cabot, Ark., where the work is to be done by members of Cap Makers Local 130.

The berets are imported in rough form from the Basque section of France. Bancroft employes block them to proper sizes, insert linings and sew in the sweatband.

Pennsylvania Parley Ends on Unity Theme

Harrisburg—More than 2,000 delegates wound up the seventh constitutional convention of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO in a spirt of unity despite sharp rivalries during the four-day session.

Principal cause for division, the question of endorsing a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor in the Democratic primary election May 17, was bypassed by almost unanimous support of the recommendation of the executive council and officers to remain neutral.

Candidates are State Sen. Robert P. Casey, Scranton, endorsed by the State Democratic Committee, and Milton J. Shapp, Philadelphia manufacturer.

Answering arguments that the AFL-CIO should not take a hands-off position, Pres. Harry Boyer said he was "far more concerned with conserving the unity of this state labor organization."

Harmony prevailed also as ballots were counted for election of four top officers, 41 members of the executive council and six auditors.

Only officer facing opposition was Executive Vice Pres. Michael Johnson, Bryn Mawr, director of COPE, who defeated James Puglin, COPE director for the Allegheny County Labor Council, by a vote of 3,789 to 753.

Boyer, Sec. Harry Block and Treas. Earl C. Bohr were unopposed.

To Meet Modern Needs:

CLC Votes to Launch Two-Year Self-Study

By Gervase N. Love

Winnipeg, Man.—The Canadian Labor Congress has voted to take a two-year-long look at itself to make sure its structure and operation can meet the challenges of a modern world.

Delegates to the sixth constitutional convention, meeting here a decade after the CLC was founded, approved a resolution instructing the executive council to set up a committee "to examine the entire question of structure, mergers, affiliations and unity," and to make recommendations to the 1968 convention.

The proposal was advanced by Pres. Claude Jodoin in his keynote speech and in a half-dozen resolutions offered by labor bodies in different parts of the country. Both Jodoin and the resolutions reflected a belief that the present structure, while adequate when the CLC was established by merger of the Canadian Trades & Labor Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labor, might need updating to deal with the problems that now face a unified labor movement.

The critical self-examination is believed without precedent among the world's major trade union national centers. The British Trades Union Congress, in its famous "Resolution No. One," moved in the same general direction but restricted its study to mergers.

The CLC executive council was expected to name a top-level committee to conduct the examination, and to authorize it to call in outside experts in all pertinent fields.

Act on Injunctions

The convention Legislative Committee rejected a demand from the floor that it amend an anti-injunction resolution by adding a call for a campaign of civil disobedience. However, it returned a stronger version which was adopted after brief discussion—all favorable—and which instructed the officers and provincial federations and urged affiliated unions:

- "To engage in a strong and militant campaign to eliminate the use of the injunction in labor disputes.
- "To challenge injunctions wherever and whenever they are granted.
- "To organize systems of mutual aid for unions and members affected by the use of injunctions.
- "To promote legislative, political and other activities in opposition to the use of injunctions in labor disputes."

A broad statement recommended by the Committee on Intl. Affairs, offered as a substitute for 24 separate resolutions, was adopted after considerable debate.

It supported "unconditional discussions or negotiations" by all parties to bring about an immediate cease-fire; the eventual removal of all foreign troops from both North and South Viet Nam, and United Nations initiative in both the cease-fire and the subsequent peace-keeping machinery.

The delegates authorized the executive council to readmit the Seafarers Intl. Union if it is satisfied that the SIU meets constitutional requirements. The SIU was expelled in 1960 on charges of raiding the National Union of Marine Engineers and its Canadian segment was later put under trusteeship by the government. Two of the trustees, Charles H. Millard, former Canadian director of the Steelworkers, and Joseph MacKenzie, on leave from his post as CLC organization director, recommended reaffiliation.

CLC support of the New Democratic Party was renewed with a recommendation that strongly urged local unions not affiliated to align themselves with the party and work for the goals it shares with labor.

A companion resolution directed officers to initiate discussions with the AFL-CIO aimed toward persuading international unions to amend their constitutions, where necessary, to give their Canadian locals the right to participate in political action "to the point of affiliation."

Among other actions the convention:

- Approved plans for a joint study of automation by labor, management and government.
- Adopted a manpower training program calling for relocation subsidies, government-financed training for workers whose skills become obsolete, and grants for employes over 60 with 40 years' service whose jobs are wiped out by automation.
- Adopted an economic policy statement discounting the threat of inflation and urging tax cuts for low-income groups, higher hourly pay rates, broader social security programs and greater investment in "social capital."
- Urged Canada to join the Organization of American States.
- Heard Thomas C. Douglas, NDP leader in Parliament and a long-time CLC favorite, call for a redistribution of income to end poverty and predict further gains for the NDP.

Jodoin, Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald and Exec. Vice Presidents William Dodge and Joe Morris were re-elected without opposition. So were General Vice Presidents George Burt of the Auto Workers, William Mahoney of the USWA and William Ladyman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Arthur R. Gibbons of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen was elected to succeed Frank Hall of the Railway Clerks, who is retiring. Hall has been the rail clerks' Canadian vice president since 1925. The delegates also elected 13 regional vice presidents.

8 Railroads Ask Damages From BLFE

Eight railroads have asked the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to assess damages against the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen for a four-day walkout that started Mar. 31.

Also they asked that the union be fined $50,000 and its president, H. E. Gilbert, be forced to pay $5,000 for not ending the strike promptly enough.

Gilbert said at a state meeting of the BLFE in North Platte, Neb., that the suits amounted to a "vengeful and personal attack" by management on him and the union.

The damage suits were brought by the Pennsylvania Lines West, Boston & Maine, Seaboard Air Line, Central of Georgia, Illinois Central, Missouri Pacific, Grand Trunk Western and Union Pacific.

Meanwhile U.S. District Judge Alexander Holtzoff, who enjoined the BLFE from striking before May 11, heard arguments of labor and management on the right of firemen to strike without going through lengthy Labor Act procedures and prepared a decision.

Merger Attacks Seniority:

Guild 'White Paper' Charges Dailies Forced N. Y. Strike

New York—A "white paper" designed to set the record straight in the Newspaper Guild strike against the publishers of three merging dailies was issued by the Guild a day after Mayor John V. Lindsay had summoned union leaders to city hall to hear his proposal for ending the strike, which began Apr. 24.

The mayor proposed establishment of a three-member fact-finding panel to review the dispute and make recommendations for a settlement, but the unions later rejected the plan.

Bertram A. Powers, president of Typographical Local 6, and Thomas J. Murphy, executive vice president of the Guild, agreed that they preferred good-faith collective bargaining, assisted by a mediator.

Joseph Baer, president of the unaffiliated Newspaper & Mail Deliverers Union, said he had "flatly rejected fact-finding and demanded round-the-clock bargaining." Baer had previously made it clear his union will not accept what he describes as a return to working conditions prevailing 60 years ago.

Three Papers Publish

Meanwhile, U.S. District Judge Edward C. McLean ordered six of the craft unions, whose members have refused to cross the picket lines, to show cause by May 10 why they should not be forced to arbitrate their dispute with the publishers under the terms of contracts existing with the defunct papers, the World-Telegram & Sun, the Journal American and the Herald Tribune. The action which resulted in the order was brought by the new company, the World Journal Tribune Corp.

The main dailies still publishing are the New York Times, the Daily News and the New York Post.

With the printers, the main issue is severance pay. Powers has informed the publishers that if they wish to lay off 400 printers at one swoop they must provide something more than the three weeks' severance pay they are now guaranteed under existing contracts.

Guildsmen at both the World-Telegram and the Journal American, under their old contracts, received severance pay of up to 60 weeks at the rate of two weeks per year of service. At the Herald Tribune there was no ceiling on severance pay.

With the Guild, the principal issues have been seniority rights and the number of jobs to be lost.

The Guild's white paper, titled "How Three Publishers Forced the Merger Newspaper Strike," reviewed the events leading up to the announcement of the merger by the World Journal Tribune Corp. and the strike that prevented the merged publications from getting off the ground.

"The merger publishers," the report said, "proposed to cut their staffs in half, dismissing 900 employes in Newspaper Guild jurisdiction, 2,000 in all, including the craft union workers. [They] selected staffs for their WJT papers without regard to their seniority standing, long recognized and accepted in the papers' Newspaper Guild contracts."

Thus, the Guild charged, the publishers had deliberately forced a strike, and the nine craft unions had refused to cross the Guild's picket lines.

Secrecy Charged

The Guild recalled that its separate contracts with each of the three papers involved had expired Mar. 30, 1965. It accused the publishers of secretly negotiating with one another for merger of their properties, while apparently negotiating with the union for renewal of the contracts.

At first the publishers admitted only that they were holding discussions that might result in a merger, but in December 1965, when the Guild was nearing agreement on the terms of new contracts with the Herald Tribune and the World Telegram, the publishers admitted they were on the verge of completing their merger.

Still there was no real bargaining, the report said; and the publishers refused to give any information as to when and how they would carry out the merger, what staff personnel would be retained or how they proposed to select those to be retained.

Finally on Mar. 21, the Guild said, the publishers "lowered the boom."

During the next few weeks, although there were disputes with all ten unions, the papers made no serious attempt to come to an agreement with any of them, the Guild charged. Finally they announced that Apr. 25 would be the target date for publication of the merged dailies.

While the publishers were willing to follow seniority rules for the craft unions, they insisted on laying off Guild-represented employes in complete disregard of contract terms and conditions which had been in existence for 12 years or more, the 3,000-word Guild report charged.

Negotiations have continued since the Guild struck, but they have resulted in little progress, with Matt Meyer, president of the three-paper combine, taking an extremely tough line in his public statements. In an NBC television interview, he barked: "We are not going to be raped."

When Mayor Lindsay called the publishers and the union leaders to his office to hear his latest proposal, Theodore Kheel, a veteran mediator who has won the respect of both sides in previous disputes and who had been taking part in the talks between the printers and publishers, stepped out of the picture.

Among other unions involved in the merger dispute are the ITU Mailers, the Lithographers & Photoengravers, the Printing Pressmen and the Stereotypers & Electrotypers.

BALTIMORE TEACHERS carried a coffin around City Hall to protest budget cuts threatening a promised raise. They won a change in the time of a public hearing so teachers and parents could attend. Members of Teachers Local 430 voted to prepare for a strike if the city reneges on the raise.

Labor Urged to Mobilize For Off-Year Elections

Montreal, Que.—Organized labor in the United States refuses to sit out the 1966 congressional elections "and let the wrecking crews go to work on the tremendous legislative gains of recent years," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared in a speech to the 27th convention of the Firemen & Oilers.

"Facing us during the months ahead," he told nearly 300 delegates headed by Pres. William E. Fredenberger, "is the need to accumulate the funds and mobilize ourselves to do the job. Our goals are clear, and failure of labor to mobilize to these goals will cost our nation heavily in legislative progress."

He warned that "unless we are utterly and totally involved" in the campaign, there is a "genuine possibility" that "the forward progress of legislation will be halted" and, "even worse, there is fear that these gains will be eroded away and our accomplishments canceled out."

"We must now tell our members of the immensity of the issues before us and how much we have to protect and achieve," Schnitzler declared. "We must get our members and their families registered, and we must be sure that they get out and vote. History shows that nearly 15 percent fewer people vote in off-year elections and most of these are working people—our members.

"We have to work together to do this—small unions, large unions, big locals and small. We have to rewrite the history of off-year elections by working and electing not only the liberals of the 89th Congress, but new liberals as well."

51 In Danger

Schnitzler particularly cited the danger to 51 liberal representatives elected in 1964 and who "helped break a logjam" that had delayed legislation and made possible the enactment of medicare, aid to education, the war on poverty, social security improvements and other progressive laws.

Many, he said, were elected from marginal areas or from districts that had been represented by conservatives for generations.

"Their loss and their succession by the type of person they replaced," he declared, "would be a staggering blow to all America."

IAM Picks 11 For $4,000 Scholarships

The Machinists have awarded scholarships paying $1,000 a year for four years to one young member and to 10 children of members, Pres. P. L. Siemiller announced.

The member-winner is Klaus E. Nitz, 25, of Lodge 48, Chicago, who has been attending the University of Illinois while working as a lathe operator at the Parker-Hannifin Corp., Des Plaines. He was born in Germany, is a veteran of U.S. Army service, and plans to earn a degree in electrical engineering, then do graduate work in mathematics.

The 11 winners were chosen from among 1,165 applicants, or 106 for each scholarship, Siemiller noted. Privately-sponsored programs like the IAM's are not enough, he said, adding that the union will continue to work for cuts in tuition and other college costs "so as to make college available to all who can benefit from such education, regardless of financial ability."

The other winners were Vlasta K. Blaha, West Chicago, Ill.; Cheryl L. Cookson, Westbrook, Me.; Donna A. Davis, Cleveland, O.; Cameron Dawson, Vancouver, B.C.; Lorraine Gagnon, Hartford, Conn.; Marcia L. Hince, Lancaster, Pa.; Ramona Puenta, San Diego, Calif.; Michael D. Regenfuss, Superior, Wis.; Patricia A. Stultz, Hialeah, Fla., and Maurrica Wampler, Portland, Ore.

Sidney Hillman Awards Cite 3 Religious Leaders

New York—Three outstanding religious leaders who have demonstrated courage and humanity in their service to man were presented with Meritorious Public Service Awards of $500 each at the annual Sidney Hillman Foundation awards luncheon.

Honored as typical of the leadership given by the nation's clergy in the drive for a greater measure of equality and dignity for all men and a more enlightened approach to peace abroad were Rabbi Jacob J. Weinstein of Chicago, president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis; Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The award to Dr. King was accepted on his behalf by his aide, Rev. Andrew Young.

The foundation also presented $500 awards for outstanding contributions in the field of communications to Dr. Kenneth B. Clark for his book, "Dark Ghetto," which is rated as a social science classic, and to Theodore Draper for an examination of American policy in the Dominican Republic which was published in Commentary magazine.

Clark is professor of psychology at City College of the City University of New York. Draper is senior research fellow at the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution & Peace at Stanford University.

The Sidney Hillman Foundation honors the memory of the founding president of the Clothing Workers and seeks to perpetuate his philosophy, interests and concerns in the area of social and economic justice. It is headed by his successor as ACWA president, Jacob S. Potofsky.

Hawaii AFL-CIO Names Secretary-Treasurer

Honolulu—Gordon H. Beach is the first executive secretary-treasurer of the new Hawaii AFL-CIO by appointment of the executive board. The post had been unfilled since the founding convention last January, Pres. Carl J. Guntert said.

GE Aides Bolt Meeting Over IUE Committee

New York—Representatives of the General Electric Co. walked out of a meeting with the negotiating committee of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at the company's headquarters here because the committee included representatives of other AFL-CIO unions the company bargains with.

The meeting had been arranged to explore the setting of ground rules for subcommittee meetings before actual negotiations start about Aug. 1.

Chairman John H. Callahan of the IUE-GE committee said he was "shocked" at management's refusal to meet with the committee "or even to permit us to make a statement." he added:

"The company knows the law: that it is obligated to deal with the representatives chosen by the union . . . and cannot pick and choose which of our representatives it will meet with."

Present with the IUE committee were Rod Bower of the Technical Engineers, Vice Pres. Gil Brunner of the Machinists, Dominic D'Ambrosio of the Allied Industrial Workers, James Hussey of the Sheet Metal Workers, Richard Mills of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and James Ogden of the Auto Workers.

The unions had earlier agreed to coordinate their bargaining goals this year at GE and Westinghouse, the other major electrical goods manufacturer. But the two firms declined joint bargaining and IUE agreed not to press the question.

"However," Callahan said, "we have not abandoned our right to choose our own bargaining representatives." He and his committee released copies of IUE's proposed "ground rules" and agreed to remain available pending further developments.

The Pressure from Profits

THE FIRST THREE MONTHS of 1966 have provided hard evidence that the threat to the nation's economic health is not runaway inflation but runaway profits.

Business and financial publications and the major newspapers have documented the steady and continuing increase in profits through the first quarter of the year. The Administration, in the person of Gardner Ackley, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, has acknowledged the threat to economic stability and growth of the fantastic rise in profits.

Ackley, in a speech to the annual meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, pointed out that in the last quarter of 1965 profits after taxes were up 88 percent over their level in early 1961 and were providing "the highest sustained rate of return on owners' equity in our modern history."

It is time to ask, he continued, "whether a further rise in the share of profits in the national income is in the interest either of the health of the nation's economy or in the interest of business itself."

Basic to Ackley's warning was the Wall Street Journal's report that in the first quarter of 1966 profits were up 12 percent over the same period in 1965. The CEA chairman noted that "this substantially exceeds the rise in employe compensation over that period."

The Administration's top economist told the businessmen that so far in 1966 "there has been no serious upward cost push from the side of wages. And we expect no dangerous general wage push during the remainder of 1966."

As to the why of the high rate of profits, Ackley commented: "Either prices have been raised more than costs, or prices have not been reduced where costs have fallen."

HERE, IN ONE SENTENCE, is the essence of the recent increases in price levels, the increases that have touched off the noisy warnings about inflation and the demands to put the brakes on the economy by imposing a general tax increase or curtailing government expenditures for Great Society programs.

The skyrocketing rate of profits is the key also to the one sector of the economy where some inflationary pressures are being felt—the high rate of spending for new plant and equipment. The corporations are in excellent position to use amassed profits, stepped-up depreciation allowances and tax credits for new investment to pour billions into new capital goods that not only put an excessive strain on the economy but pose the future problem of over-expanded capacity.

The Administration's warning to the business community that profits are getting too high for the health of the economy indicates a need for follow-up action.

The AFL-CIO several months ago warned that the capital goods boom and runaway profits threaten the economy and proposed a combination of measures including an excess profits tax, an increase in corporate tax rates and/or ending the 7 percent investment tax credit.

The first three months of the year have produced the evidence that such action is needed if the nation is to avoid a major economic setback.

'Sorry About That'

LBJ's Civil Rights Message:

Congress Urged to Fight Bias 'That Still Afflicts Our Land'

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's message to Congress calling for new civil rights legislation.

LAST YEAR I came before the Congress in an hour of crisis to recommend new and powerful guarantees of the right to vote.

Americans faced again the ancient questions:

Who shall take part in the process of democracy?

Shall it be only those born with white skins?

If a man's color should not be the sole criterion for determining his right to vote, how shall we make sure that Negroes are not denied the ballot?

I asked the Congress, on that March night in 1965, to strike down all restrictions to voting in all elections—federal, state and local—which have been used to deny Negroes the right to vote.

Less than five months after I spoke, the Congress perfected and passed our Voting Rights Act of 1965.

I said then that the challenge of voting discrimination had been nothing less than a test of our faith in democracy. Congress met that test. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 reaffirmed the equality of man and government by all the people.

Discrimination in places of public accommodation—perhaps the most unbearable insult to Negro citizens—has been made unlawful. The mandate of that law has spread faster and more effectively than its supporters believed possible.

Discrimination in employment is now illegal. Opportunities closed to Negroes in the past have begun to open.

The discriminatory use of federal funds has been prohibited. The effect of that prohibition—strengthened by new federal procedures—is now being felt in schools, hospitals, welfare programs and in other areas once blighted by racial bias.

The Community Relations Service has helped to bring new understanding to areas where community tensions have threatened to disrupt peaceful progress. Now that the service has been integrated with other civil rights facilities in the Dept. of Justice and is being enlarged, we expect it to be even more effective.

In the five states where voter discrimination was once most severe, Negro registration has increased by 50 percent.

At the time of the 1964 national election, less than 25 percent of the Negro citizens of voting age in those five states were registered to vote. We expect that by the time of the next elections in these states the figure will reach 50 percent.

This achievement serves to renew our faith in the ultimate triumph of a government in which all free men can participate. It strengthens our resolve to extend the franchise to all.

For a democracy cannot be fully realized, when in these five states more than a million eligible Negroes remain unregistered. The challenge to them—and to those in government and private life who labor with them for their just share in the electoral process—is as critically important as the legislative need to enact today's civil rights laws. The statutes now on the books have given Negro Americans the key to freedom. Now it must be used.

ONCE MORE this year I am asking the Congress to join in an attack on the discrimination that still afflicts our land.

Four times in nine years the representatives of the people have labored through days and nights—through weeks and months—toward the passage of civil rights legislation.

I was part of each of those efforts. I know the fatigue and the triumph that accompanied them. Thus I do not ask for new laws lightly.

Yet discrimination, racial practices still exist in many American communities. They deny the Negro his rights as a citizen. They must be ended.

I ask the Congress:

First, to reform our federal criminal statutes to provide Negroes and all who labor or speak for racial justice the protection of stronger and more effective criminal laws against interference with the exercise of long established rights.

Second, to establish detailed procedures of jury selection in federal courts so that discrimination may be banished—and to create forceful guarantees that state court juries also will be selected without discrimination of any kind.

Third, to broaden the attorney general's authority to bring suit for the desegregation of schools and public facilities—enabling him to commit the government's legal resources where they are most critically needed.

Fourth, to declare a national policy against racial discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, and to create effective remedies against discrimination in every part of America.

Morgan Says:

Duvalier's Haiti Could Cause Next Explosion in Caribbean

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

THE SO-CALLED Republic of Haiti, which occupies the smaller and western half of the island of Hispanola in the Caribbean, is an exotically beautiful and obscenely impoverished dictatorship. One of the most ghastly slums in the hemisphere lies on the very edge of Haiti's seaport and capital, the unhappy, down-at-the-heel city of Port-au-Prince, whose streets are full of potholes.

Morgan

But despite the crying need for public works, public health, welfare, education and almost everything else in the book of modernization, and despite the fact that many government salaries are recurrently in arrears, Haiti played host to Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia at a reported cost of $300,000 for his 12-hour visit. According to one unconfirmed but responsible estimate, the bill for red carpet alone came to $13,000.

The proud Lion of Judah was said to have been reluctant to include Haiti in his Caribbean tour but finally consented since he was in the area. Some natives of Jamaica worship the emperor as a god and had to be restrained by police when he landed there. Some fellow-believers live in black Haiti, and it is possible that Pres. Francois Duvalier reasoned Haile Selassie's presence would take their minds off their own misery, if only montentarily.

The fact is that Duvalier's dictatorship is beginning to challenge the ruthlessness of Generalissimo Trujillo, the tyrant of the neighboring Dominican Republic, who was assassinated just five years ago. The Dominicans' current troubles stem in large measure from the fact that they had been repressed so long they weren't capable of governing themselves once Trujillo was toppled.

As dispatches continue to indicate, the impending Dominican elections may or may not be an augury of stability for the future. But whether or not they are successfully held, the next explosion in the Caribbean could well be in Haiti instead. Indeed, reports of an impending coup against Duvalier caused an American naval force to scurry to a rendezvous in the Windward Passage between Haiti and Cuba very recently.

That particular alarm appears to have passed but Papa Doc, as Duvalier is called, though no longer affectionately, has a paranoid fear of destruction. The army is his own personal instrument, the brutal core of which is an organization of thugs—about 5,000 strong—known as Ton Ton Macoute, or Bogeymen. They wear blue denim uniforms and a curious kind of blue hat, the shape of which is vaguely reminiscent of Napoleonic Europe. They are the terror of the nation.

With such classic ingredients for revolution so readily apparent, it would be natural to assume that Castro had been flooding the country with agents of the Fidelista brand of Communism. Despite the proximity of Cuba, less than 100 miles across the Windward Passage, this does not seem to be a dominant threat, The Ton Ton Macoute have been, apparently, rather efficient against this outside subversion.

The main threat to Duvalier is a hatred among Haitians, including businessmen and others who have no Communist inclinations but who have had enough of Papa Doc. The tourist trade is down to a trickle and other business languishes though Duvalier himself is supposed to have a fortune stashed away in Switzerland.

IRONICALLY, Duvalier began as a popular figure. He headed a United Nations-sponsored project 20 years ago to rid Haiti of yaws, a contagious disease of the skin. Thanks to an industrious and competent international staff and American dollars, it was a success. Duvalier, who had got a medical degree at the University of Michigan, found himself something of a hero and in 1957 became president in reasonably respectable elections. But his governing hand became increasingly heavy over 5 million French and Creole-speaking Haitians. In 1964 he was declared "president for life."

That tenure is a matter of conjecture. He was 59 on Apr. 14 but is reportedly ailing. It is impossible to estimate how many persons have been imprisoned or murdered for allegedly plotting against him.

Washington's nightmare is not only the present but the future of the country. Duvalier is supposed to visit Argentina in the summer and some say he may choose the moment to "retire" and not come home. But he recently told a friend he had no intention of retiring.

But after Duvalier what? Like the Dominicans after Trujillo, only more so, the Haitians are not prepared to run their own government.

The U.S. has cut off aid to Duvalier's regime except for some food shipments and a small antimalarial project. But quietly some preliminary study has been done on the possibility of a modest, open program to train Haitians for government service. It could be too little and too late.

Prospects Bright for Passage Of Minimum Wage Expansion

THE ADMINISTRATION'S bill to boost the federal minimum wage and expand coverage will be enacted by Congress this year, organized labor's top legislative spokesman predicts.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said he expects House passage of the bill "early this month" and "very little trouble in the Senate." His statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

The measure would raise the present $1.25 an hour minimum wage to $1.60 in two steps and extend coverage to about 7 million additional workers.

Biemiller hailed inclusion of farm workers in the bill as "a very important breakthrough," declaring that "there is no more exploited group of people in the United States than those who work on the large farms of this country."

He said the bill would extend Fair Labor Standards Act protections to about half of the farm workers in the country but would apply to "only about 1.5 percent of the farms." He pointed out that the family farmer "who might employ, outside of his family, one or two people," would not be covered.

BIEMILLER rejected the charge that raising the national minimum hourly wage to an eventual $1.60 would be inflationary.

"Our economists say that the effect would be less than 1 percent of the total wage bill in the United States," he said.

He also rejected the contention that some industries can't afford to pay the higher minimum wage, pointing out that the same argument had been raised by opponents every time there has been minimum wage legislation but had never once been sustained by government surveys.

Reporters questioning Biemiller on the AFL-CIO public service production, aired weekly over the Mutual radio network, were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News Washington bureau and Hobart Rowen, business and financial editor of the Washington Post.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SUPREME COURT in reviewing a reapportionment plan covering the state legislature of Hawaii knocked out substantial portions of a directive handed down by a special three-judge federal district court and applied what might be called a rule of reason for the guidance of such courts in the future.

Legislative apportionment has been a bone in the craw since Hawaii entered the Union.

The islands, as a bastion of U.S. military strength in the Pacific, shelter large numbers of service personnel. There are large numbers of tourists. Hawaii has handled this problem by treating registered voters, rather than total population, as a correct basis for legislative apportionment.

The lower house of the legislature was reapportioned by the governor, as required by the state constitution. The state senate was set up with various multi-member districts. The federal district court approved the apportionment of the lower house and the use of registered voters, rather than total population, as the base. But in 1965 it disapproved the multi-member senatorial districts and specifically ordered the legislature to set the wheels in motion for a constitutional convention to settle apportionment matters.

The Supreme Court, in a decision written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., reversed most of this.

What the federal courts are supposed to deal with, he said, is the single issue deriving from the Reynolds vs. Sims precedent of whether legislative apportionment taken as a whole violates the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment.

It knocked out the district court order in effect prohibiting state legislative elections under existing apportionment plans. The elections are "imminent," Brennan noted, and "election machinery must be put in operation."

The high court reversed the district court's order outlawing multi-member senatorial districts. There was no evidence in the lower court's record that multi-member districts created, either by accident or design, an "invidious discrimination" violating the equal protection clause, Brennan noted.

The Supreme Court also reversed the district court's order that permanent reapportionment must be left exclusively to a constitutional convention.

Hawaii will in fact vote in November on summoning a constitutional convention. But a new legislature also will be elected and "we see no reason" why this legislature "should either be compelled to propose amendments [to such a convention] or precluded from proposing them."

Reynolds vs. Sims, Brennan observed, included a declaration that "legislative reapportionment is primarily a matter for legislative consideration and determination," and Hawaii's legislature should not be debarred from that part of its functions.

The Supreme Court sent the case back to the district court with instructions to take another look when a new districting plan may be submitted for a constitutional test.

IN ANOTHER reapportionment case involving Maryland, the legislature proved itself totally incapable of drawing new congressional districts of approximately equal population. It failed in a regular session and failed again in a special session.

A stumbling-block was the drafting of a plan that would, in effect, help all incumbent members of the House retain their seats yet would still adequately meet the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" requirement for equal protection of the laws.

So a special three-judge federal court drew up a congressional districting plan of its own and imposed it by court order, effective immediately. Population of the newly-designed districts is approximately equal. The Supreme Court, of course, can be asked to review the district court's order.

PASSAGE this year of a bill increasing the federal minimum wage to $1.60 an hour in two steps and expanding coverage to 7 million more workers was the prediction of AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller (center) as he was questioned by William Eaton (left) of the Chicago Daily News and Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO public affairs program.

How to Buy:

Federal Mortgage Rate Hikes Deal Blow to Working Families

By Sidney Margolius

THE SECOND rate increase in FHA and VA mortgages in three months is a further blow to working families hoping to buy homes.

In two steps (one-fourth of 1 percent at a time), the FHA and VA rates have been boosted to 5¾ percent. With the additional "insurance" fee of one-half of 1 percent, to guarantee the lender against loss, the full FHA rate now is 6¼ percent. The latest increase brings the rate back to the level it had reached under the Eisenhower Administration in 1959-60, which was the highest in history.

The FHA's explanation is that mortgage lenders have been refusing to put out money for FHA mortgages at the old rates. In other words, the lenders went on a strike for more interest. They won quickly and easily. The government housing officials folded up without trying any of the other possibilities for holding down rates.

The immediate effect of the rate hikes is to price another segment of American families out of the housing market and to force those still able to buy to pay an additional $5 a month in interest on a typical $16,000 FHA mortgage, or a total of $1,800 in additional interest over the typical 30-year mortgage term.

A 6¼ percent charge for a mortgage raises the total interest cost to a startling level. To pay back a $16,000 mortgage over 30 years costs $100.07 a month, or a total of $36,000. You pay $20,000 just in interest. And if you try to make the monthly payments a little less burdensome by stretching out the repayment period to 35 years, you'll pay back $40,000—a total of $24,000 in interest fees on a $16,000 mortgage.

The continuing rise in the prices of houses themselves further pyramids the cost and is causing a real housing crisis for many moderate-income families. The typical FHA house last year carried a price tag of over $18,000. With the jump in construction costs this year of approximately 5 percent, this house now costs close to $19,000.

In comparison, the average industrial wage of about $111 a week provides an annual income of just $5,800. If you use the normal yardstick, that a family usually can afford a house costing about 2½ times its annual income, this means the average working family can afford a house costing about $14,500.

Obviously, the Administration has accomplished little by trying to wet the saliva of mortgage lenders with higher interest when the average person, whom the FHA was supposed to help, can't afford the average house.

Actually in some parts of the country you can do better today with a conventional non-FHA mortgage, although you may have to put up a larger down payment. On existing homes in good neighborhoods, the current rate is about 6 percent in a little over half the nation, 6¼ in about 15 percent of the country, and 5¾ in about 10 percent, the National Association of Real Estate Boards reports.

AMONG OTHER alternatives to raising the rate, FHA could have considered reducing the insurance premium of one-half of 1 percent, at least for the time being. It already has accumulated an insurance backlog of well over a billion dollars. VA also could use more liberally its power to make direct loans to veterans when loans are not available locally from the usual lenders.

Nor is there much relief available if you want to rent a place to live instead of buying. Most of the new high-rise buildings are designed for occupancy by higher-income families, real estate dealers report. Very few cater to families with young children. These are often compelled either to buy a house or rent one of the larger old houses in a deteriorating neighborhood.

What can the average family do to protect itself?

- If you do have to undertake a mortgage now, make sure you get a reasonable right to prepay with little or no penalty (an extra fee), if and when rates subsequently come down or you accumulate some extra cash. Some lenders permit prepayment after one year with no penalty charge.
- Cut down on other installment buying to save those big finance charges (usually two or three times the mortgage rate percentage), and to help free credit. The pathetic fact about the Federal Reserve Board's tight money policy, which has forced up interest rates all around, is that it has not restrained installment buying significantly. It simply has forced installment buyers to pay higher finance charges.

Backs Labor Criticism:

Press Weekly Hits 'Canned' Editorials

THE WEEKLY trade magazine of the daily press, Editor & Publisher, startled its readers last week by wholeheartedly supporting a sharp criticism of the press by the AFL-CIO.

E&P normally devotes much of its editorial space to ringing denunciation of the printing trades unions and the Newspaper Guild. But in this instance it applied equal force in support of an attack on canned editorials, written by Ray Denison of the AFL-CIO public relations staff and published in the March issue of The American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

Denison's article dealt specifically with the flood of canned material opposing repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. This material, both editorials and "news," was written in Washington by "right-to-work" lobbyists and distributed through "editorial service" agencies. The agencies collect from their clients, and distribute what looks like regular newspaper material to the press, free of charge.

These stories and editorials, Denison reported, turned up in identical form in weekly and small daily newspapers from coast to coast—all presented as though they were the product of the local editor and his staff.

Robert U. Brown, publisher and editor of E&P, opened his regular column, "Shop Talk at Thirty," with a seven-paragraph quote from Denison's article. He then added a two-column blast of his own.

"Moral and ethical restraints" should rule out the anonymous use of canned material, Brown wrote, even if the editor agrees with it.

"THIS ISN'T FAIR to the reader who credits the editor with undeserved authorship and erudition," he went on. "It doesn't take into account, either, the persuasiveness of the original author . . . And it doesn't credit the design or motives of the authors and distributors who do so for a price."

Brown noted that Rep. Frank Thompson Jr. (D-N.J.), who inserted Denison's piece in the Congressional Record, had suggested the possibility of a law requiring that canned material be labelled as such. The E&P editor said such a law would probably be unconstitutional but it would work, because editors would be ashamed to admit outside authorship.

"One other way . . . is for every state publishers' and press association to take a public stand on the issue," he proposed. "A grass roots condemnation of the practice would have a lot of influence on editors, even the smallest ones who may not belong to the association.

"What we need are editors who have the guts to admit on their editorial pages either that 'I have nothing to say on this subject today,' or 'I haven't had time to write anything for this space this week,' and leave it blank.

"Or, if they fill the space with material from other sources, that they label it properly as to its source for the edification of their readers."

Tuna Fish or Beouf en Daube? It's a Matter of Literary Taste

By Jane Goodsell

IT'S NOT OFTEN that Vogue does anything to upgrade my morale. On the contrary, a ten-minute stroll through its glossy pages and hyperbolic prose usually sends me into a fit of depression. It's not only that Vogue makes me feel underprivileged (I don't even possess a pair of mink eyelashes, much less a little six-hundred-dollar Galanos frock) and too well-rounded to be chic, but nobody I know ever mentions any of the things that Vogue says People Are Talking About.

Worse yet, I feel terribly left-out when I read about Anne Ford's opped-up party, to which I wasn't invited. In short, what's happening to The Beautiful People isn't happening to me.

Nonetheless, after my last encounter with Vogue, I walked away from the hairdresser's with a new spring in my step. I'd discovered that I share an idiosyncracy with, of all people, Cecil Beaton.

Mr. Beaton says that he gets most of his fancies about food from literature. "If I had been reading Proust," he says, "and someone had pineapple and truffle salad, then very likely I would try to organize that for the same night." He went on to reminisce of the time he read a Colette story about an old cocotte who ate a tuna fish omelet and he thought it sounded so good that he asked his cook to make tuna fish omelet.

Well, I nearly fell off my chair when I read that because I do exactly the same thing myself. Whenever a character in a book sits down to a meal, my mouth starts watering. Whatever he's eating, I want some, too.

OF COURSE it isn't always feasible to share every literary meal in exact detail, and sometimes I have to settle for reasonable facsimiles.

I learned to make beouf en daube when I read The Wapshot Scandal, because it sounded so good I simply had to have some. But meals in books needn't be enticing to make my mouth water. When I read The Spy Who Came in from the Cold, I duplicated Leamas' meal of black bread, sausage and salad.

Now that this aberration of mine has acquired elan by association with Vogue and Cecil Beaton, I've faced up to it and stopped feeling ashamed. The other day, when I bought Dr. Zhivago in paperback, I stopped at the grocery store on the way home to pick up some beets. It seemed rather likely that I'd be hankering for borscht next week.

Water Crisis Foreseen:

Aid Step-Up Urged To Fight Pollution

Strong support for the broader of two water pollution bills before Congress was voiced by the AFL-CIO with the proposal that it be broadened still further.

An AFL-CIO spokesman told a Senate Public Works subcommittee that its own bill was far preferable to the Administration bill, though some features of the latter should be included. In addition, he said, federal participation in the matching-grants construction program should be increased by at least one-third.

The labor movement's views were presented by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty. Both the bills being considered were introduced by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.). The subcommittee bill also has 47 co-sponsors, both Democrats and Republicans.

Doherty noted that at some time late in the next decade the national demand for water would exceed 600 billion gallons a day, against a present available supply of 500 billion gallons. Yet there is plenty of water potentially available, he said, if adequate storage facilities were provided and pollution were abated.

"Therefore, if this nation is to have enough water to go around, the first order of business is to clean up what we have while we are planning and building to improve the use of water on the land and control our surface and underground water resources," he added.

The AFL-CIO testimony called special attention to the continuing drought in the Northeast, the longest and most severe in the area's history, which—if it continues—could cause a "most serious" problem this year, even though there are vast quantities of unused water in large river systems such as the Hudson and Connecticut. The water is unused because it is so foully polluted that it could not even be used for flushing streets without first being heavily treated with chemicals, Doherty charged.

While praising the 1965 Water Quality Act's "great significance for the future," he insisted that none of the water legislation passed to date has been adequate to keep pace with the problem, much less overcome it.

Similarly, in "most strongly" endorsing the subcommittee bill, "we just as strongly suggest that the subcommittee consider whether it has sufficiently liberalized the proportion of federal matching called for in this bill," he said.

Higher Rate Asked

"We believe that the subcommittee should increase federal matching from a basic 20 percent to at least 40 percent of the capital cost of the proposed treatment project, with an additional 10 percent in the event of state financial participation."

Doherty said the Administration bill provides too little money too slowly. The construction of facilities that are needed right now should not be put off until a comprehensive plan covering a whole river basin is developed and the necessary administrative machinery established, he maintained, even though the basin approach is proper on a long-term basis.

The AFL-CIO fully supports the enforcement authority under the Water Pollution Act which was proposed by Pres. Johnson and is included in the Administration bill, Doherty said. The proposals constitute "badly-needed enforcement teeth in a basically toothless" act, he noted. But he rejected the plan to levy effluent charges as "a low-cost license for industry to pollute."

Automation Foundation Opens Seminar Series

Chicago—The report of the National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress is "too good to get lost," Machinists' Pres. P. L. Siemiller declared at the first of a series of seminars on the Commission's report.

Siemiller said The American Foundation on Automation & Employment is sponsoring the seminars to direct attention to the report, its findings and recommendations.

"We do not want the report to gather dust in the archives while the employment picture is improving," he said, "only to have it rediscovered in later years when solutions to job problems are needed."

He and Vice Pres. Frank L. Gallucci of the Essex Wire Corp., Fort Wayne, Ind. are co-chairmen of the foundation, which was set up under joint labor-management auspices.

In announcing the meeting here, Siemiller and Gallucci said that while they did not necessarily agree with all the findings and recommendations of the automation commission, the report nevertheless "deserves widespread and serious consideration."

A. H. Raskin, assistant editor of the editorial page of the New York Times, served as chairman. Speakers included Howard R. Bowen, president of the University of Iowa, who was chairman of the national commission; Garth L. Mangum, commission executive secretary; and Theodore W. Kheel, arbitrator, the foundation's executive director.

"No one thinks of automation as an evil, or that you can stop it," Kheel said. "Automation and technological change do have a great effect on unskilled workers. The commission report says the effect is not great; I disagree."

Bowen reviewed the commission's findings:

- The pace of technological change is accelerating, but we have not entered a new era of drastic change.
- Lack of demand and fiscal policy are the major causes of post-Korean War unemployment.
- Lack of certain skills, rather than a lack of education, has been major cause of unemployment.
- There will be enough work in the future to provide jobs for all.
- An aggressive fiscal policy to assure a growth rate of at least 4 percent a year.
- Special education and training for the people at the lower end of the job line and jobs created to meet their needs.
- An income floor—the negative income tax concept—for those families at the end of the employment line.
- Assistance to workers in adjusting to automation and technological change.
- A federalized public employment service.

BSEIU Beats 'Independent' Run by Doria

Los Angeles—Building Service Employes Local 399 won representation rights at the fast-growing Sunset House Distributing Corp., which formerly had a contract with an "independent" headed by Tony Doria, who was ousted by the Allied Industrial Workers on charges of corruption.

The National Labor Relations Board election, held nearly four months after a petition was filed, produced a tally of 127 votes for Local 399, five votes for the incumbent, four for Local 986 of the expelled Teamsters, and 95 for "no union."

The winning union was aided in the last few days of its drive by a plant-gate show of solidarity with other AFL-CIO affiliates organized by the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange County Organizing Committee.

The ousted "independent" had held a contract for three years, the BSEIU reported, but it said the starting wage for many employes was still only $1.25 an hour, and many longer-term employes had received no wage increases in the two years prior to the start of Local 399's campaign. The firm, meantime, had grown from a small store-front mail order business to an operation with 450 employes in 11 Southern California locations.

Local 399 filed for the election early in January. The delay was attributed to the confusion created by the two unaffiliated unions and by a management "no union" campaign.

Morgan Labels Bias 'Handicap' to Nation

State and national winners of the annual high school essay contest on employment of the physically handicapped heard Edward P. Morgan, network radio and television newsman, declare that the United States must step up the fight against the "sickness and disability of racial prejudice."

"Too many schools, too many living rooms and too many jobs are denied Negroes, simply because of the chemical phenomenon known as pigmentation of the skin," Morgan told the 53 students and their guests who had been brought to Washington by AFL-CIO state and local central bodies. He spoke at an AFL-CIO-sponsored luncheon during the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

"Sometimes, what is morally right," Morgan observed, "only follows economic pressure." He noted that Sec. of Commerce John T. Connor estimates racial prejudice now costs the nation some $23 billion annually in unrealized gross national product.

This "staggering waste of human talent and ability" nearly doubles the total national budget of 1941, pointed out Morgan, whose radio comment is sponsored by the AFL-CIO.

National Problem

Racial prejudice is not a North-South problem, but one that affects every section of the nation, he said, and it will take a national effort to overcome it. The U.S. has overcome all sorts of handicaps throughout its history and it has the ability to overcome this one as well, he declared.

Pres. Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, senior vice chairman of the President's Committee, was chairman of the luncheon. Guests included Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson and former film star Harold Russell, chairman of the President's Committee.

In behalf of the AFL-CIO, Freeman presented each of the state and territorial winners of the annual "Ability Counts" essay contest with a personalized leather-bound copy of Founders of Freedom—Signers of the Constitution.

The top national award of $1,000 went to Ann Dautrich of Salt Lake City, Utah, second prize of $600 to Ingrid Marie Peterson of Boise, Ida., third prize of $400 to Elizabeth A. McLane of Hyannis, Mass., and fourth prize of $300 to Robert L. Downey of Preston, Ia. The fifth place prize of $200 was shared by Barbara Jean Chance, Frankfort, Kan., and Curtis B. Eaton, Newport, R.I.

Steel Union, Kaiser Widen Sharing Plan

Fontana, Calif—The Steelworkers and the Kaiser Steel Corp. have extended the principle of their cost-sharing plan to 350 union employes at Kaiser's structural steel fabricating plant here.

Under the new plan, said by union and management to be the first in the metal fabrication industry, workers got a bonus for February operations averaging 4.8 cents an hour, and for March 11.2 cents, or a total of $6,588.

The plan is similar to that already in effect at Kaiser's basic steelmaking plant here, but operates independently. Participants share in the gains made through cost savings, and are protected from job or income loss resulting from technological changes.

The sharing idea grew out of the long steel strike of 1959. The parties agreed in the settlement to search jointly for a better way of settling disputes and for a plan allowing both employes and management to share fairly in the progress resulting from increasing efficiencies at Fontana.

The plan will stay in effect for at least two years but revisions may be made at the end of a year. Language of one clause involving deductions from savings still is being worked out.

The plant produces steel for bridges, apartments and other high-rise buildings.

College Aid Extended For 3 Years by House

graduate facilities would rise from $453 million in the coming fiscal year to $900 million in the third year. Grants for graduate facilities would go up over the same period from $60 million to $120 million.

The House Education & Labor Committee had rejected an Administration proposal to phase out the student loan program under the National Defense Education Act and substitute federal interest subsidies for private loans. The House went along with the committee and no effort was made to cut the authorization.

Education spending was also boosted above the President's budget request in a $10.5 billion appropriation bill covering programs of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept. and related agencies.

The biggest addition was $232.8 million for grants to schools in districts where there are large numbers of federal military and civilian employes. The President has sought to trim back this "impact aid" program.

Funds for vocational education were raised $39 million above the budget request, $12 million were voted for aid to land grant colleges, and the House followed up its action on the college aid bill by voting an additional $158 million for National Defense Education Act loans to students.

Republicans went through the motions of trying to cut the appropriations bill, but were rebuffed.

The by-now-customary Republican motion to cut the appropriations 5 percent across-the-board was rejected on a 325-143 vote. The House then passed the bill, 354-27.

One new education program, however, met with a setback. The Appropriations Committee dropped from the bill financing for the new Teacher Corps, designed to bring teams of experienced and novice teachers into poverty areas where requested by local communities. Supporters decided against a floor fight to restore the appropriation in the House, but a strong effort is expected to be made to have the Senate add the money.

Worker Disrespectful? It Figures, Says NLRB, Citing 30% Pay Cut

Singing disrespectfully about management while on the job was a "normal and foreseeable" reaction by a worker whose pay had been cut nearly 30 percent and not sufficient cause for discharge, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The board found that the firing of Ramon Hernandez for singing and gesturing while pressing sweaters for John Kinkel & Son in New Shrewsbury, N. J., was part of a company campaign to discourage employes from joining the Ladies' Garment Workers.

A three-member NLRB panel composed of Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Sam Zagoria ordered the firm, which makes knitted sweaters, to reinstate Hernandez and 10 other workers who took part in a protest strike and to give backpay retroactive to Sept. 9, 1964.

Hernandez was on strike from Sept. 9 to Sept. 21, 1964, and on his return was given his old job back at $35 less pay a week. He cut his production from 40 dozen sweaters daily to 25—corresponding to his old piecework rate—and resumed the singing and gesturing which, the board recounted, reflected the strikers' hostility toward the employers.

The NLRB members said in their decision:

"While on the picket line during the strike, Hernandez had sung the song 'How Much is That Doggie in the Window?' whenever Catherine Kinkel [supervisor of pressing] would appear in view. After his return to work, he continued to sing or whistle this song when Catherine was near his place of work," and accompanied the singing with a gesture indicating scorn or defiance.

Hernandez persisted in his conduct despite warnings and was fired at the end of the week. His actions, the board declared, must be viewed in the light of the illegal conduct by the employer which provoked them.

Considering that management cut his pay almost 30 percent to the level of his starting rate, the board reasoned that "Hernandez' singing and gesturing were but normal and foreseeable reactions" to the employer's conduct. It noted that there is no claim or evidence they affected production in any way.

The board said it does not condone Hernandez' cutting his production rate but that "this again was a predictable reaction to protect himself against . . . the illegal reduction in his pay, and was in no way disproportionate to the wrong inflicted upon him."

Besides reinstating Hernandez at his old rate of pay and recalling other strikers, Kinkel & Son was ordered to stop spying on union meetings, to bargain with the union, and to fire or lay off as many new employes as necessary to find jobs for the aggrieved workers. If some strikers remain unemployed, the company must put them on a preferential list, the NLRB ruled.

Who Paid the Bills?:

Dirksen's 1 Man, 1 Vote Oratory Heavy on 'Herrings,' Not Dollars

By Willard Shelton

The junior senator from Illinois, Everett McKinley Dirksen, rose to the floor the afternoon of April 20 to deliver his final speech before the agreed-on time for voting on the Dirksen amendment—his constitutional amendment to upset the Supreme Court's state legislative reapportionment decisions.

Dirksen, his party's floor leader and a celebrated orator (newsmen sometimes call him the Wizard of Ooze), must have known what the Senate was prepared to do to him. He had forced a vote on his proposal last summer and had been beaten on a 57-39 rollcall; a constitutional amendment, of course, requires a two-thirds majority in each house and Dirksen was seven short. There was no reason for him to imagine that his position had radically improved since then.

He had fought hard. He had successfully threatened a filibuster of other pending measures in the Senate Judiciary Committee to get an agreement that his constitutional amendment would be cleared for another rollcall test.

The intervening months, moreover, had been employed in the creation of a so-called Committee for Government of the People — a "grassroots" group promoted by the high-powered California public relations firm of Whitaker & Baxter.

Dirksen himself held the title of chairman of the Advisory Committee of the Committee for Government of the People, with five other members of the Senate and five House members as his colleagues.

Still, Dirksen must have known what was going to happen on the rollcall (he lost again, 55-38, still seven votes short, and with pairs and announced choices by absentees he was up against 41 against him).

Swan Song

He began his final speech, in any case, with the swan song Gen. Douglas MacArthur used in addressing a joint meeting of Congress after being fired in Korea by Pres. Truman:

"Old soldiers never die; they just fade away."

The Dirksen amendment issue, said the Illinois senator, would neither die nor "fade away."

"When I start I play for keeps," said Dirksen.

When the people begin to be "unhappy about the inequities" that will develop "under the fiat of the federal court system," he said, "there will be some place to go and no Berlin wall to stop them. "

"None of the red herrings about where we got the money to run this educational program are going to stop it," Dirksen continued.

"We have not asked about the money spent by the League of Women Voters or by the labor group from New York that was in the Capitol yesterday. . . . I know what is going on. I know where the arms have been twisted; and we will tell that story, believe me."

Precisely what was spent in the Whitaker & Baxter "Committee for Government of the People" operation before the Senate vote was not disclosed on the floor, although Senators Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) repeatedly invited Dirksen as chairman of the committee to have a statement filed.

However — Robert Sherrill wrote in the St. Petersburg Times on Feb. 10 that "within the next few weeks" almost every Florida adult would receive "a small red, white and blue brochure," that every Florida editor would receive a "45-page indexed looseleaf notebook," and every state legislator an approach from one of the state's U. S. senators—all on behalf of the Florida unit of the "Committee for Government of the People."

Sherrill wrote that he was unable to get an estimate of the "millions" a campaign on such a scale would cost or a statement on where the money was coming from, but said it was "generally known" that the American Farm Bureau Federation was "contributing abundantly," and named several other associations, including business groups, as giving "some support."

Knows the Answers

Dirksen once commented that he had served on the congressional committee that drafted the lobby registration act and continued:

"I know when we violate the law and when we do not violate the law. . . . I know all the answers, Mr. President.

"We are on good ground and we aim to fight it out here and now."

At one moment Dirksen indicated his committee might make a statement "if we can get the AFL-CIO and [Pres.] George Meany, the League of Women Voters, and those other organizations that were just read into the [Congressional] Record, and let them make a statement."

As a matter of public record, the AFL-CIO files regular quarterly reports of lobbying expenses with the Clerk of the House.

The following colloquy took place between Tydings and Dirksen:

Mr. TYDINGS. "Was not the Committee for Government of the People organized for the sole purpose of passing the Dirksen amendment and abrogating the Supreme Court's decision in Reynolds against Sims? Is that not the purpose?"

Mr. DIRKSEN. "Certainly, we are not abrogating the decision. We are just taking our cause to the people. When this is not done, let the senator tell me where a state will ever go if it is unhappy under the Reynolds against Sims decision. Where is it going to get relief, now or in the future? There is no place. The door has been closed. The senator refuses to open it, even a little, where the people are unhappy with the senator's deal."

Mr. TYDINGS. "Getting back to my question again, is it not a fact that this committee was organized for the purpose of influencing legislation; namely, the passage of the Dirksen constitutional amendment in Congress?"

Mr. DIRKSEN. "The senator forgets that the committee consists of senators. We are influencing legislation every day on the floor of the Senate. Every time a senator opens his mouth and makes a speech, he is trying to influence legislation on the floor of the Senate. We do not have to apologize as senators for that, but those who have to register under the Anti-lobbying Act are registered."

Mr. TYDINGS. "Does not the lobbying act provide that committees which are organized for the specific purpose of passing legislation must file, on a quarterly basis, reports of contributions received and expenditures made?"

Mr. DIRKSEN. "If the senator wants to make it an issue, why does he not make it plain? Why does he not go before the grand jury?"

Mr. TYDINGS. "I am asking the senator."

Mr. DIRKSEN. "The senator is not going to get me to respond to the question in the form he has put it. That is the red herring that has been paraded here in the Senate for the past several months."

Mr. TYDINGS. "It is not a red herring. The people are not asking for the Dirksen amendment. The groups that are pressing and contributing money for the adoption of the Dirksen amendment are the special interest groups that control the rotten borough state legislatures. The people would like to have fair representation. The reason I asked the question is so we can know where the money is coming from, whether it is from the average citizen, or whether, indeed, it is from the special interests who want to maintain the status quo in their state legislatures."

Mr. DIRKSEN. "We have made clear what we are trying to do, but it is clear that that issue is one of the red herrings. The senator has not mentioned any issue of substance."

One financial report relating to the Whitaker & Baxter operation was filed before the vote. A law firm reported it had received $10,000 from the Committee for Government of the People and expended slightly more than $2,000.

In addition to mentioning "labor" groups and "red herrings," Dirksen commented in his closing speech about something he called "the numbers game," whereby his side had "to supply two votes for every vote the opponents bring up." It was apparently a reference to the constitutional requirement of a two-thirds vote for approval of an amendment.

"What a lot of nonsense and what a lot of droll," said Dirksen, who had just defeated repeal of Section 14(b) by a filibuster in which a two-thirds cloture vote against him would have been required to make him stop talking and let the Senate vote.

Ackley Warns Business:

Profit Surge Seen Threat as Pay Lags

has been in farm and food prices "due largely to a temporary maladjustment between demand and supply." He said retail food prices "have stabilized in April and declines in important food items should be seen during the rest of this year."

As to wages Ackley said:

"So far, there has been no serious upward cost push from the side of wages. And we expect no dangerous general wage push during the remainder of 1966."

The Wall Street Journal report on profit increases in the first quarter of the year was backed up by reports in other business and financial publications.

Profits Up a Third

The New York Times reported that "profits of the average American corporation are about one-third higher this year than they were a year ago."

The Times said that one-fourth of the 516 industrial manufacturing and service companies surveyed "set earnings records for the March quarter and a number of these achieved the highest profits in their histories."

Commerce Sec. John Connor, also addressing the chamber's meeting, declared that current pressures in the economy do not "call for drastic measures on an emergency basis."

Ackley warned in reply to a question that an increase in federal spending in excess of the President's budget might bring on an income tax increase. He noted also that selective credit controls are unlikely because inflationary pressures are not intense in the consumer credit and real estate areas, where such controls are applied. There are "inflationary pressures in the plant and equipment field," he said, but selective credit controls cannot be applied there.

At another session Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, participating in a panel session on labor-management relations, retorted angrily to the accusation by a businessman that the National Labor Relations Board was denying employers their "basic rights."

Wirtz told Charles Brooks, director of labor relations of Texaco, Inc., "the language is 50 years old. There is the right to dissent; there is the right to communicate; there is the right to vote."

Commenting that the panel was set up to discuss matters affecting the Labor Dept., Wirtz said Brooks' attack "abuses a forum and demeans an organization."

The chamber also heard Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., lecture the businessmen delegates on "indiscriminate attacks on all government programs without regard to relative merit."

Heineman declared that "the public voice of business today is hardly distinguishable from the one that resonated 25 or 50 or 100 years ago." What appears to be the "collective voice of business," he said, still views the demands of the people for social services as "the irresponsible clamor of the mob for bread and circuses" and government acquiescence in these demands as "steps toward inevitable socialism and slavery."

LABOR DELEGATION from New England urged House Appropriations Committee to approve funds to start the Dickey-Lincoln School public power project in Maine, which would provide the first low-cost power in the region. From left: Joseph Moriarity, New Hampshire State AFL-CIO; Thomas F. Policastro, Rhode Island AFL-CIO president and chairman of the delegation; Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.); Rep. William D. # 9 Out of 10 Support Repeal of 14(b) —When the Question Isn't Loaded

A Republican congressman found that an overwhelming majority of his constituents support repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act—when the issue is put to them without misleading phrases such as "right-to-work."

Rep. Richard S. Schweiker of Pennsylvania included a question dealing with 14(b) repeal in the annual questionnaire he sends to voters in his district.

On the 14(b) issue, Schweiker said, "I tried to word the question so that no prejudical labels were used, so that it could be judged on its merits."

More than nine out of 10 persons replying favored permitting unions and employers to negotiate a union shop. The actual percentage was 90.4, with only 4.9 percent opposed and 4.7 percent replying "not sure." It was by far the highest margin recorded on any of the 20 questions in the opinion survey.

Schweiker phrased his question as follows:

"Do you think management and its employes should have the right to choose for themselves whether they want a union shop, an open shop or no union at all when they bargain collectively?"

The Pennsylvania congressman represents a mixed suburban and rural district, and 77 percent of those replying to his questionnaire were registered Republicans.

In a follow-up newsletter to his constituents, Schweiker explained why he supports—and voted for—repeal of Section 14(b):

"Section 14(b) allows a state to outlaw the union shop, even when a company's management and a majority of its employes want a union shop. Pennsylvania and 30 other states have not outlawed the union shop. We in Pennsylvania and two-thirds of the country have never used Section 14(b). Only 19 states, mostly southern, have outlawed the union shop. . . .

"Repeal of 14(b) would only stop these 19 states from interfering with the right of management and its employes to freely choose whether they want a union shop. . . .

"Many northern states have lost jobs and industries to southern states which . . . use these laws as 'bait' to lure plants from states like Pennsylvania. Southern congressmen frankly admit that retention of 14(b) allows their states to entice industry by promising a lower wage scale. . . .

Opponents say this [a union shop] is compulsory unionism. I say it is little different from Congress voting a new tax which I must pay, too, even though I voted against it. Those who don't agree with the majority decision must abide by it. Incidentally, once a union shop has been voted in, it may also be voted out by a majority vote of the employes."

Schweiker's poll also showed more of his constituents favoring than opposing "increasing the minimum wage from $1.25 to $1.60 over a several-year period."

Eulogies Hail McNamara As Champion of Worker

Labor and the nation mourned the death of Sen. Patrick V. McNamara (D-Mich.), a fighter for workers' rights during 18 years as president of a Detroit pipe fitters' local and 11 years in the U.S. Senate.

McNamara, who announced earlier this year that he would not run for a third term because of ill health, died Apr. 30 at the age of 71.

"He will be remembered as a champion of the people," Pres. Johnson declared.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed labor's grief at McNamara's death and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler represented the federation at funeral services in Detroit.

Meany termed McNamara "truly a representative of all the people" in his public service as well as "a fellow trade unionist and a personal friend."

Bipartisan Praise

In the Senate, tributes came from Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives alike. To his colleagues, he was "blunt . . . uncompromisingly honest . . . outspoken . . . warmhearted." And, in the analysis of Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, McNamara was "heavily responsible for much of the social legislation of the last three Congresses."

Johnson flew to the funeral, accompanied on the presidential plane by a bipartisan congressional delegation and two union officials, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Jack T. Conway, executive director of the Industrial Union Dept.

McNamara was the Senate sponsor of the bill to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, chairman of the Senate Public Works Committee, a leader in the successful campaigns for medicare and aid to education, floor leader in pushing through the last minimum wage bill.

His parents came to the United States from Ireland shortly before he was born in North Weymouth, Mass. The oldest of eight children, he left school after the sixth grade —and was a lifelong crusader for better schools and educational opportunity. His public service included election to Detroit's Board of Education. "Any kid that can get through college ought to go," McNamara declared on one occasion.

He worked as a pipe fitter, a construction foreman and a contractor but, as he put it, "my avocation has been the labor movement." Besides his unpaid tenure as president of his local union, he served as a vice president of the Detroit central labor body for six years.

McNamara upset a veteran Republican incumbent, Homer Ferguson, to win his first Senate term in 1954 by nearly 40,000 votes. Six years later, he was elected to a second term by a 120,000 vote margin.

The Michigan senator is survived by his wife, Mary, a son, a daughter and 12 grandchildren.

Alabama Voting Shows Moderates Fragmented

Democrats split into fragments in the primary. Most Negro voters, including those newly registered, cast their ballots for Atty. Gen. Raymond Flowers. Many long-time liberals voted for former Rep. Carl Elliott.

In other contests, one Negro won enough votes for a run-off primary seeking Democratic nomination for the state legislature and two others, seeking nomination for county sheriff, led the field and won the right to enter the May 24 run-off primaries.

Al Lingo, whose state troopers beat and clubbed Negroes last year in their attempted Selma-to-Montgomery march, was defeated for nomination as sheriff of Jefferson County (Birmingham). Sheriff James G. Clark of Selma, also a white supremacist, faces a run-off with Wilson Baker, former Selma police chief, who was bitterly critical of Clark's activities.

Democratic Sen. John J. Sparkman, seeking a fourth successive term, was easily renominated over token opposition.

Primaries in five other states showed these results:

Florida. Gov. Hayden Burns led the field for Democratic renomination but faces a May 24 run-off against Mayor Robert King High of Miami, who had the backing of liberal and Negro voters. The race is almost an exact replay of the 1964 Democratic primaries. Claude Kirk won nomination in the Republican primary.

Ohio. Republican Gov. James A. Rhodes easily won renomination and will face State Sen. Frazier Reams, Jr., who defeated State Rep. Harry McIlwain in the Democratic primary, in November. Former Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., beat an avowed John Birch Society member, for Republican nomination in the 1st Congressional District, and will run against incumbent Democratic Rep. John Gilligan.

Indiana. In the Republican primary in a remapped congressional district, incumbent Rep. Richard Roudebush defeated incumbent Rep. Ralph Harvey.

Oklahoma. Former Gov. Raymond Gary led the field in the Democratic primary for nomination for governor but must meet Preston Moore in a May 24 run-off. The leading Republican candidates, State Sen. Dewey Bartlett and John N. Camp, also face a run-off. Incumbent U.S. Sen. Fred Harris won Democratic renomination.

New Mexico. T. E. Lusk, a former state senator, upset former Gov. John Burroughs in the Democratic primary for nomination for governor and will run against State Rep. David F. Cargo, Republican in the general election. Democratic Sen. Clinton P. Anderson was renominated without opposition.

Dirksen Hits Housing Bias Ban:

Major Obstacles Confront LBJ's New Civil Rights Bill

Atty. Gen. Nicholas deB. Katzenbach was leadoff witness as the Administration began its battle for its 1966 civil rights bill in hearings before a House Judiciary Subcommittee. But a major section was already in danger as Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) denounced the housing proposals as "unconstitutional."

Dirksen, the Senate Republican leader, originally called the public accommodation provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act illegal before helping break a southern filibuster against that bill.

His threat of opposition appeared serious this year because he served instant notice that he would not participate in breaking any filibuster the southerners might mount.

Another negative factor emerged as both Dirksen and the Senate Democratic leader, Sen. Mike Mansfield (Mont.) opposed any time limit on Senate Judiciary Committee consideration of the Administration measure. The 1964 and 1965 bills were brought to the floor for action by the device of setting a rigid limit on the length of time they could be stalled in committee by the hostile chairman, Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.).

The heart of the Administration draft bill is its proposal to ban racial discrimination in the sale or rental of housing in any section of the country. It also emphasizes stronger federal sanctions against discrimination in jury selection and against acts of terrorism against civil rights workers.

It would empower the attorney general to file suits on his own authority, without waiting for a citizen complaint, to speed up desegregation of schools and other public facilities. House sponsor of the bill is Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.); the Senate sponsor is Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

All the President's proposals were given advance backing by the AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco last December. In a sweeping civil rights resolution the convention said:

- In the housing field, the late Pres. Kennedy's executive order forbidding federal financing of discriminatory projects directly supported by the government was "not enough." Projects indirectly assisted by federal guarantees and insurance must also be covered, the resolution said. The Johnson program calls for congressional action to cover such indirectly assisted projects.
- In education, there must be an "accelerated pace" of school desegregation.
- In the field of employment discrimination, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 "needs strengthening." A House-passed bill would give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission authority to seek enforcement of its orders in court. The Johnson message asked the Senate to complete congressional action in this area.
- The Voting Rights Act of 1965 opened the door of the franchise to many Negroes, but implementation was still not "good enough." Fifty percent of Negroes in five southern states where discrimination has been most severe may be registered to vote in November, the President said, but "a million eligible Negroes remain unregistered." The "key to [their] liberation must be used."
- There must be "total elimination of discrimination and segregation" in the jury system. "A jury must not be 'for whites only'."

The Johnson proposals went to Congress about a month before a scheduled White House Conference on Civil Rights which is expected to bring about 2,000 delegates to Washington to discuss the broadest possible range of citizen rights that may still lie outside the protection of federal law, either by omission or difficulty in enforcement.

The message spelled out the objectives he sought in immediate legislation. He was asking Congress, he said:

- "To reform our federal criminal stautes to provide Negroes and all who labor or speak for racial justice the protection of stronger and more effective criminal laws against interference with the exercise of long-established rights.
- "To establish detailed procedures of jury selection in federal courts so that discrimination may be banished—and to create forceful guarantees that state court juries also will be selected without discrimination of any kind.
- "To broaden the attorney general's authority to bring suit for the desegregation of schools and public facilities.
- "To declare a national policy against racial discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, and to create effective remedies against [such] discrimination in every part of America."

In addition, the President asked for a 100-man expansion of the staff of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, with a back-up of supporting personnel, to carry out expanded duties in enforcing civil rights legislation.

"Freedom from discrimination is not enough," Johnson's message said. "There must be freedom from the disadvantage that 200 years of discrimination helped create."

No Bill Is Final

"No civil rights act, however historic, will be final. We would look in vain for one definitive solution to an injustice as old as the nation itself — an injustice that leaves no section of the country and no level of American life unstained."

The President acknowledged that "no amount of legislation" at the national level will meet the needs. "It must be joined by a massive effort on the part of the states and local governments, of industry, and of all citizens, white and Negro."

Nevertheless, he concluded, "we are engaged in a great adventure—as great as that of the last century, when our fathers marched to the western frontier."

"Whether we shall succeed is an issue that rests in the heart of every American. [But] that issue can and will be decided in only one way. For we have not come this far to fail within sight of our goal."

LABOR'S STRONG SUPPORT for America's foreign aid program was stressed in testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Chairman Thomas E. Morgan (D-Pa.) welcomes AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty and Administrator William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

peace and progress."

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty testified on behalf of Biemiller, who was attending funeral services for Michigan's Sen. Pat McNamara.

Biemiller's statement strongly endorsed the proposed five-year authorization period as allowing "more rational long-range planning in developing countries." It also backed separation of economic and military aid into two bills to "enable the public to understand better just how much money is going into economic development and how much into military aid aimed at making peaceful progress possible."

On specific areas of the bill, the AFL-CIO:

- Protested a proposed stretch-out of Latin-American housing funds—authorized last year for a two-year period—to cover six years without any additional money.
- Asked a flexible interest rate policy on guaranteed housing loans for Latin America so that funds will continue to be available to move "workers and their families from slums into decent housing."
- Urged that the percent of U.S. technical assistance funds going to labor projects in various nations be raised well above the present 1.8 percent.

On this point, the AFL-CIO commented:

"There are few groups in developing countries which have the political and economic importance of labor unions. They are often the only groups which exist to represent the interests of lower-income families in societies where a small upper class has traditionally monopolized economic and political power.

"Free, non-Communist trade unions are the best starting point for developing the cooperatives, credit unions and other private groups which form the true basis of economic and political democracy. . . . The direction they take, be it democratic or dictatorial, responsible or demagogic, can often set the pattern which will be followed by the whole society."

Biemiller cited the achievements of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the African-American Labor Center—both created through AFL-CIO efforts—which have reached tens of thousands of workers with trade union instruction, direct aid in education, vocational training and health assistance.

Transit Crisis Seen Justifying U. S. Subsidies

Federal operating subsidies for mass transportation systems were urged by the Transit Union as an alternative to "strangulation of entire metropolitan areas" by abandonment of commuter service.

Vice Pres. Walter J. Bierwagen told a Senate subcommittee that curtailment of service and higher fares have brought about a crisis in many areas fully justifying the operating subsidies proposed in a bill by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Williams, who sponsored the 1964 mass transit legislation establishing a program of construction grants and loans, said he is convinced that "a much more basic and massive program is needed."

Opening witnesses who agreed with him included the top elected Democratic and Republican office holders in New York City—Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) and City Council Pres. Frank D. O'Connor (D).

Bierwagen stressed that new legislation should include the guarantees of collective bargaining rights written into the 1964 law and said operating subsidies should encompass "the entire field of urban mass passenger transportation."

Declaring that capital improvements funds are not the only transit problem, Bierwagen added:

"Many private employers in our industry with relatively good equipment and facilities have long operated on the verge of bankruptcy. Others have abandoned services or cut back unprofitable operations and increased fares to the point where remaining operations can scarcely begin to fulfill the needs of the community."

58% of Hospitals Meet Medicare Qualifications

A total of 4,932 of the country's 8,550 hospitals, or 58 percent, had become eligible by Apr. 20 to participate in the medicare program, Surgeon Gen. William H. Stewart of the Public Health Service announced.

ABC Scores Candy Chain Breakthrough

Kansas City, Mo.—The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers overcame an all-out anti-union campaign by management of the long-unorganized Russell Stover Candy Co. plant here to win a National Labor Relations Board election—the first in the Stover chain.

The NLRB tally was 180 for the ABC, 152 against. The expelled Teamsters and Bakery & Confectionery Workers got one vote each in the 420-worker plant.

Company opposition to the organizing effort was intense in a plant which had never had a union. The ABC gave credit for the victory to its organizing staff, an active in-plant committee and the AFL-CIO regional staff.

The Russell Stover firm is one of the nation's largest candy makers with 250 retail stores in 40 states and more than 4,000 drug and department store outlets in all the states. Company profits were put at 31.7 percent of stockholder investment after taxes for 1964, and 1965 net income is running even higher, the union said.

April Jobless Rate Slips Down to 3.7%

Hits Lowest Level Since Late 1953

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment rate fell slightly to 3.7 percent in April as the job picture showed "continued strength," the Labor Dept. has reported.

The key seasonally adjusted jobless rate, in edging down from 3.8 percent in March to the 3.7 percent level it had reached in February, was again at the lowest point since November 1953.

The April rate reflected the steady decline from the 4.8 percent unemployment level of April 1965; in April 1964 it was 5.3 percent.

The March to April changes showed a further improvement for adult men, the report pointed out, while those for women and teenagers were mainly seasonal.

Overall, unemployment fell by 200,000 to a total of 2.8 million, some 750,000 lower than in April a year ago. Of the total unemployed, about 2.3 million were seeking full-time work and the rest were looking for part-time jobs, the report noted.

3 Groups Listed

The unemployed group is made up of 1.1 million adult men, some 840,000 women and 860,000 teenagers.

The number of jobless adult men fell by 300,000 over the month—100,000 more than the usual seasonal decline. Their jobless rate dropped to 2.4 percent, down from the 2.6 percent level at which it had held since last December.

The report said this is the lowest jobless rate for adult men in over 12 years.

The unemployment rate for married men, the important breadwinner group, was 1.8 percent in April—the fifth straight month it has been under 2 percent, the report added.

Adult women continued with a jobless rate of 3.6 percent, while the teenage jobless rate held at 12 percent.

The long-term unemployed—those futilely seeking work for 15 weeks or more—totaled 800,000 in April. This group showed no improvement over the month but was 250,000 lower than a year ago.

The non-white unemployed totaled 550,000 in April and showed a jobless rate of 7 percent, continuing at about twice the jobless rate of white workers, the report said.

On the employment side of the picture, the report said non-farm payrolls rose by 650,000 to a total of 62.5 billion.

The rise was no greater than was

Congress Urged to Speed Action on Key Labor Bills

Council Backs LBJ Rights Proposals

By Saul Miller

A call for stepped-up congressional action on bills "of major importance to the labor movement" and support for Pres. Johnson's civil rights legislation marked the spring meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

At a one-day meeting in Washington the council gave its full support to a national consumer boycott of food products grown and marketed by the DiGiorgio Co., of Delano, Calif., in support of the strike of farm workers in the area. (Story this page.)

It voted also to support Pres. Johnson's request to aid the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy in its study of current economic problems. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. I. W. Abel will serve on a subcommittee of the labor-management group and present labor's views. The committee has scheduled its next meeting for May 23.

The council's call for action on major legislative objectives urged expedited House action on:

- The minimum wage bill approved by the House Labor Committee and now cleared by the Rules Committee. (Story on Page 3.)
- The unemployment compensation bill still in the House Ways & Means Committee.
- The on-site picketing bill cleared by the House Labor Committee but blocked from floor action by Committee Chairman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.)—a move assailed by the council as a "mockery of the democratic process." (Story this page.)

The council said it will do its "utmost" to help win passage for

Court Voids Bar to Fair Housing

The California Supreme Court ruled that the state cannot give legal sanction to discrimination in the sale or rental of housing.

It struck down, as a violation of the federal constitution, a controversial amendment to the California constitution which prohibited the legislature and local governments from adopting or enforcing any fair housing law.

The 5-2 decision is expected to be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. If it stands, it will automatically reinstate California's 1963 fair housing law which made racial discrimination illegal.

Opponents of the 1963 law—including real estate interests and right wing groups—retaliated by sponsoring an amendment to the state constitution prohibiting any interference with racial restrictions

Asks Leadership Action:

Council Hits Powell On Site Bill Stalling

House Labor Committee Chairman Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.) has defied "basic democratic principles" and showed "contempt" for his obligations as committee chairman by holding up the on-site picketing bill, the AFL-CIO charged.

The federation's Executive Council called on Powell to "immediately reverse his position" and permit the bill, which has the overwhelming endorsement of his committee, "to come to the floor for a vote up or down."

If Powell refuses, the council said, the House leadership should take "immediate" steps to assure a vote on the bill. The manual of procedure under which the House functions clearly spells out the obligation of a chairman to support a bill reported by his committee or step aside and permit the next ranking member to call up the bill.

The manual, "Cannon's Procedures," declares: "So binding are the obligations of a chairman in the handling of a bill reported by his committee that charges to the effect that he is not sincerely cooperating to secure its passage give rise to a question of privilege."

The council statement noted that the situs picketing bill "would simply grant building and construction workers the same picketing rights now extended to industrial workers. . . . Four Administrations have approved this bill; leaders of both parties have made commitments for a vote . . . the House Education & Labor Committee overwhelmingly voted for the bill and the Rules Committee has scheduled it for floor action."

Now Powell, "in total disregard of his earlier pledges to the Speaker of the House," refuses to call up

Labor Backs Boycott Of DiGiorgio Brands

The AFL-CIO "fully supports" a national consumer boycott of food products grown and marketed by the DiGiorgio Co., larges grower in the Delano, Calif., area, the Executive Council announced

"Don't buy DiGiorgio products," the council urged in a statemen backing a boycott of the firm, which it characterized as the "symbo and leader of resistance" to farm worker organization.

The federation's convention last December unanimously endorsed the strike by grape pickers seeking union bargaining rights from some 40 growers in the Delano area under the joint auspices of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and the National Farm Workers Association.

DiGiorgio is not only the biggest of these growers, and the largest employer of field hands, the Executive Council noted, but is also the spearhead of resistance to unionism.

"It was for this reason that the NFWA declared the boycott we

UAW Calls for 8-Point Auto Safety Program

An eight-point legislative program aimed at safer automobile design and reduction of death on the highways was presented to the House Interstate & Foreign Commerce Committee by Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther.

In a statement submitted to the committee, Reuther called for federal automobile design and inspection safety standards "with sufficient latitude for creative and imaginative product design" to be set by Congress.

The union, he said, is convinced that meaningful safety standards should be established, which will "require the automobile industry to devote its technological and engineering know-how to the design and production of safer cars."

Testimony heard in earlier hearings, said Reuther, "demonstrate it is possible to make the auto safer from the point of view of design and construction and that it is possible to do this with a minimum of delay." He added:

"It is difficult for concerned and responsible persons to understand the reluctance of the auto industry to accept the conclusions of numerous safety experts and apply them to design.

"The UAW believes that the automotive industry is fully capable of meeting this challenge within the

Cheng Family Wins 3d NMU Scholarship

New York—Joseph Cheng, son of a fugitive from the Chinese Communists, has become the third member of his family to win a $10,000 National Maritime Union college scholarship.

The youth, 18, was one of nine high school seniors announced by NMU Pres. Joseph N. Curran as winners of the union's scholarships, which yield $2,500 a year for four years.

Young Cheng is the son of Kung Cheng and was a year old when his father led his family out of Red China in 1949 to a temporary haven in Hong Kong. They came to the United States in 1956 and the father has worked since 1957 as a baker aboard U.S.-flag ships.

The scholarship winner's brother, Julian, 21, received a similar award in 1963 and is completing his junior year at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where Joseph expects to study. Their sister, Susan, was a 1964 winner and is completing her sophomore year at Barnard College.

Other winners this year were:

Maria Flores of Brooklyn, who was born in Honduras; Harry A. Suissa, Flushing, L.I.; Guy M. Allard, Jacksonville Beach, Fla.; Mary Christian, Port Arthur, Tex.; Adelaide Dougherty, Seffner, Fla.; Cheryl Jones, New Orleans; William McCabe, Baltimore, and Irving Williams, Norfolk, Va.

The winners, who were selected by an indepedent panel of judges headed by Dr. John T. Dunlop of Harvard University, can attend any college which does not discriminate because of race or religion.

Davis Named To Aid U.S. Beautification

Pres. Joe Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO has been named by Pres. Johnson to serve on a new Citizens Advisory Committee on Recreation & Natural Beauty headed by Laurance S. Rockefeller.

Johnson established the committee and expanded the President's Council on Recreation to include natural beauty in an Executive Order he signed in the White House Rose Garden with Mrs. Johnson beside him. The council is composed of six cabinet members, the chairman of the Federal Power Commission and the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the General Services administrator.

At the signing ceremony the President observed that the country is "just beginning to scratch the surface of ugliness, neglect and decay" in both urban and rural areas and asked a redoubling of efforts to beautify America.

"The opportunity for recreation and the daily experience of beauty just must be made a part of our gross national product," he said. "For a nation that calls itself great must have spirit as well as strength. It must have poetry as well as prosperity."

Meyer Weintraub Dies; Distillery Union Leader

Miami Beach, Fla.—Vice Pres. Meyer H. "Mike" Weintraub of the Distillery Workers, here for a meeting of the union executive board preceding the organization's convention, suffered a heart attack and died in an area hospital. Burial was in New York.

Weintraub, an officer and for 20 years a member of Local 1, New York Wine Workers, had been a Distillery Workers' vice president since 1958. His widow and two children survive.

Symphony Pact Raises Players' Earnings 54%

A combination of wage increases and extension of the Washington National Symphony Orchestra's season will yield a 54 percent increase in income to 96 members of Musicians Local 161 under a new three-year contract worked out in negotiations that began in November.

The new agreement, to take effect at the start of the 1966-7 season next fall, provides for a total of 23 percent in pay hikes which will raise the base pay from $162.50 per week for a season of 37 weeks in the present agreement to $172.50 for 40 weeks next year, $185 for 42 weeks the following season and $200 for 45 weeks in the final year.

The salary increases mean that 56 members of the orchestra working at base pay will have their annual incomes raised from the present $5,840 to $9,000. The other players are paid over the minimum. The extended season will include several weeks of summer concerts at Columbia, Md., starting next year.

The current agreement was reached only after a 35-day strike. The new pact was negotiated quietly and has been ratified by the members.

The union also won a large package of improvement in working conditions and fringe items which Pres. Sam Jack Kaufman and Sec.-Treas. Martin Emerson said make the new agreement one of the best in the major orchestra field. They included:

- Hospitalization and medical insurance under Blue Cross and Blue Shield, negotiated for the first time and paid for in full by the National Symphony Orchestra Association.
- A ban on discrimination in hiring because of race, religion, sex, color or national origin.
- A step-up in vacation from one week a year without pay to three weeks with pay.
- Doubling of the association's annual contribution to the pension plan, from $7,500 at present to $15,000.
- A week of paid sick leave per year of service to a maximum of 16 weeks.
- Severance pay at the rate of $125 a year for the first five years and $100 a year for the following years up to age 65.
- Considerably improved conditions while on tour, including coverage by a $25,000 accident insurance policy, use of first-class facilities only, and a day off each week.
- A rotation system for concerts in halls which are too small to permit the use of the full orchestra.
- Agreement by the union to permit the orchestra to be split into smaller groups for special performances such as ballets and chamber music.

M. Robert Rogers, association manager, said the pay increases were made possible by the Columbia concerts and the prospect of a Ford Foundation grant.

Dr. Sabin Hails Union Rights Role

Cincinnati, O. — Dr. Albert Sabin, who developed the oral vaccine for protection against infantile paralysis, gave the oath of office to Cincinnati AFL-CIO board members and in a talk to delegates praised the labor movement for protecting the right to free association and preserving the right to strike.

Dr. Sabin is a University of Cincinnati research scientist who was named winner of the 1967 Murray-Green award by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last February. He was chosen for his "lasting contribution" to human health.

now endorse," the council statement said, urging all AFL-CIO affiliates to give the campaign their full support.

Shortly after the council issued its appeal, the boycott was kicked off by organized labor in Los Angeles with picketing demonstrations at Ralph's Markets, a 50-store chain in the area.

The pickets urged customers of the markets not to buy products sold under the S & W Fine Foods label, a major DiGiorgio brand stocked by the stores.

The council statement noted that "an effective and permanent union for agricultural workers is in sight" for the first time since the start of the "factory farm" era.

"This is due in part," it said, "to the expiration of Public Law 78, which authorized the importation of braceros, or transient Mexican laborers — a decision vigorously pressed by the AFL-CIO.

2 Firms Agree

"This opportunity must not be lost because of the narrow intransigence of one company. The second largest Delano firm, Schenley Industries, at the urging of the AFL-CIO unions with which it already bargained, has recognized the NFWA as exclusive bargaining agent for its field workers. Christian Brothers has since done the same.

"We will press the consumer boycott until DiGiorgio follows suit. . . ."

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, who was instrumental in bringing the recognition agreement with Schenley, predicted that the response of union members all over the nation to the DiGiorgio boycott action "will be overwhelming."

"As union members today see the plight of farm workers, the denial of legal rights and the restrictions on their organizational privileges, the struggles they went through to build their own unions flash across their minds," he said.

"We will be providing every AFL-CIO central body and every local union with the brand name of every DiGiorgio product.

"This is no longer the battle of farm workers. It is a battle in which every union member and every union family is now involved."

DiGiorgio markets some 75 items, mostly canned, under the S & W Fine Foods label. Other major brands are TreeSweet juices and White Rose, the latter having wide distribution in the East.

The size of the corporation is indicated by its 1965 sales totalling some $232 million.

It farms some 5,000 acres of grapes in the Delano area alone, with other large parcels at Arvin, Borrego Springs and Marysville in California and some 6,000 acres at Fort Pierce, Fla., where its Indian Springs label is important.

J. S. DiGiorgio, chairman of the board, reportedly was paid more than $175,000 in salary and profit sharing bonuses in 1965 and the president, Robert DiGiorgio, drew more than $135,000.

Strike Time Down In First Quarter

Time lost because of strikes in the first three months of 1966 was significantly lower than in the same period of 1965, but the number of workers involved rose to the highest first-quarter level since 1953, according to preliminary estimates of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Idleness caused by labor-management disagreements accounted for one-tenth of 1 percent of estimated total working time compared with 16 one-hundredths of 1 percent last year and nine one-hundredths of 1 percent in 1964, the report showed.

The total number of workers involved was sent upward by several "large but brief stoppages," the BLS said. Approximately 406,000 workers were affected by the 755 strikes that started during the quarter, the figures showed, with an additional 26,000 workers idled by walkouts that began in 1965.

IUD's Small-Firm Pension Plan Set Up to Cover 14 Companies

A new small-firm pension plan developed by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has gone into effect with protection given about 1,100 employes of 14 participating companies.

At the first meeting of the newly-organized board of trustees Arthur J. Altmeyer, former chairman of the Social Security Board and former commissioner of social security, was elected chairman, and IUD Exec. Dir. Jack Conway secretary. Conway and Harry P. Albert, attorney representing the Stanley Soap Co., Newark, N. J., were designated to function for the board between meetings.

The Prudential Insurance Co. was chosen as the administering company, with 10 other insurance firms listed as participating companies to be geared into the program as it grows.

Conway said the IUD had been working on the plan since 1963 and formalized it at the last departmental convention. The trust agreement was signed just before the end of the year and application for approval by the Internal Revenue Service is now pending, he said.

The program pools pension plans for small firms and by spreading the risk and cutting down on overhead, provides safety and low cost, and will open the door to retirement benefits to workers who otherwise might have to go without them.

Altmeyer pointed out that it is flexible enough to permit variations in benefits as they are negotiated by different unions and employers. He called it a "unique undertaking" which is both simple and safe, as well as reasonable in price.

Conway stressed the care exercised in developing the plan, called it a "milestone" in pension history and said the department had "grossly underestimated" the interest in it.

First Group

Employers in the first covered group have from three to 261 employes, he said. The initially participating unions are the Auto Workers, Stone & Allied Workers, Glass & Ceramic Workers, Packinghouse Workers and Allied Industrial Workers.

The worker obtains vested rights in the program after 10 years of coverage. He may carry his earned credits from one employer to another so long as the employer is enrolled in the plan. Each covered worker will get an annual report of his credits.

Formal establishment of the plan came less than 24 hours after Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz warned a joint congressional subcommittee that millions of workers covered by private pension plans will not receive benefits because they may lose all rights to them if they change jobs, lose them to automation or quit before retirement.

He told the subcommitte, which is studying private pension plans, that the President's Committee on Corporate Pension Funds and Other Private Retirement & Welfare Programs has recommended studies of the practicability of portable pension plans and of insurance to protect workers who might lose benefits should their employer halt contributions "through business failure or otherwise." Bankruptcy of an employer under the IUD plan would leave the worker's benefits or credits intact, Conway said.

Wirtz estimated that about 25 million workers are now covered by private pension plans, with the figures expected to grow to 34 million by 1970 and to 42 million by 1980.

'Utmost' Backing Given:

Labor Pledges Drive For New Rights Bill

Labor pledged to do its "utmost" to help pass the civil rights legislation proposed by Pres. Johnson.

Congressional action is "essential" to accomplish the goals of earlier civil rights legislation "in fact rather than theory," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

It noted that the Administration bill "covers the major objectives to which the AFL-CIO unanimously pledged itself at last December's convention."

In specific areas:

● The AFL-CIO convention had called for "total elimination of segregation and discrimination in our jury system," and the Administration bill would prohibit discrimination in selection of federal, state or local jurors.

Federal jury commissioners would be empowered to oversee selection of grand jurors and trial jurors in federal courts. The attorney general would be authorized to ask a federal district court to appoint a master to oversee selection of state and local jurors where discrimination is feared.

The Executive Council said the need for jury reform is "cruelly apparent."

● On housing, the AFL-CIO convention blamed "the spread of de facto school segregation in the North" on "discriminatory housing practices that have fostered huge Negro ghettos."

Details Spelled Out

The Administration bill would ban discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, and bar discrimination by banks or other lending institutions in making of loans, amount of down payment required and interest rate. Enforcement would be through court suits brought either by the aggrieved person or by the attorney general.

"Discrimination in housing is the root of many civil rights evils," the Executive Council declared. "It must be eliminated."

● In public school desegregation. the AFL-CIO convention observed that only "meagre progress" has been made.

The proposed legislation would broaden the attorney general's power to bring suits for desegregation of schools.

"Enforcement powers to further equal education are both proper and necessary," the council declared.

● Murderers of civil rights workers "remain unpunished," the convention resolution noted.

The pending bill provides protection against threat or injury to persons engaged in civil rights work, with penalties up to life imprisonment if death results.

Civil rights advocates "need and deserve federal protection" against "the violence of bigots," the Executive Council said.

The council statement also urged speedy Senate approval of the House-passed bill to strengthen the enforcement machinery of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it powers comparable to those of the National Labor Relations Board.

Council Hits Powell Stall On Picketing

the bill and "has constituted himself a one-man roadblock."

The council termed his stand "a mockery of the democratic process" and a "clear contradiction" to the procedures under which the House functions.

The statement quoted this key section from Cannon's Procedures:

Procedure Cited

"A chairman directed to report a bill to the House ceases to function individually so far as that measure is concerned and becomes the representative of the committee in charge of the bill. Although he may have opposed the bill or parts of it in committee, he either steps aside and permits the next ranking membr of the committee to take charge of the bill on the floor or subordinates his personal views and devotes every effort to securing its consideration and passage in the form in which reported to the House."

Powell voted for the on-site picketing bill in committee, then on the eve of the vote, suddenly declared he was "unalterably oposed" to it and would not call it up in the House.

Key Labor Measures Pressed on Congress

the President's new civil rights measure and also urged speedy Senate approval of the House-passed bill to strengthen the powers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. (Story this page.)

Reviewing the strike of farm workers in the Delano grape area, the council noted that DiGiorgio is "not only the biggest" grower but is the spearhead of resistance to unionism. It is for "this reason that the National Farm Workers Association declared the boycott we now endorse," the council said.

The President's labor-management advisory group met in Washington May 4-5 to consider "the crucial domestic issue of the day—the maintenance of our unparalleled prosperity with economic stability."

The President said he particularly wanted the group's views on the effectiveness of the program of voluntary restraint, the role of business and labor in such a program, the role of government, views on tax and monetary policy and the role of wage-price guideposts.

Labor Members

Representing labor on the committee in addition to Meany and Abel are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, David Dubinsky, Joseph D. Keenan and George M. Harrison and Pres. W. A. Boyle of the unaffiliated Mine Workers.

In other actions the council voted continued financial support for the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and gave $5,000 to the White House Conference on Civil Rights.

It set the next council meeting for Aug. 22 with the city to be announced later.

THE STATUS of legislation in Congress and economic policy issues were top agenda items at the spring meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council in Washington.

Minimum Wage Bill Nears Vote As Council Urges Quick Action

The AFL-CIO pressed for "long overdue" action by Congress on two of labor's highest priority bills—minimum wage improvements and strong federal standards of unemployment compensation.

An Executive Council statement termed the wage-hour bill "the major weapon in the war on poverty."

The long-delayed bill received House Rules Committee clearance after the council meeting and Speaker John W. McCormack announced it would be brought to the floor the week of May 16.

It would extend coverage to some 7 million additional workers including, for the first time, a large group of farm workers.

The bill would raise the wage floor for nearly 30 million workers now covered by the $1.25 minimum. Their pay guarantee would go to $1.40 next February and to $1.60 a year later. The minimum for newly-covered workers would start at $1 an hour and rise 15 cents each year. The cutoff for farm workers would be $1.30, for other workers $1.60.

The legislation had strong bipartisan support in the House Labor Committee and was given Rules Committee clearance by a 9-6 vote. Opponents are expected to focus their efforts on an attempt to reduce coverage.

'Best Protection'

The Administration's unemployment compensation bill, introduced by Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee, is "the best protection against future recession," the Executive Council said.

As originally drafted it would:

● Raise the ceiling on unemployment benefits to at least 50 percent of the statewide average wage immediately, rising to at least two-thirds of the state average average in 1971.

● Add 26 weeks of unemployment compensation for those who have exhausted state benefits.

● Limit disqualification penalties imposed by states.

● Extend coverage to 5 million additional workers.

● Raise the taxable wage base for the unemployment compensation tax on employer payrolls.

There has been heavy employer pressure to block or emasculate the bill and the Ways & Means Committee reportedly has been sharply divided on the issue.

The two bills, the council said, "are of major importance to the labor movement, to millions of low-paid workers who are the first victims of layoffs, and to the economic well-being of America."

"It is time for promises and predictions to be fulfilled. Therefore we urge the leadership in the House of Representatives to take all proper steps to expedite action. We urge Pres. Johnson, who has supported both measures, to join us in our quest for prompt passage of both bills."

in housing. The amendment was forced on the ballot through an initiative petition. It was ratified by a two-to-one margin in 1964 after a campaign appealing to fears and prejudices. California labor strongly opposed the amendment.

Many Washington observers saw the California decision as improving the outlook for the fair housing section of the Administration's pending civil rights bill. Foes of civil rights have focused their attacks in Congress on this portion of the bill.

Another effect will be to release federal funds for California urban redevelopment projects, which had been held up for lack of assurance of non-discrimination.

The California Supreme Court acted on an appeal from a lower court decision in a case brought by a Negro postal employe and his wife against apartment house owners in Orange County who had refused to rent to them because of race. The trial court had held that the constitutional amendment had nullified the fair housing statute.

In reversing the decision, the state supreme court said "it is now beyond dispute" that the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment assures the right to acquire property without discrimination because of race or religion.

Besides reinstating the 1963 fair housing law, the decision also restores a 1959 law prohibiting discrimination by businessmen, including real estate dealers.

The state constitution provision, which was konwn as Proposition 14 during the 1964 election campaign, specified that "neither the state nor any subdivision or agency thereof shall deny, limit or abridge, directly or indirectly, the right of any person . . . to decline to sell, lease or rent property to such person or persons as he, in his absolute discretion, chooses."

State Atty. Gen. Thomas C. Lynch said that with the court's action in striking down this provision, he considers that the anti-discrimination laws are now back on the statute books and plans to start enforcing them.

He said if the state's Fair Employment Practices Commission begins any action on housing discrimination, he will represent the commission.

Beirne on Unit To Study Need For Physicians

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers, was named by Pres. Johnson to serve on the new National Advisory Commission on Health Manpower.

The commission was charged with attempting to solve what the President called a "critical shortage" of professional personnel in the health field, to recommend methods of accelerating the education of physicians and other health personnel, and to improve the utilization of those already in practice.

The 15-member commission is headed by J. Irwin Miller, board chairman of the Cummins Engine Co., Columbus, Ind. In making the appointments Johnson predicted a "heavy drain" on medical personnel when 19 million men and women come under the protection of medicare on July 1. A report is scheduled to be submitted next year.

Upholsterers Back All-Out Drive To Elect Liberal 90th Congress

Palm Beach, Fla.—An election-year political action call urged delegates of the 35th convention of the Upholsterers to join a campaign to return liberals to Congress to preserve the trend of progressive social legislation.

The call was sounded by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Joseph Rourke, deputy director of the federation's Committee on Political Education.

Rourke presented a plaque to UIU Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann in recognition of the 84-year-old union's 100 percent performance in the 1965 COPE campaign for voluntary dollar contributions.

In his keynote address to the delegates, Hoffmann voiced strong support for Administration policies in Viet Nam and assailed a critic of these policies, Senate Foreign, Relations Committee Chairman J. William Fulbright, as a "phony, so-called liberal . . . who never voted for a pro-labor bill or a civil rights bill" and who "says that we should forget Munich."

Labor, Hoffmann declared, "cannot and will not forget Munich. We cannot and should not turn our back on Communist aggression. We must not sacrifice small nations in the hope that we may thus buy our security. We of the American labor movement are fully alert to the threat and the importance of this struggle in Viet Nam."

Hoffmann, First Vice Pres. Alfred R. Rota, and Treas. R. Alvin Albarino were re-elected by the delegates along with five of the other six vice presidents. A sixth, Henry W. Conrad, Binghamton, N. Y., did not stand for re-election, and was succeeded by Paul Heaton, St. Louis.

Schnitzler told the 250 delegates and guests that the importance of having friends in Congress was brought home recently with defeat of the amendment proposed by Senate Minority Leader Dirksen to nullify the Supreme Court's one man, one vote ruling on the make-up of state legislatures.

"If it had passed, all hope of reshaping state legislatures to the will of the majority would have been endangered," Schnitzler continued. "So we have much to defend—as the Dirksen amendment taught us—and we have much more to achieve."

He urged that "if there is any loss of seats in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, let the loss be the seats of those who have failed to keep pace with and support the programs of a better America—whatever their party may be."

"The new Congress should be made up of all those men and women who have stood up and reflected the will of the people during the last two years. Let the ranks of he missing be filled by new men and women who will bring to Congress new ideas, new courage and new determination.

"Failure of the repeal of Section 14(b) is certainly no reason to abandon our friends to the not-so-tender mercies of our enemies. Instead, it means only that we must work harder. We must protect and defend those who stood with us so that they can be joined in Congress by new congressmen and senators who will make repeal a reality."

Health Center Praised

Schnitzler also had high praise for Salhaven, the gerontological village of UIU's health and welfare fund, about 15 miles from here, which he had visited shortly before addressing the convention.

Rourke spelled out the technique to accomplish the political objectives stated by Schnitzler in a four-point program to:

- Register union members to vote.
- Encourage them to join and work with the party of their choice—be it Democratic or Republican.
- Have locals affiliate with city central labor councils to make their COPE affiliates effective.
- Participate in political coalitions with minority groups, such as Negroes, young persons and senior citizens.

Other speakers included Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman and Organization Dir. Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Dir. Leo Perlis, of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities, Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis, of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Cole Named to Mediate N.Y. Newspaper Dispute

New York— Strike settlement prospects raised by the entry of a new mediator in the dispute between unions and the merged World Journal Tribune Corp. faded as management refused to budge from its stand that it alone has the right to choose the staff of the combined publications without regard for long-standing seniority provisions.

The application of seniority in the layoff of about 900 Newspaper Guild members is the main issue of the strike by the Guild which represents 2,000 workers in all on the papers. Some 3,700 members of nine craft unions have refused to cross the Guild picket lines since the strike began Apr. 24.

Replaces Kheel

Veteran arbitrator and mediator David L. Cole entered the dispute May 7, at the request of Mayor John V. Lindsay, to replace Theodore W. Kheel, who had withdrawn from the negotiations.

In subsequent negotiations at the Hotel Commodore, however, John Green, World Journal Tribune spokesman in the sessions with the Guild, said he had no intention of negotiating a new contract unless the Guild agrees to the publishers' right to ignore seniority, "bumping" practices in existence for 15 years and all rehiring obligations.

On the issue of "bumping," management refused to recognize the rights of employes to return to a previous job classification or even a comparable classification.

Guild Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy charged that the publishers are in no great hurry to bring out their new merged afternoon daily, the World Journal, the morning Herald Tribune and the Sunday World Journal Tribune, despite a statement by Matt Meyer, president of the new corporation, in a letter to employes that a strike would have a devastating effect on the merged papers.

They are not as much concerned about their date of publication, Murphy said, as they are about "their proclaimed aim to 'bring the union leaders to their senses'—which would simply mean that there would be no union at all except on paper."

One hopeful sign since Cole took over as mediator was the agreement by the publishers to withdraw their action against six craft unions asking them to show cause why they should not be compelled to arbitrate their existing contracts with the old papers.

James McMahan, president of the Stereotypers, said he felt that "honest, good-faith negotiations could clear up the problems of his union in two hours."

Constitution Modernized:

Firemen-Oilers Vote Higher Dues Floor

Montreal, Que.—Measures designed to strengthen the Firemen & Oilers and prepare for intensified organizing efforts, including modernization of the constitution and an increase in dues, were approved at the union's 27th constitutional convention here.

"You have drafted a new constitution that will guide us for the next five years," Pres. William E. Fredenberger told the delegates after being unanimously re-elected. "With the goals you have set for us, we should be a stronger union numerically and financially when the next convention rolls around."

Goal Unchanged

In his keynote address Fredenberger cited the changes the union has gone through in the 68 years of its existence and stressed that the "basic tenets of this organization are among the things that have not changed—the objective of this brotherhood remains to help bring about a better life for its members." Perhaps the most pressing problem today, he said, is job protection in an era of technological revolution.

The delegates voted without dissent to raise total dues by at least $1 per month, with a $5 floor for commercial locals and $6 for railroad locals, which require greater servicing. The grand lodge per capita was boosted by 50 cents to $2 for railroad locals and for other locals which pay full-time business representatives. For locals serviced by the international, the figure was set at $2.50 a month.

In other actions the convention:

- "Froze" the death benefit as of July 1 so that new and reinstated members will not be eligible for benefits. Present active and retired members will continue to be protected. The move was made because of the heavy drain on the fund and also because the equivalent of death benefits is now often provided by contracts or by provisions of the Social Security and Railroad Retirement acts.
- Strongly supported equal opportunity for minority group members, and called for full employment, expanded coverage by a higher minimum wage and pressing of the war on poverty.
- Urged greater political activity to elect the friends of labor and called on all members to contribute at least $1 to the Firemen & Oilers Political League to avert reactionary control of Congress and the danger that "gains obtained through collective bargaining can be abrogated" there. To demonstrate their own convictions, the delegates contributed $2,871 to the league during a floor collection.
- Advocated continued efforts to secure repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.
- Called for action by Congress and the Administration to revitalize railroad passenger service, to strengthen the merchant marine and to curb runaway flag ship operations.

The need for greater political activity this year to combat the extreme right was emphasized by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The John Birch Society, which he said "would destroy the influence of the labor movement," is but one of many powerful reactionary groups seeking to turn back the pages of history, Keenan declared.

Guidelines Scored

Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association described moves for wage increases and other benefits initiated on U.S. railroads by the non-operating unions and declared "we're not going to settle under any such formula" as the 3.2 percent "guidelines."

Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. analyzed the shopcrafts' wage-rules program and declared "we're going to see this program carried through to a conclusion."

Railroad workers' wages have lagged so far behind the rest of the economy, he added, that they are entitled to "far more" than the guideline limit "just to catch up."

Other speakers included Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress; Canadian Minister of Labor John R. Nicholson; Quebec Minister of Labor Jean-Paul Carrier Fortin; U.S. Under-Sec. of Labor John F. Henning; T. C. Douglas, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party; Chairman Howard Habermeyer of the Railroad Retirement Board; Frank Hall, Canadian vice president of the Railway Clerks; Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Also re-elected without opposition, besides Fredenberger, were Sec.-Treas. John J. McNamara; Exec. Vice Pres. James B. Zink; J. W. Lebeau, vice president for Canada, and Vice Presidents James M. Kennedy, Robert A. DuVall and William H. Kaiser.

Crowds Throng Union-Industries Show

UNION LABEL products made by union members under contract to fair employers drew crowds like this one (left) to the 21st Union-Industries Show, seen by 203,000 visitors Apr. 29-May 4 in Baltimore's Fifth Regiment Armory. Continuing a show custom (above) Sisters Joseph and Blandine of the Little Sisters of the Poor get union label tuna from SIU members Les Ballinger, San Diego; Steve Edney, San Pedro, and Rex Dickey, Baltimore.

POTTERS' EXHIBIT included demonstration of the different kinds of craftsmanship that go into the decorating of china. Here a member fastens decals to plates as part of the decorating process. More than 130 other exhibitors showed their products in similar booths.

SOUVENIRS of the show were given away by the thousands. Here a model cowgirl in union-made levis pins miniature overalls on coat of young visitor.

ALMOST BEFORE they knew it, sheep were sheared by professionals from the Meat Cutters in a demonstration that has been an annual show attraction for many years.

JOURNEYMEN BRICKLAYERS built a wall by day with all the know-how of their craft, then tore it down again before starting over. Another craft, the Plasterers & Cement Masons, built a plaster replica of Baltimore's Washington monument, scaled to a tenth of the actual 178-foot height.

WINNER'S NAME in one of many gift presentations is called by AFL-CIO Staff Rep. Robert Probey at AFL-CIO exhibit, set up as a theater which drew steady audiences to showings of federation films like Americans at Work, In Common Brotherhood, When Day's Work Is Done, Land of Promise and others.

Foreign Aid—A Duty

SINCE THE BEGINNINGS of foreign aid at the end of World War II, U.S. foreign aid programs have helped improve economic and social conditions throughout the free world.

One of the lessons of Viet Nam, where American fighting men are dying in battle, is that lags in social and economic development produce political instability, poverty, and frustrations which invite Communist aggression.

We in the labor movement know well that foreign aid will not solve all problems in underdeveloped nations. Political passions and aggressive military force can sweep away overnight the accomplishment of years of patient, laborious work and the accomplishments of millions of foreign aid dollars.

There are no rewards without risks—and the risks we take in our foreign aid efforts are infinitesimally small in comparison to the potential rewards—stability, progress, and peace. We know there are risks. But we also know that our foreign aid program makes a vital contribution to the cause of human welfare, economic progress, and political stability in the newly developing nations of the free world.

Therefore, we support the aid expenditures called for in the present bills, and we are prepared to support sums going well above the level of the current requests.

IN PAST YEARS the AFL-CIO has repeatedly subscribed to the target of 1 percent of gross national product for foreign aid that was suggested by a United Nations resolution. This country voted for that resolution and the United States also supported a recommendation in July 1965 by the OECD's Development Assistance Committee that the developed countries should strive to meet the 1 percent goal. However, the present bills call for less than one-half of 1 percent for total aid, and for economic aid alone, only 34 one-hundredths of 1 percent of our GNP.

We recognize that aid totals must depend on availability of sound projects and on existence of suitable political conditions in the recipient countries, rather than on some arbitrarily-set figure. Nevertheless, it seems clear that one-half of 1 percent of our wealth is not enough for a program which offers so much hope for peace and progress.

It is clear that the American labor movement takes a direct interest in foreign aid, not merely as a bystander, but as a participant in the national effort to spread democracy, economic well-being, political stability, and peace throughout the developing world. We are providing funds and we are sending some of the most qualified men in the American labor movement to serve abroad as needed, often in uncomfortable and even dangerous posts.

From whatever angle the question is considered, it is clear that we can and must provide adequate levels of foreign aid. Recognizing this, the AFL-CIO Executive Council called upon the House and Senate to "take prompt and favorable action on the President's request." We urge again that the Congress approve the requests, and, where needed, add to them.

Lesson in Alabama:

Broad Coalition Key to Progress For Negroes, Liberals in South

BY THE NEW MATH of southern politics, with Negroes in such a state as Alabama showing impressive voting strength for the first time, there had been reason to expect that Mrs. George (Lurleen) Wallace would have had to face a run-off election. To gain a majority she had to get her 51 percent from 84.5 percent of the electorate, based on the likely assumption that none of the 16.5 percent of the total vote that is Negro was hers. And that is the lowest estimate of the Negro vote, based on inflated figures which give many counties more than 100 percent of eligible whites registered. Actual voting strength of Negroes was nearer 25 percent.

That Mrs. Wallace carried far more than half of the white vote shows the appeal of her husband's brand of conservative politics. The Wallace campaign was not as overtly racist as his past pronouncements and record, a mark of the influence of the new Negro vote. But Alabamans, as they say, knew where the Wallaces stood. She (he) appealed to all whites, not merely the worst.

The Negro vote went, as expected, to Richmond Flowers. He got it mainly by asking for it, something none of the other nine candidates would do openly. It gave him second place. That victory-in-defeat helps offset somewhat the election's general encouragement of racism-as-usual in southern politics. For in the high expectations of the campaign, Negro leaders and voters were faced with a dilemma that will be common throughout the South—whether to support a man who openly identifies with them and thereby hurt his chances with white voters, or to support a covertly friendly candidate (Carl Elliott, in this case) whose chances with the whites and of winning are better.

In choosing the former course, Alabama Negroes set a precedent which will be noted by politicians and perhaps followed by Negroes of other states. The decision doomed efforts for a coalition between moderate and liberal white elements and Negroes. Labor supported Elliott, and the Johnson Administration was said to favor him—to no avail.

There were some who said the heavy vote for Wallace in the primary was meant merely to show Negroes how things stand, and that much of the segregationist vote will now go to the Republican candidate in the general election in the fall, Rep. James Martin. That seems problematic at this moment.

They voted long and hard. In Birmingham, where more Negroes (61,637) are registered than in all of the black belt, blocks-long lines lasted until nearly midnight. In white and Negro precincts very heavy turnouts were recorded across the state. In the smaller towns, where there is only one polling place, whites and Negroes stood one behind the other, well integrated to vote against or for that integration.

There was no violence of note. Not that things were friendly: At Bessemer, a steelworking town, a Negro approached a white outside the polling place and asked him politely which line he should get in. "I wouldn't tell you," the white answered.

BUT IN A STATE where racial violence and killings by whites have been frequent, on this day, at least, there appeared to be a new way of settling disputes—democracy. The segregationists won the count, but they won it in a free and open election. (The Justice Dept. with its 350 federal poll-watchers in the state seemed satisfied at the end of election day that no flagrant irregularities had occurred. However, they were studying reports of the poll-watchers for indications of scattered irregularities.)

The highest hope had been that, democracy having come for the first time in any real sense to a state like Alabama, the South would be done with its Wallaces.

The results fall short of that: democracy had not fully come—something less than half the eligible Negroes are registered; the 100-percent increase in Negro registration in less than a year had a low starting point. But as elsewhere in the South, the political calculations of men like Flowers are based as much on potential as on the new math of actual Negro voting strength.

There is no gainsaying the meaning of a victory like that of Wallace. It is that the Negro vote alone cannot save the South. Perhaps Alabama is the only state where whites are so overwhelmingly wed to the old ruinous politics. But perhaps too there will now be many more candidates willing to "do a Flowers." And they won't have to run their wives.

Morgan Says:

Lurleen Bucks Liberal Outlook Of Feminine Governors in Past

By Edward P. Morgan

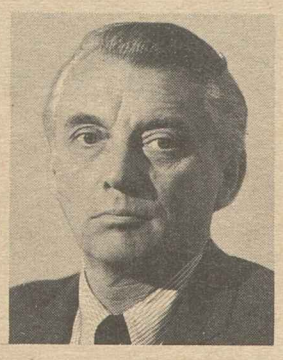
BARRING AN UPSET in November, Lurleen Wallace will become the shadow governor of Alabama.

The incumbent, her husband George, who has never exactly hidden behind her skirts, will of course run things in fact, which is the way Wallace supporters wanted it when they gave the comely Lurleen, a former dime store clerk, a clear majority in the Democratic primary, making a run-off unnecessary.



Morgan

Under the circumstances a Wallace victory in November is not likely to cause the name of the state capital, Montgomery, to be changed to Petticoat Junction, as alleged by an unsuccessful primary opponent. Still, the intriguing possibility remains that if Mrs. Wallace bests the Republican candidate, almost certain to be a Goldwaterite congressman named James Martin, she may, in keeping with the demand of the times for equal rights, including those for the female sex, decide not to let George do it after all.

The interesting fact is that the only two woman governors in American history—Nellie Tayloe Ross of Wyoming and Miriam Amanda "Ma" Ferguson of Texas—actually did a certain amount of governing and were impressive figures in their own right.

They served their first terms (Mrs. Ross didn't have a second, but Ma did) at exactly the same time, 1925 to 1927. As Franklin D. Roosevelt followed the Coolidge-Hoover era in the White House, Mrs. Ferguson, obliged to wait four years in the wings, was returned to Austin for another two-year term in the 1932 elections.

Wyoming Gov. William Bradford Ross, a Tennessean gone west, died in office in October 1924. Mrs. Ross, who got her basic training for public service as president of the Women's Club of Cheyenne, was nominated to succeed him and then elected only a matter of days later. She was defeated by a narrow margin for a second term, because, some observers said, she had been "too cautious in action." But she boldly committed herself to Democratic party work and to FDR, who raised her to national stature by appointing her the first female director of the U.S. Mint in 1933. Her name is on the cornerstone of the gold repository at Fort Knox.

Ma Ferguson (who disliked the nickname coined from her first two initials and inspiring the slogan "Me for Ma") was, by most accounts, an enormously popular governor. An aide in the office of Texas' senior U.S. senator, Ralph Yarborough, recalls that there were more visitors to the state capital during her two terms than ever before in Texas history.

The Ferguson background was explosively controversial. Her husband, Gov. James Edward Ferguson, was impeached in 1917, eight months into his second term. Instrumental in his impeachment were powerful businessmen, some of whom soon joined the Ku Klux Klan. A long siege of litigation intervened. A court ruling kept his name off the ballot in 1924 and so, wearing an undershirt, the ousted governor called a news conference and announced Mrs. Ferguson would run in his stead.

HER TWO CAMPAIGN cries were "vindictation for Jim" and abolition of the Klan in Texas. Its activities had become rampant, its power unchecked. The Fergusons, campaigning separately and together, promised that "we will take the courts out of the swamps and put them back in the courthouse where they should be." Ma beat the Klan-backed candidate substantially in the run-off. As in the rest of the South in those days, Republicans were unheard-of, so the Democratic nomination was tantamount to election.

The Fergusons managed to push through in their terms an impressive passel of progressive legislation which some intervening governors busied themselves attempting to skirt or nullify. Ma persuaded the legislature to pass a law making it a criminal offense to wear a mask in public and Yarborough avers that this was the death of KKK in Texas.

There is something of an irony in the fact that 40 years after the mild liberalism of the Fergusons, Lurleen Wallace, as the first possible heiress of the Ross-Ferguson female tradition in the state house, represents not increased liberalism but an anachronism of reaction out of the past.

Partly out of spite for the belated move for civil rights for Negroes, partly out of fear of a powerful "big government" hand reaching out from Washington allegedly to strangle sacred states' rights, a still powerful residue of white extremism swept Lurleen Wallace into the Democratic nomination for governor of Alabama.

Still, neither her feminine touch nor the grasp of her husband for continued and expanding power can squeeze the march of progress, slow and interrupted as it has been, back into the bottle.

Understanding Needed:

Myths Cloud Facts On Open Housing

OF ALL THE PROPOSALS that Pres. Johnson sent Congress in his four-part program for new civil rights legislation, probably the least understood is the one calling for elimination of racial discrimination in the sale or rental of housing.

The labor movement is on record as a strong advocate of the enactment and forceful administration of laws to outlaw all discrimination in housing on account of race, creed, color or national origin.

If we have reached the age of civilization that all people are entitled to equal rights, then housing—just as much as voting, jobs, education, etc.—is part of these rights.

Countless myths have been developed over the years about all the "problems" of having Negroes move into previously all-white neighborhoods. Practical experience in many sections of the country, plus studies and surveys, have proved these myths false.

One of the myths is that property values will drop. This is a favorite argument used by opponents of fair housing and it hits people where it hurts—in the pocketbook.

Since the early 1950s a number of studies and surveys have shown that prices are far more apt to rise or to remain stable than to decline when Negro families enter all-white areas.

Probably the most quoted and extensive study along this line was compiled by the Commission on Race & Housing, headed by Luigi Laurenti. Seven cities—San Francisco, Oakland, Philadelphia, Chicago, Detroit, Kansas City and Portland, Ore.—were researched.

More than 5,000 individual sales prices from 20 "test" neighborhoods (white) into which non-whites moved were examined. It was found that in 44 percent of the comparisons, prices rose in the integrated neighborhoods by 5 to 26 percent above those in white neighborhoods.

In 41 percent of the cases, there was no significant change. In only 15 percent did the price in the all-white neighborhoods rise higher than the desegregated neighborhoods by 5 to 9 percent.

"The entry of non-whites," Laurenti concluded, "was much more often associated with price improvements or stability than with price weakening."

WHAT HAS DEVELOPED in all these studies is that property values in any area depend upon a variety of values unrelated to race. Basically, prices fluctuate on the simple axiom of supply and demand. If white residents flood the market with more homes than the demand can take up promptly, there will likely be a temporary decline in housing values for the area.

This leads to what is known as block-busting or panic selling. Unscrupulous real estate dealers will try to give the impression that an entire neighborhood is going from white to black. In panic, many whites sell their home hurriedly, taking heavy losses. The real estate dealers then turn over a handsome profit.

Most fair housing laws are designed to protect the home-owner against block-busting and the resulting panic selling. Many fair housing groups around the country have a few members who are not as concerned about equal opportunities in housing but in protecting the market value of their homes.

Another myth about housing is that if one Negro family moves into a neighborhood, others will follow to the point that the entire neighborhood will change from all white to all Negro.

Again, history does not bear this out unless block-busting is permitted. It stands to reason that unless there are homes put up for sale on a mass basis a neighborhood cannot possibly undergo a major change.

One of the most unfair contentions is that Negro homeowners will let their property run down more than a white homeowner would. Evidence compiled by the Commission on Race & Housing showed that new non-white owners had improved the property they purchased from white residents. (PAI)

Federal Protection Urged:

Grape Strikers' Breakthrough Spurs Union Drive on Farms

UNION ORGANIZATION for farm workers is "off the ground," the AFL-CIO's chief organizer has declared in a network radio interview.

William L. Kircher, director of the federation's Dept. of Organization, cited recent union recognition victories of the Delano, Calif., grape strikers as evidence that farm workers can organize and bargain collectively.

In response to questions from reporters on Labor News Conference, Kircher listed three reasons for the improved position for farm worker unionization:

- Killing the bracero law, which permitted the importation of transient farm workers from Mexico.
- The "dramatic appeal . . . developed by the National Farm Workers Association, under the leadership of Cesar Chavez."
- The seven-year effort of the AFL-CIO's Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee that laid a solid base for the Delano drive and the recognition agreements signed with Schenley Industries Corp. and the Christian Brothers winery.

Kircher warned that new and wider strikes will be inevitable "as long as the farm worker is excluded from the same kind of federal protection that other workers have—namely, the National Labor Relations Act."

FARM WORKERS are now denied "governmental machinery for indicating their choice or desire with respect to having a collective bargaining process—of organizing themselves into unions of their own choosing," Kircher noted.

Under such conditions, employes have no collective bargaining rights unless their employers voluntarily grant them, he charged, adding that this means strikes, strife and boycotts become "inextricable parts of the procedure."

Reporters questioning him on the weekly AFL-CIO public affairs production for the Mutual radio network were Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

FTC Ad and Label Rules Give Tire Buyer Some Needed Aid

By Sidney Margolius

THE FEDERAL Trade Commission's rules for tire advertising and labeling went into effect in May. Hopefully, they may help you look for values in the early summer tire sales without being fooled by the tricks often used in the tire business.

It will pay you to shop the tire sales carefully, as tires will cost more later this year.

Tire advertising and selling for many years has been a jungle of frequent deceptive pricing and misrepresentations of performance and quality. The FTC reports that despite the Tire Advertising Guides it issued in 1958 and subsequent orders to "cease and desist" from various deceptions, questions of safety, price misrepresentation and guarantees still arise.

Better Business Bureaus also have been trying bravely to stem the near-deceptions and outright misrepresentations, sometimes to their own loss. One large tire manufacturer even discontinued its membership in the St. Louis BBB because of the bureau's criticism of advertising by the local distributor.

The FTC itself says it is convinced by its experiences that there is a need for mandatory minimum safety standards and tire grading. It believes that existing voluntary safety standards, even as recently revised, are inadequate to assure the public of safe tires.

Presently you have no way of knowing how good a "deluxe," "super deluxe," "imperial," "premium," "first" or "second line" tire really is. A manufacturer's "deluxe" tire may really be his second grade. In fact, in recent ads one of the largest national chains advertised "premium" tires for as little as $13-$19. They can call that tire "premium" under present laws, but the price makes that designation seem dubious. Real premium tires usually cost twice as much or more.

Now Congress is considering legislation which will require the secretary of commerce to set minimum safety standards and tire grades. When that system goes into effect, which may be two or three years from now, you'll be able to buy with the assurance that a tire sold as first line or premium, "Grade 1" or whatever designation are adopted, does meet at least the minimum quality for that grade.

Manufacturers are not fighting the expected minimum safety standards as much as the proposed official grade standards. They are aghast at the prospect that they may have to follow mandatory grades when no other industry is required to.

One of the major current controversies is over the two-ply tires advertised as "four-ply rating." Many new cars now come equipped with these two-ply tires. The manufacturers contend that they have stronger cords, and also tend to run cooler. But many auto owners have insisted on buying real four-ply, not just "four-ply rating," for replacement tires. One reason may be frequent complaints that tires on new cars have not lasted as long as expected. In fact, one of the largest chains now has discontinued selling two-ply tires altogether.

UNTIL TIRE advertising finally is cleaned up, we suggest watching out for these tricks when shopping for your new tires this summer:

The Odd Size Priced Low: One device is to advertise a less-frequently bought size at a very low price. For example, a big chain currently is advertising 6.50x13 tires at $12.99 in big bold type. But in smaller type the prices of the more widely bought 14 and 15-inch tires range from $17.99 to $24.99. Actually there is only $1 or $2 difference between the prices of the 13-inch tires and the larger sizes.

Perpetual Sales: Some sellers have perpetual "sales." Their "sale" prices have been found really to be their regular prices. Comparison-shopping is your only safeguard against fake tire sales.

Second Tire at Half Price: Don't take this for granted. Sometimes the combined prices of the two tires may be much the same as for two tires bought individually from other retailers.

The Warranty: Most warranties or guarantees provide for giving you a pro-rata allowance on another tire if the one you bought has failed within the terms of the warranty. The terms themselves can vary from a guarantee of so many months to a guarantee for the life of the tread, which may or may not include all road hazards. But in addition, the guarantee may provide that the exchange will be based on the higher regular retail price, not on the lower "sale" or reduced price which you may have paid. If based on the regular price, the guarantee has less value to you.

The Quality Problem: Since you cannot depend on claims of "premium," "first line," "deluxe," etc., you have to try to judge the quality itself as carefully as you can. This is difficult. But you will be able to tell more about quality after inspecting a number of tires. In general, better quality tires are heavier, have wider, flatter tread face and noticeably deeper tread grooves.

Training of Jobless Offers Hope, Help

SUPPOSE YOU have been unemployed for 26 months.
You're 35 years old, married, and the father of three children.
You can barely read, write or do simple arithmetic.
You've tried to get a job, but just can't.
How do you feel? Hopeless and helpless, that's how.
But there is hope and there is help.

This man represents the typical trainee drawn from an analysis of 11 work experience and training projects for needy unemployed launched under local public welfare auspices with federal grants authorized by the Economic Opportunity Act and administered by the Welfare Administration of the Dept. of Health, Education, & Welfare.

In releasing the study, Dr. Ellen Winston, U. S. commissioner of welfare, said: "This typical trainee must be provided with more than a new or refurbished skill. He requires help in developing good work habits and attitudes. He needs literacy instruction. And his family must have help with health, housing, family and other problems which affect his ability to profit from his training and make good on a job."

Although the study includes only 399 trainees who "graduated" from projects in nine states, Dr. Winston believes the findings are applicable to the 181 projects in 49 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands which have been launched in the past 15 months. Almost 83,000 needy unemployed with more than 250,000 dependents have been reached by these projects to date. About 6,000 of the trainees have already completed training and obtained employment.

The sample group was studied three months after it had completed training. At that time, 68 percent of the group was still employed. Of this employed group:

- Eighty percent were in jobs related to their training; their salaries averaged $258 a month (they had formerly received an average of $144 in public assistance payments).
- Fifty percent were placed by the public welfare agency, 40 percent found their own jobs, and 10 percent were placed by the state employment service.
- Fifty-three percent were employed in service trades, 15 percent in semi-skilled or skilled jobs, 10 percent in unskilled jobs, 9.5 percent in clerical and sales work, and 7 percent in jobs as technicians, craftsmen, and foremen. A variety of occupations accounted for the remainder.
- The average cost per trainee was $1,350 a year; this included living expenses for the trainee and his family as well as the cost of job training and other services.

The trainees were almost equally divided between men and women and between Negro and white, although a slightly higher proportion of the Negro than white trainees obtained employment. All families served by the projects, including those in which the wage earner had not yet found a job, gained some benefits from the program, according to Dr. Winston.

Homemakers were assigned to some of the families to teach them better housekeeping, child rearing and money-management practices. Day care for the children not only enabled mothers to take job training but also resulted in the correction of health, behavior and other problems found among the children. Counseling helped with marital, parent-child and other problems that were disrupting family life. Better housing was secured for several families. Dentures, eyeglasses, hearing aids and other health and medical services made many of the trainees more employable.

The Problems Are the Same, They Just Sound a Little Better

By Jane Goodsell

IT'S HARD TO SAY whether things are better than they used to be, but they certainly sound better. The other day I heard on a newscast that junkyards are now being called "auto disassembly areas." Now, isn't that a nicer way of looking at the problem? As a matter of fact, I guess that pretty well sums up the situation. We still have a lot of the same old problems that plagued our ancestors, but we're looking at them in a nicer way.

| Old Problem | New Problem |
|---|---|
| Nervousness | Anxiety tension |
| Dieting | Weight control program |

Right-Wing 'Saboteurs' Hit:

Los Angeles Parley Spurs Poverty Fight

Los Angeles—An appeal to trade unions to supply a corps of 50,000 members as community leaders in the fight to end poverty was issued by Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes at a conference sponsored by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

Sullivan, chairman of the Labor Advisory Council to the Office of Economic Opportunity and an AFL-CIO vice president, also called on organized labor to "goad and prod" for additional billions in funds for the war "until the last scourge of poverty is eliminated."

Sullivan recalled that appropriations for Roosevelt-inspired New Deal programs in 1934 totaled $2 billion or nearly one-third of the budget at a time when the gross national product was $65 billion.

By contrast, "if Congress is willing," he went on, anti-poverty funds for the coming year will amount to $1.75 billion or "a bit more than 1 percent of our total 1967 budget of $113 billion, and our estimated GNP will be around $730 billion."

The conference, held at a time when the Administration's anti-poverty program is under increasing attack, gave it strong support and hailed the good it has accomplished in its beginning. Speakers assailed conservative critics as compassionless "saboteurs" who want to junk the program without regard for the 35 million Americans living in need.

The greatest threat to the program, Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown (D) charged, has come from rightists "who see it as a threat to the status quo to which they cling in mindless fright."

He charged that Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.) has "done more than any other person to undermine public confidence" in the fight through repeated public statements that he could find no needy person who has benefitted from the program.

Citing Murphy's Senate votes against the poverty program and such measures as medicare, federal aid to education and rent subsidies for the poor, Brown declared:

"Mr. Murphy and his conservative Republican friends can't find the poor. They can't see the poor. They can't hear the poor. And they don't want to spend a penny helping the poor."

The governor also outlined a previously announced program to create 50,000 additional jobs in the state in conservation, flood control, fire prevention and other public areas at a cost of about $2.5 billion.

Nixon Rapped

H. H. Bookbinder, OEO assistant director, ridiculed Murphy's attacks and rapped similar onslaughts by former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon.

Taking note of the disruption of a Washington poverty conference by a group taking out their frustrations by heckling OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver, Bookbinder warned against drawing wrong conclusions.

"These people don't need better sense or better manners," he said. "They need better jobs and better education and better housing and better opportunities. That's their problem—and that means it's our problem."

Other speakers included Dr. John Morsell, assistant executive director of the NAACP, and State Labor Commissioner Sigmund Arywitz.

Labor Views Poverty Plans In Connecticut

New Haven, Conn.—A series of workshops which sought to develop specific ways unions can participate effectively in the drive against need highlighted a state conference on anti-poverty activities sponsored by the Connecticut AFL-CIO.

Miles C. Stanley, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for anti-poverty matters, described means by which union members can help local Office of Economic Opportunity projects.

Mitchell Sviridoff, former State AFL-CIO president who now doubles as director of Community Programs, Inc., the New Haven OEO agency, and as an assistant to Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York in charge of coordinating anti-poverty programs, described the contribution of organized labor to the success of the New Haven program and outlined trade unionism's historic role in obtaining social advancements.

Lindsay, in New Haven for a Yale Foundation meeting, extended greetings to the conference, which attracted about 140 representatives of 30 international unions.

Brendan Sexton, assistant to Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers, discussed what the labor movement will be doing in the next 10 years.

A FEDERAL LOAN of $3.1 million has been granted to the Cleveland AFL-CIO by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development for construction of Federation Towers, pictured in the architect's drawing above. Central Body Pres. Patrick J. O'Malley and Exec. Sec. Sebastian Lupica will break ground in summer for 278-suite apartment for elderly in Charity Hospital urban renewal area near downtown.

U.S. MARITIME FLEET has diminished alarmingly in the past two decades, Pres. Paul Hall (speaking) of the Seafarers told an advance planning briefing sponsored by the Defense Dept. and the National Security Industrial Association and held in Washington. Seated is Vice Adm. I. J. Galantin, chief of naval materiel.

U. S. Shipping Decline Laid to 'Bureaucrats'

Federal "bureaucrats" have "murdered" the U.S. maritime industry in the past two decades, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers declared.

Hall charged that failure to extend "the proper kind of government assistance" to the maritime industry has caused it to "go downhill steadily" since the end of World War II. This, he said, stands in sharp contrast to the government's "consistent support" of other industries which, as a result, are enjoying "boom times."

The SIU president leveled his charges at one in a series of advance planning briefings for industry sponsored jointly by the Defense Dept. and the National Security Industrial Association. More than 1,000 industry leaders and military officials attended the session at Washington's Sheraton-Park Hotel.

Hall said the American flag fleet, which stood at some 6,000 ships at the end of World War II, has now slipped to a mere 900. "Where we were first in terms of maritime strength," he said, "we are sixth today, with Russia close to passing us in this area."

At the war's end, he continued, the U.S. was first in shipbuilding, but is 12th among all world powers today. Twenty years ago, American-flag vessels carried 40 percent of the nation's export-import cargo; today they account for only 8.5 percent of the volume.

"In other words," Hall declared, "while the rest of the economy is going up, the maritime industry is lagging further and further behind. A basic American industry is facing extinction."

He charged that "bureaucratic inaction and ignorance" have been responsible for the decline in America's merchant marine. He pointed out that although Pres. Johnson had named a Maritime Advisory Committee—composed of industry, labor and government officials—to map a plan of action to revitalize the merchant fleet, "a group of bureaucrats formed their own interagency committee which came up with recommendations precisely contrary to those of the President's committee."

He called this a "presumptuous" action which, combined with past failures by the government, has "prevented new capital from coming into the industry, and has endangered private capital already invested in the industry."

Despite continuing official concern over the balance-of-payments problem, the SIU president said, the government has given little thought to the positive role the maritime industry can play in solving this problem.

"American-flag shipping," he said, "contributes $1 billion a year to the plus side of the balance of payments; and if the runaway flag ships were returned to U.S. control, they would add another billion to the plus side."

Pilots Urge Extension of Airport Aid

Stepped-up federal aid is needed to make airports safer, the Air Line Pilots told Congress.

The union urged a Senate Commerce subcommittee to approve legislation extending the federal airport aid program an additional five years and raising matching grants from $75 million to at least $100 million a year.

Lack of adequate safety margins have been responsible for a number of airport accidents which could have been avoided, the ALPA said.

"Corrective measures to increase takeoff and landing runway lengths, as well as safety margins surrounding the runways' ends and sides, are necessary to eliminate such accidents," the union declared.

The pilots' organization also urged the government to impose mandatory safety standards through an airport certification procedures.

New Catalogue Lists AFL-CIO Rental Films

A revised edition of "Films for Labor," the catalogue of labor movies the AFL-CIO has available for rental, has been published by the Dept. of Education's Film Division.

A special section lists the films added since the last revision of the catalogue in May 1964. Another lists those produced by AFL-CIO affiliates.

The films are indexed both by name and by subject, the latter divided into 24 categories ranging from apprentice training to union organization and administration and including something on every phase of organized labor's broad program.

Also included are suggestions for planning a film showing and instructions on ordering. Suggestions are given on posters to attract audiences.

Most of the films rent for $3 per single showing, with a few at $7.50. Some are old favorites dating back as far as 1938, others are as new as last year. A Film-of-the-Month Plan is available under which a union can sign up in advance for a total of nine films for use during a 12-month period for $15, plus $5 for each movie that usually rents for $7.50.

The new listings include "When the Day's Work Is Done," produced by the AFL-CIO to show how union members are making their communities better places to live in; the "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob," on automation, and "A New Earth," based on the life of Philip Murray, both produced by the George Meany Foundation; and "Star-Spangled Extremists," showing the tactics of the far right.

Single copies of the catalogue, AFL-CIO Publication No. 22, may be had free from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Quebec UAW Unit Wins Ontario Pay

Ste. Therese, Que.—The Auto Workers scored an important breakthrough when they raised wages to Ontario levels after a three-month strike for a first contract at the Sicard Co.—which is across the road from a new General Motors assembly plant where the UAW also seeks a first agreement.

The walkout ended with UAW Local 728, made up of about 325 workers engaged in the manufacture of heavy earthmoving equipment, gaining 65 cents an hour over three years on top of a base rate of $1.90 an hour. A contract also was secured on behalf of Local 1146 for 75 office employes who had not walked out.

AFL-CIO Trust Source Of Funds for Mortgages

Badly needed housing construction is suffering from a lack of mortgage funds created by the tight money market, says Alexander Bookstaver, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment.

"There is at this time a great need" for funds to be used to finance "socially desirable and badly needed housing in the cities and suburban areas," Bookstaver said.

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust, created to provide a medium for mortgage investment available to all AFL-CIO affiliates and qualified welfare, pension or retirement funds, can help supply some of the mortgage funds.

The trust, set up in October 1965 as a non-profit venture with four officials of the AFL-CIO acting as trustees, has currently invested about $10 million on behalf of 20 affiliated funds.

The monies are invested in federally insured or guaranteed mortgage loans in various areas of the U.S. and the construction of the properties financed by the trust are 100 percent union built.

The unpaid trustees are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther and George M. Harrison.

Yarborough Seeks Bigger GI School Aid

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) has opened a drive to liberalize the G.I. Bill of Rights which he helped move through Congress just three months ago.

The Texas senator, with strong support from the AFL-CIO, campaigned for years to give present-day veterans education and training benefits comparable to those accorded after World War II and Korea.

His bill passed the Senate in 1959, only to die in the House. The Senate again passed it in 1965. And this year, propelled by the urgency of the Viet Nam War, the House approved a somewhat pared-down version of the Yarborough bill. To assure final action, Yarborough agreed to Senate acceptance of the House version.

He is now seeking to amend the new law to raise benefits to the level of his original bill. This would include educational grants of $110 to $160 a month, as compared with $100-$150 under present law. He would also allow a month of schooling for each month of service—a 50 percent increase over present law.

The major additions are programs of on-the-job and on-the-farm training. Present law permits vocational education, but not work programs.

Urging higher allowances, Yarborough noted that the amount he proposes is the same given after Korea, even though tuition and living costs have gone up sharply since that time.

UAW Calls for 8-Point Auto Safety Program

framework of adequate and realistic federal safety standards with sufficient latitude for creative and imaginative product design."

He also said safer cars can be produced at virtually no increase in price, or at most, a minimal increase to the consumer.

Outlining an eight-point legislative program aimed at eliminating hazardous design, Reuther called for:

- Uniform minimum federal standards for safe design effectively enforced through continuing federal inspection.
- Inspection standards which also consider assembly and road-testing before delivery to the dealer.
- Encouragement by the federal government of research and development "as an important means of providing continual upgrading of federal safety standards".
- Provision for a comprehensive survey of all models and makes of automobiles in production to determine existing weaknesses due to faulty design, faulty inspection or inadequate controls, with the appropriate federal agency given power to enforce its orders for correction of defects;
- A central information pool into which can be channeled all data on auto accidents, including road conditions, driver errors and vehicle condition.
- Full public disclosure of unsafe aspects of an auto so as to avoid today's condition which sees only the dealers alerted by the manufacturers as to faults which require correction.
- A federal interstate system to insure adequate periodic, uniform safety inspection of all vehicles on a nationwide basis —so as to spot defects in new cars as well as those in aging models;
- An intensive highway safety program which would include highway construction, highway marking, traffic control and other traffic safety features aimed at reducing accidents.

Regulation Needed

"These eight areas of regulation," Reuther stated, "are broad and comprehensive and they need to be so. We cannot halt traffic deaths and injuries with just routine regulatory attention.

"As our population increases at a rapid rate and urban areas grow to encompass entire seaboards, the problems of death and mayhem by auto, as well as pollution of the atmosphere by exhaust fumes and gases, will become even more critical."

Problems of this magnitude, said Reuther, demand a gigantic national effort.

"They cannot wait for voluntarism nor for slow-moving regulatory procedures which sometimes still forcus on the problems of yesterday rather than on the challenges of today and tomorrow."

Strike Ban Affirmed In Rail Crew Dispute

U.S. District Judge Alexander Holtzoff has granted the petition of major U.S. railroads for a permanent injunction against strikes by railroad unions to restore some 25,000 jobs wiped out by a 1964 presidential arbitration board order.

In Cleveland, Pres. H. E. Gilbert said the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen will appeal the ruling, which he called "an unbelievable conglomeration of inconsistencies."

The BLF&E will also ask that the effect of the ruling be stayed while the firemen and other unions seek to get management to bargain on new contract terms, Gilbert said.

Holtzolff handed down his decision after refusing the request of the firemen to transfer the lawsuit to another court.

After hearing formal arguments on the right of operating unions to strike, the judge delivered a lengthy opinion concluding that the purpose of Congress in passing a compulsory arbitration law in 1963, and the effect of the award by a presidentially-appointed panel, "would be entirely frustrated if the railroads were required to rehire firemen whose positions have been abolished."

The BLF&E argued that the two-year arbitration award expired Mar. 31 and the work rules in force prior to the award again took effect. Holtzoff rejected this argument, saying "those positions are permanently abolished. A new status has been created, and no change may be made in that status except by agreement" or by serving notices under the Railway Labor Act.

Gilbert said the ruling amounted to "shocking disregard of past precedent and the principles of the Railway Labor Act." The decision "virtually abolishes collective bargaining" on the rails, he declared. Gilbert added:

"The judge agrees that the arbitration award has terminated and that its provisions cannot now be applied," he commented. "But in a direct reverse, he allows the attrition principle of the award to continue to wipe out jobs."

The presidential panel ruled that rail management could eliminate 90 percent of the jobs of firemen on diesel freight and yard engines by layoff, or by failing to fill jobs vacated by promotion, death or retirement. Also affected were members of the Switchmen, Conductors & Brakemen, and Railroad Trainmen.

Jackson Memorial Foundation Set Up

The Gardner Jackson Memorial Foundation has been set up by a group of friends to provide an appropriate memorial to the pioneer civil liberties leader who for decades was closely connected with the labor movement.

Those behind the move include Marquis W. Childs, newspaper columnist; Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., historian, and Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., counsel for the Auto Workers.

The foundation will provide a civil liberties room and civil liberties scholarships at Brandeis University, Waltham, Mass., a suburb of Boston, where "Pat" Jackson carried the Sacco-Vanzetti convictions to the nation in a vain attempt to overturn their conviction. Tax-exempt contributions may be sent to Childs at 3554 Edmunds St., N.W., Washington, D.C.

Labor Aide Renamed To Education Post

Providence, R. I.—Gov. John H. Chafee appointed Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO to another seven-year term on the State Board of Education and praised him for "outstanding" service as a board member since 1951.

New Climate Stressed:

Furniture Union Spurs Organizing

Milwaukee, Wis.—The need to take immediate advantage of the more favorable organizing climate developing in the South and other low-wage areas was stressed repeatedly at opening sessions of the Furniture Workers' 14th biennial convention here.

Another theme reiterated in speeches, messages and banners was the necessity of mobilizing labor's strength to re-elect a liberal majority in the November balloting for Congress.

In a sharply-worded keynote address, Pres. Morris Pizer urged the 140 delegates to make an intensified organizing effort the chief focus of their week-long deliberations. He cited record-breaking profits and acute labor shortages in the furniture industry as the reasons for the emergence of new organizing opportunities.

To provide the necessary manpower for the expansion of the union's activities, Pizer proposed the creation of a volunteer organizers' corps made up of members and unorganized workers who are prepared to devote time and energy for recruiting campaigns.

Nicholas Zonarich, organizing director for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told the convention that the tide is beginning to turn in the unions' favor. Without minimizing the great difficulties posed by employers' continuing resistance, Zonarich predicted a substantial upsurge in the number of successful Labor Board elections and negotiated first contracts. He called for deeper involvement by IUD affiliates in the combined organizing drives now being conducted in the Carolinas and other parts of the country.

Hitting the same note, the officers' report to the delegates by Pizer and Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford pointed to the union's victories in 65 out of 105 organizing campaigns in the last two years as a decided step forward. Of the close to 4,000 workers who chose to be represtened by the union, almost half were from "right-to-work" states where the furniture industry is now concentrated, the report noted.

Denouncing employer tactics of harassment and intimidation, the report declared that "labor's demands for curbing the brutal trampling of the workers' right-to-organize . . . are not pleadings for a special narrow interest." It continued:

"The larger purpose is to enable the employed victims of poverty, the working poor, to free themselves from the bondage of low wages and insecurity. If the nation's commitment to ending poverty in our affluent society is more than just fine words, the continued hobbling of the unorganized workers' efforts to share in the national prosperity cannot long be tolerated."

A revamped set of NLRB procedures was proposed by the report, one that "will strictly prohibit all management reprisals against union-minded workers, eliminate the morale-destroying delays, and provide stiff and speedy penalties for violators." Repeal of Section 14(b) and of the entire Taft-Hartley Act was urged upon Congress.

Turning to the financial position of the furniture industry, the report noted that profits after taxes last year amounted to $235 million. This represented an increase of 47 percent over 1964, compared to a rise of 19 percent in earnings for all manufacturing, it observed.

Resolutions were unanimously adopted calling for the 35-hour week to be achieved by legislation and collective bargaining, a $2 an hour minimum wage, and full cooperation with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Retail Clerks Win Vote At Big Newark Store

Newark, N. J.—Chase Department Store employes in Newark, Summit and East Orange, N. J., changed their minds about union representation after a two-year trial of promises by new management and switched to the union side.

They voted for Department Store Employes Local 21 of the Retail Clerks, 397 to 135, in a National Labor Relations Board election. That reversed their 1964 defeat of the same union, 430-262, when David P. Chase, new owner, appealed to them with the slogan: "Give the new man a chance."

This time, a spokesman for the local said, union supporters could point to the record—employes with long seniority discarded and a new scheduling system dropped, through it had worked in another big area store.

"The employes realized there was no job security unless they joined the union," said Local 21 Pres. George Meisler.

Another factor, Meisler noted, was a recent labor board decision giving unions access to the names and addresses of all workers in the bargaining unit.

Employes of three leased departments in Chase stores also will get union protection for the first time. Wohl Shoe Co. workers voted for the RCIA 17-5, with four other votes challenged. Managements of Consolidated Millinery Co. and K & R Appliances, Inc., accepted a card check showing the union had a majority of signed cards.

"This is the first time in many years that a large department store has been organized in the United States," Meisler claims.

The Chase stores formerly were owned by the S. S. Kresge chain. The main store is in Newark, with branches in East Orange and Summit.

Local 21 expects to name a negotiating committee and draw up proposals after the NLRB certifies it as the bargaining representative of Chase's 700 employes.

Trainman Awarded Medal for Heroism

The Carnegie Hero Fund Commission awarded its coveted medal and a $750 check to a railroad worker who risked his life to save a migrant farm worker.

The award went to Leo H. Murphy of Wallingford, Conn., local chairman and treasurer of Lodge 201 of the Railroad Trainmen, and a freight conductor on the New Haven.

When the 60-year-old farm worker failed to respond to the warning of the locomotive horn, Murphy leaped from the footboard of the engine, shoved the man off the track and fell on top of him.

'Work' Forces Build New Drive in States

The National Right to Work Committee has hatched a new brood of state organizations and announced plans for what it terms an "escalating war" on the union shop.

The committee hailed Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen "and his indomitable allies" who filibustered to block repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act as "freedom fighters." Now it is raising a new war chest to press for "right-to-work" laws in the 31 states which don't have them, and to fight repeal drives in the 19 states which do ban the union shop.

It listed seven new state committees set up this year—in the "free" states of Massachusetts, Delaware, West Virginia, Missouri and Montana, and in the "work" states of Iowa and North Dakota. These bring the total of state affiliates to 20, with an end-of-the-year goal of "at least 30" state organizations.

Most of the state groups are headed by businessmen and publishers long identified with anti-union attitudes, in some cases with right-wing ties.

Seeking More Money

In addition to the continuing fund-raising efforts of the national organization, state affiliates are putting on large-scale fund drives of their own. In Delaware—a state which cast only 200,000 votes in 1964—the "right-to-work" committee has a $100,000 solicitation drive under way. The state had a taste of "right-to-work" in 1947, but repealed the law two years later. Nevertheless, the executive secretary of the new state "work" committee told newsmen: "We are quite serious about making Delaware a 'right-to-work' state."

The new state organizations, wherever they could, sprinkled their lists of officers with people they identified as "wage earners."

Auto Workers Local 1070 at the North American Aviation plant in Neosho, Mo., pinned a "freeloader" label on the vice president of the Missouri Right to Work Committee.

Local Pres. Bill Horton said the man "has never joined our union but he enjoys the same privileges and benefits as our members . . . Last year we negotiated a 50-cent raise for him and his family, but he has never paid one penny of dues."

Last summer, Horton said, the UAW and North American negotiated a modified union shop which requires new hires to join the union. This was done, he said, because "nearly 90 percent of our workers belonged to the union voluntarily and were getting tired of supporting the minority of freeloaders."

The national "work" committee has held regional "seminars" in Iowa, Wyoming and Pennsylvania addressed by prominent conservatives. It also ran in its newsletter a page of what it headlined as "plaudits of nation" for its fight against 14(b) repeal.

The "plaudits" came from such groups as the National Association of Manufacturers, Associated Industries of Florida and the National Institute of Locker & Freezer Provisioners, along with such individuals as Fulton Lewis, Jr., the right-wing radio commentator, and former Congressman Fred Hartley.

TENTH ANNIVERSARY of the Canadian Labor Congress was marked at its sixth constitutional convention held in Winnipeg, Man. Presiding is Pres. Claude Jodoin, with Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald standing nearby.

Meany Sees Free, United Germany As Key to Firm Peace for Europe

Berlin—Peace cannot be on a firm foundation in Europe and the world until the German people enjoy the right of self-determination, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the congress of the German Trade Union Federation (DGB).

That foundation should be strengthened, he added, by making NATO "an ever more effective instrument of cooperation" between free Europe and the United States on the basis of equal partnership.

Meany's message was read to the delegates by Dir. Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs. He said:

Nation, DGB Lauded

"In looking back at the period that has elapsed since your last congress, you can take satisfaction in the fact that the Federal Republic, of which your great movement is an indispensable force, has made further advances as a democratic and peace-loving country with a prosperous economy. You can point with pride to your trade unions having led the German workers to new social achievements, higher living standards and better working conditions. At the same time, you have met your responsibilities to the international labor movement through your active participation in the varied activities of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

"Yet, in spite of these successes in which we rejoice with you, your congress meets under a shadow: the continued division of the German nation. You are gathered in a city divided by a Wall of Shame whose architects are in Moscow and whose menial tenders are in the Soviet Zone. The plight of Berlin demonstrates the utter ruthlessness of Communist totalitarianism.

"To the labor movement of the United States, to the American people as a whole, freedom can never be secure, if it is defended here but deserted there. The determined maintenance of West Berlin as a fortress of freedom confirms before the entire world the vital necessity of resisting and halting Communist subversion and aggression everywhere. . . .

"The most dangerous vestige of World War II is the arbitrary and cruel split of Germany into two parts. Only naked Russian military force prevents the people of the Soviet Zone from voting in free elections to join their West German brothers and sisters in a united Germany. . . .

"One of the most important developments in the international trade union movement was the post-war co-operation between German and American labor. This co-operation was highly instrumental in defeating the efforts of the World Federation of Trade Unions to infiltrate and control the free trade unions and prevent European reconstruction. Without the rejection of the WFTU by the European and American free trade unions, there would be no democratic Germany, no free Europe, no powerful DGB, and no ICFTU.

"Most recently, the WFTU and its affiliates have intensified their campaign to infiltrate and subvert the free trade union movement. The Communists wage this campaign under the pretext that they and we have common trade union goals. Their present tactics may be more devious but they are no less dangerous than their methods of yesterday. Today as in the past, there can be no common ground or common interests between the free trade unions and the state company unions of the totalitarian countries.

"We of the AFL-CIO are convinced that your most significant congress will make a very important contribution to the further progress of the German workers and that it will serve as a great source of inspiration to the working people of all lands. We are convinced that your liberations and decisions will encourage the aspirations to freedom of the working people under the yoke of dictatorship in Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, Spain and Russia as well as in the Soviet Zone.

Cooperation Stressed

"In the spirit of warmest international free trade union solidarity, it is our sincere hope that the great congress of the DGB will cement the cooperation between the German and American labor movements in order that they may be able to protect and promote their common ideals of democracy, to advance the cause of bona fide free trade unionism, to assist the rising free trade unions of the developing countries and to strengthen the ICFTU as a powerful force that helps the people of every race, color, and creed . . . to enjoy social justice, human freedom, well-being and peace."

Labor Urges Closing Of Bank Act Loophole

Organized labor urged Congress to end the banking law exemption accorded the Alfred I. duPont Estate which, it said, has led to a frustration of national labor policy and caused the three-year-old strike of the Florida East Coast Railway.

At the same time, the federation urged Congress to retain the bank law exemption for labor and agricultural organizations inasmuch as labor banks are "models for the type of banking service which should be provided in the public interest."

In a statement to a Senate Banking & Currency subcommittee, the AFL-CIO spelled out its views on three bills which would amend the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956.

"We vigorously support" legislation to eliminate the exemption giving special privileges to the Alfred I. duPont Estate of Jacksonville, Fla., "whose dominant trustee has caused the Florida East Coast Railway to frustrate and defeat the national labor policy in a dispute with the railway's employees," the statement declared.

The duPont Estate also controls 31 banks and various business and industrial enterprises.

The AFL-CIO statement said the strike, which began on Jan. 23, 1963, "was forced by the railway on its employes in face of the fact that the strikers have sought nothing more than the same pay and conditions that have long since been provided for other railroad employes."

The statement supported earlier testimony by the chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association and by the president of the Amalgamated Bank of New York.

In urging a continuation of exemptions for labor and agricultural organizations, the AFL-CIO declared that any change would have "serious impact" on labor banks which provide "outstanding banking service in the community in which they operate . . . to all residents of small means."

German-American Labor Ties Hailed

Stuttgart, Germany—A hope for stronger ties of brotherhood between the U.S. and German labor movements, "united in hatred of tyranny and in love of freedom," was expressed by Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO European economic representative, in a speech at a German-American Friendship Week meeting here.

The session was co-sponsored by the cultural section of the German Trade Union Federation (DGB) and the German Public Workers Union.

In his talk Seidman reviewed current developments in the American labor movement, with special reference to the surge of unionism among public employes. He emphasized the AFL-CIO's determination to help free trade union movements that need assistance, regardless of country, and praised the DGB for the democratic labor movement it has built in Western Germany.

Unions Urged to Cancel As Guild Strikes at BNA

The Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild called a strike against the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., major publisher of labor-management reporting services, over what the Guild called "harassment" of union members by supervisors and company refusal even to discuss a union security proposal in negotiations.

While the 110-member unit of Guild Local 35 picketed four BNA locations, the parent American Newspaper Guild asked other unions to demonstrate their support by canceling subscriptions to BNA publications and services —Daily Labor Report, Construction Labor Report, Labor Arbitration Reports and 96 others.

Some unions cancelled immediately, and messages of support for the strikers are being received at ANG headquarters.

The Guild said some 25 to 40 percent of BNA's client are federation affiliates. Pointing out that BNA's arbitration reporting service must have the approval of both parties to a case before it can be printed for distribution, the ANG urged that unions refuse such permission "as long as BNA persists in its anti-union course."

The ANG described the chief issue after six months of contract bargaining as the refusal of the privately-owned firm "to grant meaningful security—a union shop."

The company refused to grant a union shop, the ANG said, on the ground that to do so might "offend management customers." The union urged subscription cancellations to show that failure to grant full union security "offends union customers." Its messages were signed by ANG Pres. Arthur Rosenstock, Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson and Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik.

The union filed an additional charge with the National Labor Relations Board asserting that BNA unilaterally put into effect contract benefits previously agreed to and canceled union dues deductions.

The struck firm tried to maintain production with non-strikers and some 55 company supervisors.

$20 Million Voted:

Rent Program Wins New Test in House

The Administration once again beat back a conservative coalition by a thin margin to prevent scuttling of the labor-supported rent supplement program.

Republicans and conservative Democrats on the Appropriations Committee had ganged up to delete—from a $14 billion money bill—a $20 million item to help pay the rent of low-income families.

The House voted 192-188 to put the money back in the bill after a suspenseful rollcall that teetered back and forth until all the vote changes were recorded. Six Republicans—four from New York—joined 186 Democrats on the vote. Opposed were 119 Republicans and 69 Democrats.

It was the second time this year the House had faced the issue of financing the program which was authorized last fall. The initial test came in March on a supplemental appropriation bill carrying $12 million to start the program in the current fiscal year. The money was approved, 198-190, and the Senate concurred by a single-vote margin, 46-45.

But the program—chief target of a Republican attempt to use the Viet Nam war as an excuse for turning the clock back on Great Society programs — would have been stifled in its infancy if funds for the 1967 fiscal year had been denied.

Symbolic Issue

As it was, the intensity of the political battle was a reflection of its symbolism rather than the comparatively small amount of money actually involved.

The supplemental appropriation was less than half the amount the Administration had requested; the current legislation is $15 million below the budget request.

To get even this much, Housing & Urban Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver had to give assurances that nothing was further from the minds of anyone in the Administration than extending the program to persons above the poverty level—even though it was initially conceived as an aid to families with incomes too high for public housing but too low to afford adequate private housing.

As presently formulated, the program is limited to families which qualify for public housing. The $20 million appropriation, if approved by the Senate, would permit the government to contract with non-profit groups for some 34,000 modest-type apartments. Families moving into them would pay 25 percent of their income for rent; the federal government would pay the balance.

The effect would be to relieve some of the logjam on public housing. Some 500,000 families are now on waiting lists for public housing throughout the nation.

Opponents of the program played to the hilt the charge that rent subsidies were part of a scheme to integrate neighborhoods.

Rep. Paul A. Fino (R-N.Y.) charged bluntly: "The social planner cannot wait to start playing with American residential neighborhoods . . . they want to use the subsidy program as the muscle of a national open occupancy housing law."

Rep. Edward P. Boland (D-Mass.), who led the fight to restore the rent funds, retorted that "it is a program of private housing, built by private industry. . . . In the long run, it will be less costly than public housing. And it will enable families who need the help most to get out of ghettos and give them an opportunity to raise their families in decent, wholesome surroundings."

WINNER of the "Miss CWA of California" contest conducted by the state's locals of the Communications Workers was 20-year-old Josephine Randazzo, a member of Local 9572 in Ontario, Calif. Her awards included a trip to Washington, where she is seen visiting Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.) in his quarters in the Senate Office Building.

Drivers Strike N.Y. Cab Fleets In Pay Dispute

New York—Refusal of cab owners to raise drivers' commissions triggered a walkout of 18,000 driver-members of the Taxi Drivers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO.

The strike, voted by TDOC's 240-member policy committee when owners refused arbitration of the dispute over commissions, halted 6,800 cabs of company-owned fleets and put pickets before more than 80 fleet garages.

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City AFL-CIO, chairman of the organizing committee, called the strike "fully effective," with driver morale high. Owners of many of the 4,900 additional driver-owned cabs are cooperating and have named a 150-man committee to work with TDOC, Van Arsdale reported.

The TDOC began negotiations on contract terms last Feb. 2 after winning bargaining rights for drivers and mechanics at most of the city's major fleets.

The union said the average driver earns meter commissions of $58 for a five-day week, $70 for six days. Tips add $35 to $40 a week "if the driver hustles" and works 10 to 14 hours a day.

In negotiations TDOC asked that the commission rate be raised from 44 percent of meter bookings to 50 percent—an average raise per day of $1.80 for day drivers, $2 for night work. AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Michael Mann said the employers refused even to raise all commissions to 45 percent, a rate now paid by 13 fleets, according to Mann. They suggested "more productivity," meaning longer hours, he said.

Conservatives Take Most Texas Contests

The conservative machine of Texas Gov. John Connally picked up most of the chips in the state's Democratic primary, but a liberal-backed candidate for attorney general came close enough to force a runoff election.

Franklin Spears, with labor and liberal support, came out second in a race with two conservatives and will face Crawford Martin in a June 4 runoff. Connally easily won renomination and his attorney general, Waggoner Carr, handily took the nomination for the Senate. Carr will face Republican Sen. John G. Tower in November.

In New York, a wide-open race for the Democratic nomination for governor was formally joined by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., who resigned as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to announce his candidacy.

There are already two announced candidates for the Democratic nomination—Eugene H. Nickerson of suburban Nassau County and Howard J. Samuels, an upstate industrialist. In addition, New York City Council Pres. Frank D. O'Connor is considered almost certain to enter the race and New York's former mayor, Robert F. Wagner, has been mentioned. The winner will face Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R).

In the Texas congressional races, the results were mixed. In the closely contested elections, liberal Bob Eckhardt of Houston won nomination despite a last-minute bid by Mrs. Albert Thomas, the widow of the late congressman who is filling out her husband's term. Her name was not on the ballot, but her husband's was. She asked voters to pull the lever by her late husband's name.

A liberal-supported candidate, Abraham Kazen, Jr., won the congressional nomination in a new district. The more conservative candidates won in congressional races which saw Rep. Bob Casey of Houston defeat Bill Kilgarlin, Rep. Ray Roberts defeat Rep. Lindley Beckworth in a merged district, and Rep. John Dowdy defeat Martin Dies, Jr.

Despite heavy registration after the state's poll tax was invalidated early this year, the election turnout was light.

Incumbents won handily in West Virginia's primary, with most press attention going to John D. Rockefeller IV, a nephew of New York's Republican governor, who led the ticket in his political debut as a Democratic candidate for the House of Delegates.

Nebraska's primary was marked by the victory of Lt. Gov. Philip C. Sorensen, brother of the former presidential aide, for the Democratic gubernatorial election and the upset nomination of Norbert T. Tiemann, a small-town banker, for the GOP nomination. Tiemann beat Val Peterson, a former governor and Eisenhower Administration official. Incumbent Gov. Frank Morrison easily won the Democratic senatorial nomination and will face Sen. Carl T. Curtis (R) in November.

The Democratic contest for sheriff of Alabama's Dallas County—Selma is its county seat—headed for a court showdown to determine whether moderate Wilson Baker has won a first ballot victory over Sheriff James G. Clark, symbol of bitter-end segregation.

The Justice Dept. filed a suit to have Baker declared the winner, with a clear majority in a four-man race.

Clark's supporters have tried to throw out the results of six ballot boxes in predominantly Negro precincts, contending that irregularities make an accurate tally impossible. A federal court hearing has been set for May 16.

Jobless Rate for April Slides Down to 3.7%

expected on a seasonal basis, the report said, but it followed six months of "unusually rapid expansion." Non-farm jobs were up by 3 million from a year ago, the report noted, with the key area of manufacturing registering one-third of the increase.

Total employment moved up by 1.1 million from March to 73.1 million, the Labor Dept. also reported. The rise included a 400,000 pickup in farm jobs as the farm season opened.

Counted in the employment totals for April were 1.5 million non-farm workers who were on part-time though they would have preferred full-time work. These involuntary part-time workers were down by 300,000 from a year ago and at the lowest seasonally adjusted level since such figures were first collected in 1955.

The Labor Dept. also reported "a substantial pickup" in voluntary part-timers, which it attributed to an employer willingness to hire adult women and teenagers.

The total labor force reached 78.9 million in April, the report continued. This was up 1.6 million from a year ago. The increase comprised a 300,000 expansion of the armed services and a 1.3 million rise in the civilian labor force.

The factory workweek dropped as expected by 12 minutes to 41 hours and 12 minutes in April, the report also said. Overtime, seasonally adjusted, remained at 4.2 hours for the third straight month.

Average hourly earnings of factory production workers rose by 1 cent to $2.69—9 cents higher than a year ago and a new all-time high, the report said. But, with the decline in the workweek, average weekly earnings edged down by 12 cents to $110.83.

Medicare a Bitter Pill To One Group of Doctors

The American Medical Association may have accepted medicare as an accomplished fact, but there's one hard-nosed group of doctors which has vowed it will never cooperate with what it still calls "socialized medicine."

The Association of American Physicians & Surgeons, which fills the right wing medical-political spectrum, says most of its members will refuse to take part in the medicare program. But the organization's top spokesman—a Mississippi physician—acknowledges that some medicare money might find its way to AAPS members.

He said he is willing to give his patients a statement of the services that he has rendered—and the medicare program will reimburse the patient who can then pay the doctor.

The AAPS official, Dr. Curtis W. Caine, explained the distinction thusly: "I take care of my patients and I send them a bill. If they dig the money up out of the back yard, or if they rob a bank, or if they draw it out of their personal checking accounts—that's up to them. It's their moral principles that are being breached, not mine."

Romney Puts L-G Co-Author In Senate Seat

Rep. Robert P. Griffin, a conservative Republican identified with anti-labor legislation, has been appointed to complete the Senate term of the late Sen. Pat McNamara, a liberal Democrat and longtime union leader.

The appointment was made by Michigan's Republican governor, George Romney.

Griffin was already an announced candidate for the Senate seat in the November election. He bid for the GOP nomination earlier this year after McNamara announced that he would not run for a third term because of ill health.

The voting record of Griffin, the co-author of the Landrum-Griffin Act, sharply contrasts with that of McNamara.

On the scoreboard of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education, Griffin's record in Congress through 1964 was 8 Right votes to 36 Wrong votes. McNamara's record was 52 Right, with no Wrong votes.

On the tally sheet of the conservative Americans for Constitutional Action, Griffin voted 78 percent in line with conservative thinking; McNamara only 1 percent.

Meany Scores House Unit On Jobless Pay Standards

UAW Sets Salary Goal For 1967

By David L. Perlman

Long Beach, Calif.—The AFL-CIO's largest union marked its 30th anniversary with a pledge to wipe out the "historically obsolete" and "morally indefensible" hourly pay system for blue collar workers.

A resolution adopted by 2,500 delegates to the Auto Workers convention echoed the determination of Pres. Walter P. Reuther's keynote address.

In the 1967 round of bargaining with the auto industry, Reuther declared, the UAW will not sign a contract unless "it contains the guaranteed annual salary for the production and maintenance workers."

The convention noted that supplemental unemployment benefits now give hourly workers income stability "closely approaching that of salaried workers." It declared that the time has come "to eliminate entirely the distinction in method of payment between the two groups."

After its confrontation with the auto industry, Reuther indicated, the UAW will present the same demands to employers in the agricultural implement and aerospace industries.

Parity for Canada

Reuther also laid down a second major proposal which he said will be a condition for auto industry contracts—elimination of the wage differential between the United States and Canada.

It is presently 38 cents an hour, and automatic improvements in U.S. contracts will expand the gap to 41 cents next year. Giving auto manufacturers what he termed "plenty of time to search their souls" before the 1967 round of bargaining, Reuther said the UAW will insist on "the same wage for a worker doing the same job for the same corporation making the same automobile" on both sides of the border.

He told the delegates that the automobile industry can make a "tremendous" contribution towards fighting inflation by using some of its "fantastic profits" to cut car prices. He said manufacturers would still have higher earnings than most other industries even if they slashed prices by $100 to $200 a car.

The UAW entered its 20th constitutional convention with membership close to the 1.5 million mark, up 300,000 from 1964.

Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey reported that the union is in "good financial condition" with no need for a dues increase and with the strike

THE USS SAMUEL GOMPERS, destroyer tender named in honor of the founding president of the former AFL, is shown as it started down the ways at its launching at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard, Bremerton, Wash.

Christened by Granddaughter:

Navy Launches Ship Named for Gompers

Bremerton, Wash.—The name of the founder of the American Federation of Labor—Samuel Gompers—was officially affixed to the destroyer tender AD-37 in christening ceremonies here attended by officials of the trade union movement.

Mrs. Joseph Holmes of Jackson Heights, N. Y., the eldest granddaughter of Gompers, broke the traditional bottle of champagne on the bow and pronounced: "In the name of the United States, I christen thee the Samuel Gompers."

The gray, 643-foot vessel then slid slowly from its moorings into the cold waters of the Puget Sound under threatening skies that failed to dampen the impressive naval ceremony.

Upon completion scheduled for July 29, 1967, the 20,500-ton Gompers will become a vital portion of U.S. naval strength as the prototype of new destroyer support ships, the first to be constructed since World War II.

Principal speaker at the christening was Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, who declared that the Samuel Gompers will bear more than the labor leader's name: "She will have his courage—the courage of a nation's convictions."

"Gompers would want today's honors paid to one group, the men and women who have worked with their hands and their tools on this vessel and on those which have come before it from this shipyard," Wirtz said.

"This day, this ship, the name it carries, belongs to these men and women."

Recalling Gompers' own words—"God bless America's institutions; may they grow better day by day"—Wirtz said Gompers had "created one of those institutions out of a belief in human freedom"—the trade union movement.

He declared that the Gompers "will pursue an immediate purpose with a single-minded intentness. Yet, she, too, will live for a fuller cause—not for war, but for peace and freedom."

The secretary noted that during most of his life Gompers was a pacifist, but that he changed during World War I and voiced the belief "that the struggle in defense of right and freedom must ever be maintained at all hazard."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, representing the labor movement at the ceremony, recalled that two years ago during the keel-laying ceremony, Federation Pres. George Meany had expressed the hope that during the two years "not only would a ship be built, but also

Union Community Role Updated at Conference

By Eugene A. Kelly

Debt counseling and money management should be added to the list of labor's tools in the war on poverty and distress, 400 trade union delegates were advised at the 11th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

In workshop sessions spread over four days the conferees—labor's liaison workers in the fields of community health and welfare—studied the latest techniques of aiding members of unions and communities involved in debt, unemployment, strikes or natural disasters like floods, fires and earthquakes.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, urged the delegates to keep the spirit of voluntarism alive by encouraging people to help themselves and not to rely mainly on federal, state and local government agencies.

Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and also of United Community Funds & Councils of America, noted that health, welfare and recreation activities in many communities "seem to have been taken over by the Office of Economic Opportunity." Government help is welcome but it can-

Union Role Upheld Under Rights Law

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, reversing an earlier decision, has ruled that a union which bargains collectively for a group of workers may file a complaint for them charging an employer with discrimination under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Relying on an opinion by the EEOC's general counsel, the commission notified the Chemical Workers and the AFL-CIO that it has advised its compliance officers to process a charge filed by the union against management of the Planters Mfg. Co., Clarksdale, Miss.

Union Forced Issue

Earlier, the Commission had refused to process the complaint on the ground that only individuals could file charges under the law. The union then brought suit against the company in U.S. District Court at Oxford, Miss.

ICWU Pres. Walter L. Mitchell said he was "most gratified" by the EEOC action as a step toward achieving a decision by the commission and the courts on the merits of its charges of race discrimination by Planters against its employes.

The company, in responding to the union's suit, had cited the earlier EEOC opinion in contending that the union had no standing as an "aggrieved" party under the Civil Rights Act.

Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights welcomed the change in policy. It will, he said, give unions the opportunity, in keeping with an AFL-CIO recommendation, to help workers "utilize the protection of Title VII" of the Civil Rights Act to eliminate discriminatory practices by employers.

The federation's Executive Council, meeting Feb. 22 in Bal Harbour, Fla., called for strengthening the EEOC and Title VII of the Civil

Committee Bill Drops LBJ Plan

The House Ways & Means Committee has rejected Johnson Administration proposals for a major overhaul of the unemployment compensation system and has reported out a watered-down jobless pay bill without federal standards on the amount and duration of benefits.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the federation is "deeply disappointed" with the committee's action and called on the Senate to "provide realistic, meaningful federal standards."

Given the opportunity to provide "legislative safeguards" against future recessions, Meany said, the House committee "has instead provided only minimal improvements and no federal benefit standard whatever."

Terming the bill a "vehicle which the Senate can and should use to improve unemployment insurance," Meany asserted that "certainly those persons unemployed through no fault of their own should not be used as pawns by the several states in their campaigns to pirate industry from socially enlightened to socially backward areas of the nation."

The House committee action came a year after the President had recommended sweeping changes in the jobless benefit program to modernize it and establish nationwide standards and restore its role as one of the economy's built-in stabilizers.

Meany Asks Bar to Wage Bill Changes

Charging that "employers' organizations have launched a massive campaign to weaken the bill," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for passage of the minimum wage measure reported by the House Labor Committee without amendments.

He wired all AFL-CIO state and city central bodies asking them to urge House members to "support the House Labor Committee approved bill and to oppose all amendments."

The bill to increase the minimum wage and expand coverage is due for action next week.

Earlier, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote all members of the House urging rejection of amendments and pointing out that the bill is a "basic and necessary step in the war on poverty."

SIU Wins Fund To 'Cushion' Automation

San Francisco—A fund to cushion members of the Seafarers against job loss on automated ships features a four-year wage and pension-increase package won by the union's Pacific District for 6,000 members of the Sailors Union of the Pacific, the Marine Cooks & Stewards and the Marine Firemen.

The new agreement, providing increases of $25 per month in each contract year was ratified overwhelmingly at meetings of the SUP and MC&S, according to union sources. Marine Firemen were expected to vote acceptance at meetings scheduled for May 19.

Wages, Pensions Up

SUP Sec.-Treas. Morris Weisberger said 12 U.S.-flag companies agreed to raise wages over the contract term from the basic $521 a month for able seamen to $600, and to increase pension benefits from $150 a month after age 62 to $200 as of June 16, 1965, rising to $250 June 16, 1968, payable at any age after 20 years of service.

To reduce the impact of job loss, shipowners agreed that when a job is automated out of existence, they will put 50 percent of the base wage formerly paid, plus employer contributions for pensions and welfare, into a union fund. Payments continue for five years and will be held in escrow for pensions and other union benefits.

The parties also agreed that, except by mutual union-employer consent, no changes may be made in crew sizes on new or rebuilt automated ships.

INTEREST and concern of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for Viet Nam will endure until the Communists are beaten back and the people have begun to rebuild their free country, Harry Goldberg (left) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs said in accepting for Meany a citation by the U.S. Committee for Refugees. Making the presentation is Luther H. Evans, chairman of the committee's board of trustees.

Union's Role Upheld Under Civil Rights Act

Rights Act; a greater degree of compliance by local communities and people, and a "more widespread utilization" of the law.

The suit by ICWU was the first of its kind by a union under the fair employment sections of the law.

The ICWU was certified by the National Labor Relations Board a year ago as bargaining agent for 115 production and maintenance workers at Planters. It charged that in negotiations management refused to raise the wages of Negro workers, give them the same vacation benefits as white workers or include a no-discrimination clause in the contract.

The commission based its reversal of its prior position on the union's "interest in the process of collective bargaining" and because the Act defines the term "person" to include "one or more individuals, labor unions, associations etc."

It cited the opinion of EEOC Counsel Charles T. Duncan and Deputy Counsel Richard K. Berg that the Chemical Workers have a "direct and substantial personal interest" in eliminating race discrimination at Clarksdale and may be considered an "aggrieved person" under Title VII.

The opinion noted that under the National Labor Relations Act the duty of fair representation "forbids neutrality and compels the union to exert its bargaining efforts in behalf of the victims" of discrimination. They added:

"It would be a strange result . . . to hold that, though the union must seek an end to discrimination in its negotiations" and probably would violate the labor act if it accepted discriminatory terms, "nevertheless the union has no standing to press the claims of discrimination by the means and the forum—the Civil Rights Act of 1964—which Congress expressly created for resolving such disputes."

The pending ICWU lawsuit against Planters asked the court to order management to establish a job evaluation program and a rational wage structure for both Negro and white employes.

After the EEOC's initial refusal to process the union's complaint, five Planters' employes filed complaints Dec. 2, 1965, charging discrimination under Title VII. On Feb. 17, 1966, the commission notified them it was investigating the charges and that they had 30 days in which to file suit. The union then sued on behalf of its members.

Lockout Barred as Club In Unfair Practice Strike

An employer who failed to bargain with a union in good faith, locked out his workers and refused their request for reinstatement may not claim the lockout as a legitimate bargaining weapon, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The board, applying the Supreme Court's 1965 decision in the American Ship Building case to a strike by Operating Engineers Local 1, Pueblo, Colo., reaffirmed its 1963 finding that representatives of American Stores Packing Co., Acme Markets, Inc., bargained with a "hermetically sealed" mind and unlawfully refused the strikers' offer to return to work.

The five-member board in a unanimous decision declared:

"There is nothing in the American Ship Building opinion to suggest that the Supreme Court viewed the lockout as a legitimate bargaining weapon against unfair labor practice strikers or as permissible in support of unlawful bargaining demands."

The dispute came back to the board because the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Denver, first upheld the NLRB's order against the employer in March 1965 but six months later, on reconsideration, remanded the case for review in the light of the American Ship Building decision.

In that ruling, the high court held that an employer does not violate the Taft-Hartley Act when, after an impasse in negotiations, "he shuts down his plant and lays off his employes for the sole purpose of bringing economic pressure in support of his legitimate bargaining position."

That was not the case in Pueblo, the NLRB decided. Noting that the dispute grew out of negotiations for an agreement in 1962, it said the lockout followed the company's unlawful refusal to bargain from the start of negotiations and its "unlawful insistence that bargaining be limited to exclude certain mandatory and proper subjects and was not over a legitimate economic position."

It is evident, the board said, that any so-called bargaining impasse resulted "not from a good-faith disagreement over economic matters but from Respondent's refusal to negotiate in a lawful manner."

The board ruled expressly that the employes were unfair labor practice strikers, "both because the strike was caused by a breakdown of negotiations" forced by the company's insistence on limiting the scope of negotiations, and because it was aimed at forcing the firm to bargain over the union's lawful proposals.

As unfair practice strikers the employes, upon their unconditional request for re-employment, were "clearly entitled to reinstatement," the NLRB noted. It ordered backpay for the 16 strikers from Mar. 22, 1962, when they were refused reinstatement, to Apr. 9, 1962, the date they were actually reinstated.

Steel Unionist Gets School Board Seat

Chicago—John D. Carey, district staff representative for the Steelworkers, has been named to the city's Board of Education by Mayor Daley. Carey fills a vacancy caused by the resignation of Raymond Pasnick, USWA public relations director.

First Break in Strike:

Printers Win Pact In Merger Dispute

New York—Tentative agreement on terms under which union printers will be employed on three merging newspapers brought the first break in the impasse which has kept the papers shut down for nearly four weeks.

While Mayor Lindsay and Mediator David L. Cole were announcing the printers' agreement at a press conference, a spokesman for the striking Newspaper Guild warned, however, that "we're nowhere near a settlement" and cited major issues remaining between the publishers and eight other unions.

Some 400 printers face loss of their jobs when the new World Journal Tribune, Inc., starts publishing. But an improved offer of severance pay for the fired workers was reportedly the key to agreement. The last previous publisher offer was for three weeks' dismissal pay.

Pres. Bertram A. Powers of Typographical Local 6 said he was "pleased" with the tentative settlement but emphasized: "We are not going back to work until all the unions have reached an agreement."

The Guild struck Apr. 24 over new contract terms for members on the proposed morning Herald Tribune, the evening World Journal and the Sunday World Journal Tribune, successors to the morning and Sunday Herald Tribune, the afternoon and Sunday Journal American and the afternoon World-Telegram & Sun.

Just before the strike, the publishers notified the Guild that they planned to dismiss 904 of the 2,000 workers in Guild jurisdiction. Major issues in the walkout include:

- Retention of seniority rights governed by existing classifications.
- Number of workers to be retained.
- Retention of union shop provisions at least comparable to those formerly prevailing.
- Retention of retroactive pay raises, job security, severance pay and pension rights won over 32 years of Guild bargaining here.

Cole, in announcing that the publishers and ITU had come to terms, said the union and management "now are in accord on all items—that includes provisions for severance pay and other benefits."

He cautioned, however, that "there are still some difficult problems to settle with the other unions."

Contract Kept Open

Guild contracts expired more than a year ago but their terms were kept in effect from day to day as the union sought to negotiate job safeguards when the long-rumored merger was consummated.

The printers scheduled a vote May 22 on the publishers new proposal of a $1 million package—three weeks' severance pay costing $192,000; an additional five weeks' pay or $320,000 into a fund for the benefit of unemployed Local 6 members; another $194,000 for the union's welfare and pension funds; $333,000 in lieu of pay for the right to transfer type from morning to afternoon editions; and $41,000 for the use of outside typesetting tape on the Sunday edition.

Mediators Press Talks In Greyhound Bus Strike

Federal mediators brought Western Greyhound management and labor to Washington in an effort to speed settlement of a strike of nearly 6,000 bus drivers and other employes in 11 states.

Negotiations halted by the May 15 walkout were resumed at the U.S. capital by invitation of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The major unresolved issue is a proposal by members of the Amalgamated Transit Union to convert an existing annuity pension into a trusteed plan. Union members want income now "skimmed off" by insurance costs to go into benefits for employes, the ATU said.

The dispute over pensions was so intense that it overshadowed all other issues, including wages and other benefits, which must be negotiated "almost from scratch," according to a union source.

Western Greyhound Lines, a Greyhound Corp. sudsidiary, operates 1,500 buses and carries about 100,000 passengers daily in Far West states — Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wyoming and western Texas.

The union's contract with Greyhound expired Feb. 28 but drivers, office and terminal employes and ATU - represented maintenance workers continued at work on a day-to-day basis.

Under the expired contract, wages averaged about $8,000 a year for drivers, less for ticket agents and other employes, the union reported. It asks a "substantial" improvement in wages and working conditions besides a more satisfactory pension plan, negotiators said.

The parent corporation's president told a Chicago stockholders' meeting that the strike, if it is a long one, may affect profits. First quarter profits of Greyhound Corp. increased 33 percent from a year earlier, he said.

Earnings from operations last year totaled $42 million out of operating revenue of $514 million. "Nearly every division" of the firm expects this year to be better, Greyhound told a Wall Street Journal reporter.

AFL-CIO Staffer B. J. Greene Dies

Bernard J. Greene, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Purchasing & Supplies and sergeant-at-arms for meetings of the Executive Council, died at his home in Washington after an illness of several months. He was 64.

A lifelong resident of Washington, he served an apprenticeship as an engraver and became a member of the Plate Printers, Engravers & Die Stampers, and also joined Office Employes Local 2 after going to work in the accounting department of the former AFL in 1933. He was made director of purchasing and supplies in 1953 and retained the post after the AFL-CIO merger in 1955.

Surviving are his widow, Jean, and two sisters. Requiem mass was solemnized in St. Stephen's Church, and burial was in Mt. Olivet Cemetery.

Drivers End Strike:

Lindsay to Set Rate In N.Y. Taxi Dispute

New York—The Taxi Drivers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, moved closer to its goal of a contract when Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) offered a plan which ended the drivers' five-day strike against 80 fleet garages.

The committee and the garage owners accepted Lindsay's offer to set the drivers' commission rates after a look at the taxi firms' books by Price Waterhouse & Co., accountants.

The mayor set a deadline for settlement of other issues in dispute between the union and management—some form of pension plan, standard vacation periods "not based on benevolence alone," breakdown pay and life insurance (14 cabbies have been murdered at the wheel since 1960, the committee said), and raises for inside workers.

The strike of 18,000 drivers and mechanics climaxed a 20-month AFL-CIO campaign to establish this city's first permanent taxi union. Owners resisted both the organizing campaign, led by Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council, and bargaining proposals.

The union struck after contract talks bogged down. It stayed out until May 17, returning when Lindsay indicated he would settle the major issue—the commission rate.

The current rate is 44 percent of meter readings in all fleets except 13, where 45 percent is paid. The union had asked 50 percent of meter income in commissions.

Van Arsdale and AFL-CIO regional Dir. Michael Mann, who has been assisting the central body organizers, headed a committee which met with Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Board of Mediation to settle non-wage issues.

Solidarity Praised

They called the strike "a magnificent demonstration of union solidarity" and noted that union ranks had been buttressed by the support of more than 1,000 independent driver-owners.

Organized drivers have an elected policy committee of 240 members from all garages. The committee accepted the mayor's plan for ending the strike after the negotiators said it represented a step toward a contract settlement.

The TDOC started negotiations on contract terms Feb. 2 after winning bargaining rights for drivers and mechanics in two sets of elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. The vote favored the TDOC at most garages.

Beirne Named To LBJ Panel OnRetardation

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee and president of the Communications Workers, has been named by Pres. Johnson to a two-year term on the new President's Committee on Mental Retardation.

The committee is headed by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner and includes Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz and 21 members from outside the government who have some degree of familiarity with mental retardation.

Johnson, who created the committee by executive order, asked it to evaluate present programs, recommend any new national effort that might yield results, and explore the need for better coordination between activities of governments at all levels and private bodies.

Abel Scores Disruption Wrought by Plant Shifts

Long Beach, Calif.—Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel challenged the right of giant corporations "to unilaterally close down an operation, throw the people out of their jobs and take those plants out of our communities."

In speeches to conventions of the Auto Workers here and the Packinghouse Workers in Los Angeles, Abel said labor has a commitment both to its members and to the communities in which they live to fight the sudden disruption of a major plant closed down.

As to employer contentions that management has no obligation to bargain on plant shutdowns, Abel noted that not too many years ago the steel industry contended it had no obligation to bargain on pensions.

"So it might well be in the years and days to come that we will establish the right to bargain on other matters of great import," he said.

Abel committed his union to "work as we have never worked before" with its sister unions in the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. to bring "fuller benefits to all of the people."

He said the USWA has overhauled its civil rights effort, with top-level leadership and staff and a program extended "to every level of our union."

"We are of the same parents," Abel told the delegates, speaking of the organizing struggles of the thirties. "Working together, having the kind of a relationship that we have had in years gone by and will have in the days to come, your union and our union can make a greater contribution than we have made in the past."

Reuther Invited

He said the Steelworkers look forward to cementing "this new change in our relationship" at the USWA's September convention at which Reuther will speak.

Abel said the USWA will step up its participation in the joint organizing program of the Industrial Union Dept. and expand the USWA's political action program by "making a better effort than before."

In the organizing field, he said, 70 of 326 newly organized USWA locals were formed through IUD drives.

In the legislative arena, Abel spoke of the "great progress" made in social legislation and predicted that with continued "political action work on the part of labor," there will be "greater progress in the years to come."

KEYNOTE ADDRESS at the Auto Workers 20th constitutional convention in Long Beach, Calif., was delivered by Pres. Walter P. Reuther. The session coincides with the 30th anniversary of the union.

Auto Workers' Delegates Pledge Drive for 'Stability' of Salaries

fund expected to reach $60 million by 1967 auto contract expiration dates.

Delegates approved a constitutional change to add a fourth member at large to the UAW executive board—with the understanding that the post will be filled by a woman.

The UAW has 170,000 women members and Reuther told the convention the addition of a woman board member would be helpful in organizing and "good for our union."

Member Education

Delegates, some of them veterans of the sitdown strikes which launched the union and brought its first contract—a one-page document in which General Motors recognized the UAW as bargaining agent for its workers—strongly supported a resolution on initiation and orientation of new members.

Today's generation of union members, the resolution noted, "have not, for the most part, learned from their own struggles the full meaning of unionism, the reasons for the UAW's existence, the dedication and commitment that went into its birth."

More than 40 percent of UAW members have joined in the past three years, the convention was told, and 180,000 were not even born when the union was founded. The first contact of a new member with the union, it was noted, is usually when dues are deducted from his pay.

The resolution called on all UAW locals to hold combination-orientation ceremonies to which families of new members would be invited. It recommended that locals in a community consider holding joint initiation ceremonies.

In a related area, the convention changed the union's constitution to give its 200,000 retired members a continuing voice in the UAW.

A retired worker chapter will be set up in each local union, meeting at least once a month, with voluntary dues of $1 a month. The retired workers would elect a representative to serve on the local union's executive board; the local would have a representative on the retirees' board.

A system of area and regional retired workers councils will be established, culminating in an international retired workers' advisory council. Each council member will be given delegate status at UAW conventions, with one vote.

Delegates overwhelmingly rejected a proposal to elect the UAW's international officers by a membership referendum rather than by convention delegates. The change, opposed by the union's constitution committee and leadership, was rejected on a straw vote—a non-binding show of hands sometimes used by Reuther as a time-saving procedure to establish the sense of the convention.

The convention voted strong support for "realistic federal safety standards," including a requirement that all new cars be inspected and road-tested before being delivered to the sales room. It asked also that foreign-made cars imported into the United States be required to meet the same safety standards applied to American-built autos.

Resolutions adopted during the first days of the weeklong convention:

- Mandated the UAW to keep organizing "at the very top" of its agenda, with continued emphasis on the white collar drive conducted by the union's Technical, Office and Professional Dept.
- Asked stronger remedies for employer unfair labor practices. "Instead of a slap on the wrist, the remedy should hit hard at the employer's pocketbook," the union said.
- Called for continued legislative progress in a resolution which declared: "We are deeply disturbed because there are forces in Washington and in the country at large which are exploiting the strains of our involvement in the tragic conflict in Southeast Asia in order to cut back and ultimately dismantle the Great Society and the New Frontier programs which they always opposed."

The convention adopted a resolution of tribute to the late Rabbi Morris Adler of Detroit, who had headed the UAW's unique public review board since its founding in 1957, describing him as "an honest and constructive critic, a wise counselor."

It named as his successor Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. He also has been an original member of the board, which serves as an independent court of appeals for members claiming unjust treatment from their union.

Also approved by the convention were review board appointments, to fill vacancies, of Prof. Robben Wright Fleming, chancellor of the University of Wisconsin's Madison campus, and Rabbi Jacob J. Weinstein of Chicago. Fleming is president of the National Academy of Arbitrators and Rabbi Weinstein heads the Central Conference of American Rabbis.

The convention was welcomed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown, who warned that in California and many other parts of the nation "the hot flames of a new McCarthyism" threaten the economic and social gains of the Kennedy-Johnson era. Brown told the delegates that Ronald Reagan, seeking the Republican gubernatorial nomination, "has been marching up and down California describing unemployment insurance as 'a pre-paid vacation plan for free loaders.'"

Wage Exploitation Laid To U.S.-Canada Firms

Windsor, Ont.—American corporations with Canadian subsidiaries use the boundary line to exploit workers in both countries, Research Dir. Carrol Coburn of the Auto Workers told the annual conference of the Ontario Federation of Printing Trades Unions.

They pay Canadian workers less than they should, he charged, and keep down U.S. wages by threatening to take the work across the border. Coburn declared wages for such firms should be settled under international agreement.

Non-Operating Rail Unions Seek Pay Hike

Five unions representing nonoperating railroad workers served contract opening notices on 164 U. S. carriers asking wage increases of 21.5 percent effective next Jan. 1.

Railway Clerks' Pres. C. L. Dennis asked all those involved to hold initial meetings with management by June 10 and to request establishment of a joint conference committee with July 11 as the target date for the start of national negotiations.

The five-union movement involves more than 500,000 members of the Clerks and of the Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation - Communication Employes, Railroad Signalmen, and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

The unions will present evidence to support their proposals for wage hikes of 18 percent plus an annual improvement factor of 3.5 percent; more holidays, improved vacations and other benefits, a spokesman said.

Meanwhile, the Railway Clerks reached agreement with the REA Express Agency on contract improvements for 35,000 railway express workers in all 50 states and Puerto Rico. Gains include wage hikes of 25 cents an hour in three steps over a 13-month term; a wage minimum of $120 a week next May 1, and other benefits.

INFORMATIONAL picket line in Los Angeles advises shoppers not to buy fruits and wines produced and marketed by the DiGiorgio Co., spearhead of resistance to union organization of grape workers. Pickets at Ralph's Markets, 50-store chain selling S & W Fine Foods and other DiGiorgio brands, support the nationwide consumer boycott voted by National Farm Workers Association and endorsed by the AFL-CIO.

Grape Strike Appeal Stirs UAW Session

Long Beach, Calif.—The Auto Workers convention adopted a resolution by singing "Solidarity Forever" and thousands of delegates and visitors made the vast convention arena ring with the shout, "viva la huelga."

In the emotional highlight of the convention, delegates stood, cheered and wept unashamedly as some 50 veterans of the Delano grape strike marched into the hall carrying banners they bore on their 300-mile march to the state capitol at Sacramento. On the platform a group of women strikers clustered at the microphone singing their strike song in Spanish.

The strikers were as powerfully moved as the delegates. "You have given us hope, you have given us inspiration," said Larry Itliong of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee.

Cesar Chavez, head of the National Farm Workers Association, told the convention that the strike's goal is to bring the "dignity and self-respect" that the UAW has achieved for its members to the farm workers. "That is what unionism should mean to all of us," he said.

"Viva la huelga," delegates from New Jersey, Alabama and Canada shouted, struggling with and mastering the Spanish word for strike.

"As long as we have a dollar in our strike fund, they are going to have our support," Reuther told the delegates.

"Viva la huelga," the delegates shouted.

There was a resolution on the floor renewing the union's support for the grape strike and for the right of farm workers to organize and bargain collectively.

Reuther asked the delegates to indicate their support of the resolution by standing and singing "Solidarity Forever." Together the men and women from the factories and fields sang the refrain "for the union makes us strong."

Then many of them joined the picket lines at a nearby supermarket to ask consumers "Don't buy DiGiorgio products."

Upholsterers Set Up Fund for Organizing

Palm Beach, Fla.—The Upholsterers 35th convention here took action to move the union forward on the organizing, political and international fronts.

The delegates attacked the problem of organizing in the South by voting a monthly assessment of 25 cents for the next four years, which is expected to build a fund of some $700,000 over that period.

Responding to a call from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler for renewed efforts to elect liberals to Congress this year, the convention approved the report of the convention committee on political education requiring written explanations from locals that fail to collect contributions to COPE in 1966.

UIU Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann declared during discussion of the report "that the long struggles of locals to get gains are endangered" when unfriendly congressmen are elected.

"When union members staved home and did not vote in 1946, we got Taft-Hartley," he observed. "Compared to what can happen, we may consider Taft-Hartley a good law. A hostile congress can turn locals into debating societies."

Hoffmann pointed out that wages have risen from $1.75 to as high as $3 an hour in the industry because collective bargaining is guaranteed by Section 7A of the Wagner Act.

"We live by grace of 7A," he said. "Once they take that section out of the law, we will have to strike for recognition."

COPE Drive Backed

He concluded with the appeal to "go back home and do your job" in collecting COPE dollars.

At the concluding evening session of the convention, the delegates themselves voluntarily contributed $600 to COPE.

The convention voted to double Hoffmann's salary of $10,400 a year, which was set in 1948. He said he would accept half of that amount but that future presidents should receive the total proposed increase.

The seriousness with which the need for organizing was viewed was demonstrated also at the final session of the convention when UIU First Vice Pres. Al Rota said he would urge his local to give $5,000 to aid the international's organizing effort.

Rota is also secretary and business representative of Local 13, Chicago. Several other delegates said they would also seek local contributions for organizing.

A statement on foreign policy in the report of the general executive board, approved by the convention, attacked an "alliance of pacifists of both religious and socialist inspiration, liberal isolationists, the usual small but intensely egotistical and willful band of U.S. senators, and radical extremists of right and left orchestrated by a widened variety of domestic communists."

The report charged that these groups "are concentrating on the attempt to brainwash our nation of the memory of the fatal consequence to the free world of the appeasement of Hitler by Chamberlain. . . ."

A resolution on Viet Nam said that "Pres. Johnson needs all the moral support he can get to bring the South Viet Nam conflict to a successful conclusion in stopping communism."

'Rhetoric' Not Enough:

Labor Urged to Spur Anti-Poverty Action

Los Angeles—The labor movement must be an instrument of protest and social change in the slums and ghettos as well as in factories and shops, Pres. Ralph Helstein told delegates to the Packinghouse Workers convention.

In his keynote speech and in a formal report to the UPWA's 15th convention, Helstein hammered at the theme that the "unassailable rhetoric" of convention resolutions on poverty and organizing the "working poor" is not enough.

He called on the 450 delegates to identify themselves with those who most need help, not with "the establishment," and to shun the "cynicism which is so pervasive throughout society today." Helstein told his union's local leadership:

"Too many times the bugle call has blown, but we heard it only faintly; evidently because we were tired after a hard day making money at the plant, or because we had our minds on the coming weekend at the lake, or because we had our eyes glued to the tube, watching Huntley and Brinkley bring us fascinating pictures of other people making history."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to the convention, lauded the part played by the union in labor's efforts to improve workers' living standards.

"You have never been content just with progress for your own members; rather you have sought progress for all workers and for our country," Meany observed. "That, of course, is the hallmark of the American labor movement, and I am proud of it."

Civil Rights Stressed

In the area of civil rights, the tenor of the convention was summed up in a resolution declaring:

"This is no time for a slowdown in civil rights. Speed must be the watchword until the job is done. And when the last law guaranteeing equality has been passed, the job will not be done until the full resources of the federal government are put behind vigorous and unrelenting enforcement."

The convention pledged its full support to the civil rights legislation now before Congress and declared: "The best interests of all of labor are identified with the objectives of the civil rights movement. The hope of the future lies largely in this active alliance of labor with other groups and individuals in search of justice and equality."

On the same note, Rep. August F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) stressed that only a strengthened alliance of labor, the Negro community and liberals can bring about the "tremendous change" in society needed to overcome poverty.

There was one area touching on civil rights which found the delegates divided and troubled, although agreed on principle. It arose from the impact of Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act on the traditional division of jobs in meatpacking plants—where lighter jobs are usually reserved for women, heavier jobs for men, and separate seniority lists have been customary. About 20 percent of the union's members are women.

Sex Bias Examined

The Civil Rights Act barred discrimination based on sex as well as race, color, religion and national origin. When it went into effect last July, the officers' report noted, "we found ourselves heavily involved in widespread problems. Many plants in many companies had substantial numbers of women workers in layoff status because of separate seniority clauses in their contracts. The new law made such clauses illegal, and the job of integrating women into their rightful place in line with their length of service and compliance with the law is still continuing."

As a practical matter, the effort at the local level has been to designate a broad range of jobs as open to both men and women, with specified jobs reserved for either women or men because of the nature of the work.

The convention resolution pledged "full and meaningful compliance with the law . . . with full protection for the opportunity of women to secure and hold employment in accordance with seniority." It declared it the union's policy "to give realistic recognition to the special conditions of our industry and to avoid the kind of arrangements which would pay lip-service to equality but which would fail to recognize the special difficulties of women workers in our industry and, therefore, would have the practical effect of discriminating against them."

Speaking for the resolution, Helstein said the UPWA has been on record against sex discrimination "since its earliest days." He acknowledged that with the sharp cutback in jobs during the past decade through automation, "we didn't enforce our own policy" in all cases.

"The law came, and it is right," he told the convention. "What is required is that this be given time to work." If the seniority system is used properly, he said, and not as a device for "job-shopping," the merging of seniority lists is "not insoluble."

Delegates gave an ovation to AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan and had before them a series of resolutions stressing political action and urging Congress to pass labor's legislative program.

The convention condemned wage guidelines as "one-sided" and declared, "We reject out of hand any attempt to restrain labor in the name of national sacrifice without equal concern and controls being applied to management."

A proposed per capita increase was before the delegates as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

AFL-CIO Warns:

Plant Boom, Soaring Profits Raise Specter of Recession

The capital goods boom will collapse and trigger a recession unless the government acts to curb plant outlays and skyrocketing profits, the AFL-CIO has warned.

To help check the growing imbalance in the economy, the federation proposed repeal of the 7 percent tax-credit for business investment in new equipment and/or a hike in the corporate tax rate.

The nature of the present boom and its threat to social and economic progress is discussed in two articles in the May issue of the American Federationist, monthly AFL-CIO magazine.

"The Dangerous Capital Goods Boom" by Federation Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger argues that sharply rising investments in automated plants and machines, along with military spending for Viet Nam, are generating upward pressures on prices. Unless curbed, he says, the capital goods boom can bring an economic decline in the next year or two.

"The Fantastic Rise in Corporate Profits," an Economic Trends & Outlook feature prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, warns that the current economic expansion cannot continue if profits continue to rise so much faster than family buying power.

Not Inflation

In telling where the boom is and where it is not, Goldfinger declares:

"This boom in profits and business investment is not part of a general, economy-wide inflationary situation.

"There are no widespread shortages of goods, productive capacity and manpower. There is no excessive demand for goods in short supply. There is no consumer scare-buying or hoarding. There is no evidence of a widespread, sharp build-up of business inventories."

In addition, he notes, the Jan. 1 rise in social security taxes on employes will remove about $3 billion from consumer buying power this year, with another $1 billion withdrawn by a recent tax measure.

The economy still is not at full employment or near the ceiling of its productive capacity, he adds. Yet productivity is rising rapidly, along with an estimated 7 percent expansion in productive capacity this year.

"In the light of this analysis of the current economic situation," Goldfinger writes, "I view with suspicion proposals to slam on the brakes.

"The suggestion to cut or freeze government investments in human resources and needed public services, such as federal aid to education, the war on poverty and the rebuilding of metropolitan areas, would be grossly unfair and socially dangerous.

"It would be most unfair to compel the poor and the disadvantaged to bear the major burden of both the Viet Nam conflict and the capital goods boom. It would be dangerous to undermine or destroy the popular expectations aroused by the progressive social and economic legislation of the past several years.

"Tough government action to boost personal income taxes sharply and cut government expenditures could halt or reverse the welcome reduction of unemployment at the very time when the economy is at long last beginning to provide job opportunities for the poor, the disadvantaged and the unskilled, long-term unemployed."

Although the nation is suffering no general inflationary shortages, Goldfinger points out, this is the third straight year of a one-sector capital goods boom which is creating distortions and localized strains in the economy.

Business outlays for plant and equipment rose 11 percent from 1963 to 1964, he notes, or two-thirds faster than the rise of total national production. These outlays rose 15 percent the following year and are expected to rise 16 percent this year, about double the national output.

"This unbalanced trend is clearly unsustainable," he declared.

Capacity Buildup

When such large amounts of new automated plant and machinery outrace the demand for goods and services, then idle capacity builds up, he asserts.

"When idle capacity begins to increase, as in 1957—during the capital goods boom of 1955-57—businessmen begin to cut back outlays, as they did rather drastically in 1958, resulting in widespread plant shutdowns, layoffs and short workweeks."

Goldfinger suggests that the capital goods boom has been encouraged and fed by government policy. He notes that more than half the $21.7 billion in tax cuts since 1962 have gone to corporations and the top-income 15 percent of taxpayers.

The 1964 tax law which cut the corporate tax rate from 52 percent down to 48 percent had the effect of boosting corporate after-tax profits by some $3 billion, the article recalls. The 7 percent investment tax credit—which cut tax liability by 7 cents for every dollar invested in new equipment—added about $2 billion to after-tax profits. Faster depreciation write-offs added more billions.

Making a comparison, Goldfinger points out that profits rose 50 percent before taxes and 67 percent after taxes from 1960 to 1965—"about twice as fast as the 32 per cent increase in total wage and salary payments and the 33 percent rise in after-tax personal income."

In 1965 alone, he added, profits rose 15 percent before taxes and 20 percent after taxes—more than twice as fast as the 7 percent increase of total wage and salary payments and the similar rise of after-tax personal income.

"These lopsided flows of income have fed the boom of business outlays for plant and equipment that is distorting the economy," Goldfinger warns, adding:

"Current economic developments and trends require elimination of the 7 percent tax-credit subsidy for business investment in new equipment and/or an increase in corporate taxes through an excess profits tax or an increase in the corporate tax rate to curb the very sharp rise of investment in plant and equipment."

These measures would prod companies into reviewing plans to expand their capital goods outlays so rapidly, Goldfinger suggests. The postponement of some of these investments would then leave room for the expansion of essential government programs, he said.

Vice Pres. Westley Of Painters Dies

Chicago—Vice Pres. Andrew A. Westley of the Painters died while visiting a local of his union in Park Falls, Wis., and was buried after services in Our Lady of Perpetual Help church in suburban Glenview, Ill. He was 60.

Westley was a 25-year member of Local 275 here and a union staff representative from 1953 to 1962, when he became a vice president representing the union's 1st district — Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin. He was also a vice president of the Illinois AFL-CIO; secretary-treasurer of the state Conference of Painters; and a district council delegate to the Illinois Industrial Commission.

Jersey Labor Editors Hear Morgan on Press

New Brunswick, N. J.—Edward P. Morgan, radio and television newscaster, called for more digging into the news by both the public press and labor press in a talk to the 11th annual labor editors' conference at Rutgers University's Labor Education Center here.

"The public concern should be our first concern," said Morgan.

"Every government tries to manage the news, of course, but it's up to us to watch this and get around it as responsibly and penetratingly as possible."

Morgan said labor editors could be missing a great opportunity. He agreed that their job is to give labor's side of the story, which often doesn't appear in the public press, but voiced the fear that "many labor union papers have become mere house organs."

Morgan, best known for his nightly radio broadcast sponsored by the AFL-CIO, said his sponsor had never attempted to censor his comments on the news and that he would hope such freedom would extend through the labor movement, permitting free examination of the problems besetting the nation and organized labor.

His talk was the highlight of a day-long program held at the Lewis M. Herrmann Labor Education Center on the New Jersey state university campus.

Morning workshops dealt with the role of the local union editor, news that serves members, local paper production and make-up and layout.

The Local 21 Guide, publication of Local 21, Retail Clerks, edited by George Meisler, took the bulk of the top awards in the local union newspaper evaluations. It won the Herrmann trophy as the best publication and took first prizes for articles dealing with the theme of the year, regular column, reporting of a single news event, community feature and for best front page.

In the general editorial excellence category, the 1470 Journal of Local 1470, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, was the letter press winner; Knit Good News of Local 190, Ladies' Garment Workers, the photo offset winner, and 1020 Crusader of Local 1020, Postal Clerks, the mimeograph winner.

The 1470 Journal also took first place awards for best original cartoon, original photo and editorial. Knit Good News took the first award for best front page among offset papers and best feature story.

The Phoenix Flyer, Local 315, Machinists, won the top award for the best front page in the mimeograph category.

Filibuster Fallout

A STATE-BY-STATE attack on the union shop as part of an "escalating war" on the trade union movement is in the making, the aftermath of Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen's successful filibuster to block a vote on repeal of 14(b).

The National Right to Work Committee has moved in behind Dirksen and is planning to create committees in each of the 31 states that currently do not have laws barring union security clauses in freely bargained labor-management agreements.

Its objective—enactment of "right-to-work" laws in the states still free of them and prevention of repeal in the 19 states that have adopted laws limiting the freedom of collective bargaining.

Seven state "right-to-work" committees have been set up recently bringing the total to 20 and the national group hopes to have units working in all states by the end of the year.

State labor organizations face the prospect of candidates running in the 1966 elections who favor enactment of "right-to-work" laws and a full-scale legislative effort in 1967 to enact curbs on union security or set up statewide referendums on the issue.

The seed for this campaign was planted by Dirksen and his allies in the Senate when they refused to allow the Senate to vote on the House-passed bill to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. This section allows the states to adopt "right-to-work" laws. Its repeal would have done away with the possibility of this state-by-state attack on the trade union movement and the prospect of new conflict when the nation needs labor-management peace so it can get on with the job of solving its many problems.

The labor movement will turn back this new attack as it has so many in the past, an attack triggered not so much by the National Right to Work Committee but by Dirksen and his "freedom fighters."

Summer Job Challenge

IN ANOTHER MONTH or so the nation will face the prospect of almost 2 million youngsters, 16 through 21 years old, coming into the job market in search of work both on a full-time basis and for the summer period.

The summer of 1966 poses a real challenge to the nation's economy to provide the work-training that will permit half of these youngsters to begin careers and the rest to help finance their continuing education.

While the economy is presently running at relatively full steam and the jobless rate has slipped to 3.7 percent, the need to develop job opportunities this summer is nevertheless acute.

Last summer the President's Youth Opportunity Campaign produced more than one million jobs for the 16-21 year-olds. This year the AFL-CIO has renewed its pledge to the President to support the program and increase the number of job opportunities, especially for the disadvantaged.

With labor, management and the government cooperating there is new hope that the summer of 1966 will find our youth gainfully and usefully employed for their own benefit and for the benefit of the nation.

Bring in the 'Leftouts'

Wirtz Reports on 1965:

Manpower Training Progress Points Up the Job Still Undone

THE DEPT. OF LABOR has published a 216-page report on its 1965 record in administering the Manpower Development & Training Act.

During the year the program:

- Enrolled 180,000 trainees, of whom 110,000 completed training. Of those who completed training, 74 percent are employed.
- Reduced manpower and production bottlenecks carrying an inflationary potential through training for skilled and semi-skilled occupations.
- Helped to meet labor demand for 112,000 jobs in service and service-related occupations.
- Helped 1,200 unemployed workers with few prospects for jobs in their home towns to move with their families to jobs elsewhere.
- Initiated special measures to help city workers with little education or skills to train for jobs they were capable of handling.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz drew a number of conclusions based on his four years' experience with the program. He noted that more labor organizations have begun to support on-the-job training.

"Joint labor-management and labor-sponsored on-the-job training projects covered nearly 6,000 trainees enrolling in apprentice-entry and retraining or upgrading programs," he said. "These programs were sponsored by 24 different labor organizations and joint labor-management groups in 28 states."

He cited such projects as 400 journeyman operating engineers and 120 carpenters in California who are being upgraded in new skills in their trades; 3,000 barbers and hairdressers throughout the country who are learning new techniques to qualify for better-paying jobs; apprenticeship-entry bricklayer training programs for 300 men in Georgia and 160 in the District of Columbia in addition to another apprenticeship-entry program for 300 hotel service workers in Nevada.

With jobs the goal of all these programs, Wirtz had this to say:

"Chances of finding a job were best of those who were in the prime age group, had a high-school education, or were being trained for semi-professional or technical jobs."

At the same time he claimed that progress is being made in occupational training for the "hard-to-place" worker with little education and no skills.

Although the total number of both white and Negro trainees doubled during 1965, Wirtz admitted disappointment that a larger proportion of Negroes is not being trained in the on-the-job program and expressed the hope that more could be done in this direction.

ONE OF the little known but important activities of the manpower program is the research being done in the field of matching men to jobs. Occupational testing, a study of available jobs and what qualifications are needed to fill them, and what can be done to bring jobs and men together are all devices that the program is seeking to use.

Another little known phase of the training program is what can be done to help released prisoners get training in needed skills and to find jobs when they enter civil life again. The report points out that "most of the prison population is poorly educated" and lacking in skills that can produce self-respecting jobs, and that many of the serious crimes are committed by ex-prisoners. Wirtz thinks more job training is needed for such men if they are to be restored to society.

Another crucial field is that of community involvement in training programs. Wirtz reported that during 1965 more than 40 labor and management meetings or conventions heard representatives of the training program outline the work that is being done and what is needed in the future. Among groups mentioned were the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show and various state union conventions.

All in all, the report shows progress on a number of fronts, but what is most startling is the immense job that is still undone. The report concedes this, saying:

"Despite our progress in 1965, much remains to be done. MDTA training has not yet fully reached the educationally disadvantaged and the older worker. New methods and institutional arrangements for dealing with these hard-core unemployed workers must be tested." (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Controversy Over Poverty War Blots Out Promise of Programs

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

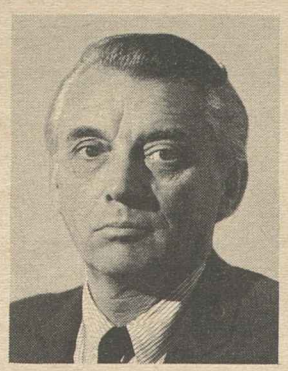
AT HOME the war on poverty is not being won. The tortured fact is that it could be, on the basis of progress in individual battles.

But such a storm of controversy has been dusted up over various aspects of the strategy and tactics pursued by the Office of Economic Opportunity it is hard to see the promise of individual projects.



Morgan

OEO, Sargent Shriver's headquarters in the struggle to liberate the poor, has been sniped at unfairly, but it has invited the fire of criticism on at least two major points.

Anti-poverty planners failed to realize that the bold Peace Corps philosophy of cutting through red tape and by-passing "channels," successful as it has been abroad, can't be applied without major alteration at home. A congressman doesn't have any voters in Nigeria but when something important happens in his own constituency he expects to be in on it.

Commendable as the concept is of giving the poor, at long last, a say in their own fate, politicians from city hall to Capitol Hill interpreted it as an attempt to by-pass the "establishment." So the first skirmishes were fought not against poverty but over power, with the poor, as it were, as pawns. In some cities major readjustments in relationships and lines of command have had to be made.

The OEO's second big error was a paradoxical one. When facing Congress and the general public the OEO, like the Pentagon, has been more inclined to talk in terms of statistics than in terms of human beings. Part of this is unavoidable. Congress passes budgets and budget requests must be supported by facts and figures. The irony is that some of the most stirring accomplishments of Shriver's army can't be measured by an IBM machine.

How do you computerize the emotional depths of human experience? Things are happening to people that go beyond statistical measure. Take, for instance, the 2,000 girls from 16 to 22 recruited for eight centers in the Job Corps. A ninth is about to open in Albuquerque, N. M. The brilliant woman in charge of these centers as associate director of the Corps is Dr. Bennetta B. Washington, a former counselor at New York University and an expert in education of disadvantaged youths, male and female.

Dr. Washington stunned an informal gathering of government officials by reporting that a simple physical examination sometimes induces an almost traumatic shock in girl volunteers.

The reason is simple: Many of them have never had such an experience before and they feel threatened. They anticipate it fearfully in terms of their sexual experiences, which have usually been thorough and brutal.

But these human goods that society has damaged show amazing recuperative powers. There is a Job Corps center at Poland Spring, Me. The recruits include white, Negro, American Indian and Spanish-speaking Puerto Rican girls. Already their horizons are wider than a dead-end street. This summer one will be a teletypist for the FBI, another a draftsman's assistant in Iowa, a third a receptionist at the new Albuquerque center, and so on.

THE OTHER evening they had a social gathering in a room with a fire crackling in the stone fire place, rugs on the floor, a bright cozy place in the Maine woods. The girls were asked if they wanted to say anything about their experiences. One 17-year-old stood up. She had scarcely been out of her native Alabama town before her first plane ride to Maine.

"Thank you, Dr. Washington," she chirped, "for letting me come home at last." That was all she said.

The women's Job Corps center's running quarrel with the city of St. Petersburg, Fla., was climaxed in headlines when shrill local protests forced it to move. But it was not news when a new arrival was issued two clean sheets and a bedspread at the St. Petersburg center not long ago and she asked, "What do I do with three covers?"

It was almost news when an irate senior citizen of St. Petersburg complained that two girls had "accosted" him on the street. But it was gently explained to him by a member of the center's staff that the girls' greeting of "good evening, sir," was part of their training in politeness.

One is almost tempted to observe that in St. Petersburg and elsewhere politeness is, or should be, a two-way street. A bigger point is the fact that there are at least half a million girls in the U.S. who should be getting Job Corps or similar opportunity.

Some citizens, like Congresswoman Edith Green (D.-Ore.), fume that the current 2,000-girl total is barely scratching the surface. That's true. It's better than nothing. But if the effort is not expanded, the scratches on the face of the American society will leave deep, permanent scars.

Restrictions Urged:

$1 Billion in Payments Deficit Charged to Runaway Ship Use

AMERICA'S BALANCE of payments deficit could be cut $1 billion a year by banning runaway-flag ships, a top maritime union official has said.

Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. cited lack of restrictions against U.S. ship owners sailing their vessels under foreign flags as "one of the great weaknesses" in this country's international trade.

"If such vessels were under the American flag, as they should properly be, there would be an additional $1 billion on the plus side of our balance of payments," said Hall, president of the Seafarers and an AFL-CIO vice president, on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Discussing maritime safety problems, he said Congress may very well bar from American ports foreign-flag ships that fail to meet standards set for U.S. vessels.

"There is considerable feeling on this matter in the Congress," Hall said, adding that he sees "indications" legislation may be the outcome.

He declared that although "the State Dept. would not, of necessity, like or approve" such restrictions, there is a pressing need for greater protection of Americans sailing as passengers on foreign vessels calling at U.S. ports.

HE SAID there has been "no consistent campaign or activity" by federal administrative agencies to up-grade safety conditions aboard foreign ships such as the Yarmouth Castle and Viking Princess, which burned at sea in recent marine disasters.

In case of a disaster, they may make a statement or "they may go through the motions of hurried examination," but that is all, Hall said.

Questioning Hall on Labor News Conference, a weekly AFL-CIO public affairs program on the Mutual Radio Network, were Helen Delich Bentley, marine editor of the Baltimore Sun, and Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

BARRY GOLDWATER, the 1964 Republican presidential disaster, emerged speaking very boldly the past few days, saying that the Republican convention of 1968 would be pretty much like that of 1964 and telling a fund-raising dinner of his Free Society Association that "conservatives of all political parties" must rise to salvage freedom from Great Society programs.

On the Goldwater prediction about the 1968 GOP convention, Sen. Hugh Scott publicly muttered, in effect, "God forbid. I wouldn't want to live through that nightmare again." The Goldwaterite wing, as a matter of fact, fell on its face when it tried to assert power in the Pennsylvania Republican primary on May 17.

A right-winger, former Rep. John L. Lafore, tried to win back his seat from incumbent Rep. Richard S. Schweiker in rich, solidly Republican Montgomery County. Schweiker is no GOP rubber-stamp for Great Society measures, but he voted last year for repeal of Section 14(b), and powerful Republican interests turned against him.

One of the imported campaign orators was Donald (Buz) Luken, the Goldwaterite national chairman of the Young Republicans in 1964, who had won himself a House nomination in Ohio earlier this month.

But the GOP forces led by Scott and Gov. William W. Scranton were stronger. Schweiker beat Lafore handily and the state organization successfully got a dead man, Walter E. Alessandroni, a close Scranton aide killed in a campaign plane crash, nominated for lieutenant governor over Blair Gunther, a Goldwater supporter. The state Republican committee will name Alessandroni's replacement on the November ballot.

The Scranton organization's choice for governor, Lt. Gov. Raymond P. Shafer, is rated as somewhat less broad than Scranton himself or Scott, but he didn't have anyone to beat in the primary except Harold E. Stassen, which he did with ease. Those who don't care for Shafer can vote for Milton Shapp, the Democratic nominee for governor, who campaigned uproariously against "bossism" and won the primary from State Sen. Robert P. Casey, the organization candidate.

GOLDWATER'S undiminished faith in "conservatism" isn't crushed, of course. In New York, splinter-group dissidents presumably will run a third-party Conservative Party candidate for governor, as they did in 1962. That didn't defeat Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller's re-election bid that year, and maybe it won't this year. But the objective of the self-described conservatives is always clear. They don't care if Republicans lose; they want to get their own hands on the levers of party power.

In the South, conservatism works in different ways in the two parties. Alabama and Georgia Goldwater-type Republicans will run for governor, and former vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon is cultivating relationships with the Goldwater delegates of 1964.

In Florida, Gov. Haydon Burns is going into a Democratic runoff primary with Mayor Robert King High of Miami, who has liberal and Negro backing. Burns as mayor of Jacksonville had a non-distinguished record in handling civil rights demonstrations but before the first primary began speaking rather broadly in acknowledgement of the heavily increased Negro registration.

Now he has his eyes on Alabama, where Mrs. Lurleen Wallace proved what could be done by appealing to white segregationists for support against what is still a Negro minority.

Virginia presents a more curious case still. The splinter-group Conservative Party there is strictly a right-wing Democratic offshoot. Its leaders are urging that third-party candidates be fielded in November and that "conservatives" stay out of the July Democratic primary in which both incumbent Sen. A. Willis Robertson and "young" Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., face the toughest challenge in years to the dying Byrd machine.

The conservatives have withdrawn support even from Rep. Watkins N. Abbitt, one of the most faithful powers in the ancient Republican-Dixiecrat coalition, and he too is facing a Conservative third-party challenge if he wins renomination as a Democrat.

CURBS on runaway-flag ships could cut America's balance of payments deficit by $1 billion a year, Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. (center) told Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and Helen Bentley of the Baltimore Sun on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO public affairs interview on the Mutual radio network.

How to Buy:

Clothing, Appliance Sales Offer Money-Saving Bargains in June

JUNE IS THE MONTH to take advantage of the first sales of summer clothing and piece goods with further reductions due just before and after July 4.

This also is the month stores offer reductions on washing machines and dryers, and clear this year's television models at cut prices.

Because of big inventories and a slowdown in sales, auto dealers are offering bigger discounts on new cars. Used cars also take a traditional price cut after July 4. And this is the time to fill up on fuel as dealers offer discounts for summer delivery.

Food prices—one force behind this year's jump in living costs—have receded a little but will go up again when hot weather arrives, with no real relief from high meat prices until late this fall.

The prices you pay for necessities already are 3 percent above a year ago. That means a typical family now pays about $200 more a year for the same goods and services. Certainly labor can't be blamed for this latest round of inflation, the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis notes, pointing out that prices have been going up faster than labor costs.

One factor pushing up prices is the currently higher interest rates, which have increased credit costs of both businessmen and ordinary families. The FRB raised interest rates but continued to make lending funds available. So the result has been only to raise prices without curbing inflation.

The most frightening phenomenon is that families are still going into debt heavily for installment purchases, even though this is the worst time in years to incur debts because of the higher finance charges many lenders now require.

Here are tips on current buying opportunities:

Washing Machines: Prices are reasonable with many two-speed automatic models available under $200. The lowest-price washers usually have only one speed but provide two cycles, one for regular and one for more fragile fabrics. Medium-price washers usually have two speeds, one for "gentle" washing and a three-cycle timer. But the highest-price or "deluxe" washers are basically just the medium-price models with a few additions such as greater variation in temperature, speed and washing cycle.

Among desirable features are cutoff switches in case of an unbalanced load, and a safety switch if the lid is lifted, especially desirable if there are small children around. Make sure the filter is easily accessible if it is not the self-cleaning type. Large capacity is desirable, since clothes always wash cleaner if the tub is loaded two or three pounds below capacity. Underloading also helps protect the motor from burning out.

Men's Suits: Men's suits cost more this year. Sales and clearances of summer-weight suits start late in June, offering 20 percent and more off early-season prices. For a man or boy who wears a suit or sports jacket only for dress-up occasions, the lower-price blends of rayon with polyester (Dacron, Fortrel, etc.), offer relatively good crease-resistance and wear.

But for regular and hard use, the preferred blend is polyester and worsted, which holds its shape better than the rayon blends. Moreover, you can find the polyester-worsted blend in suits of moderate-quality construction.

Look for a lapel that rolls a little and springs back into shape when you crush it (indicates hand tailoring). Note whether the horizontal grain of the fabric is truly horizontal across the shoulders, and the vertical grain follows the crease in the trousers, and whether the sleeves hang straight with the lengthwise yarns vertical. Beware any signs of puckering at seams; see if pattern is matched at seams. Inspect pockets closely to see if made of closely-woven material and cut generously.

Food Buying Calendar: June is the flush season for milk and cheese products, with prices lowest of the year. Both milk itself and cheddar cheese are high in protein value for their cost, and can be used in many dinner dishes, including soups and desserts, to supplement the reduced portions of meat many families now have to serve because of high prices and reduced supplies.

Eggs are still relatively reasonable and are another important supplement for scarce meat. Other high protein buys include canned salmon and tuna fish. Both broilers and turkeys are in good supply —about 10 percent above last year—with prices reasonable. In red meats, beef is in better supply than pork. Look for relatively reasonable prices on beef cuts that need stewing or simmering, as cuts that can be broiled are in demand during the hot months with prices high.

Copyright 1966 by Sidney Margolius

PEN USED to sign bill carrying funds to start the rent supplement and Teacher Corps programs is presented by Pres. Johnson to AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller at a White House ceremony. Labor strongly supported appropriations for the two new programs. Still pending is legislation to finance them during the next fiscal year.

There's a Time for All Things If You Can Only Figure It Out

By Jane Goodsell

WHEN YOU WAKE UP wide awake, fresh as a daisy and full of drive and ambition to get things done, it is 6 a.m. and it's Sunday.

When you wake up limp, listless and half asleep, it is 7:55 on a Monday morning, and you have an 8:30 appointment.

When the last guest arrives for a 7 o'clock dinner party, it was time to serve the roast beef half an hour ago.

When the last game of the World Series is tied 7-7 with all the bases loaded, it is time for the picture tube to burn out.

When your child has an unidentifiable rash and a fever of 102.4, it's 3 a.m. and the doctor is vacationing in Hawaii.

When the party suddenly perks up and starts to fizz, it's time to leave because your baby sitter has to be home by 12:30.

When, after sitting through a 15-minute intermission, 10 minutes of Coming Attractions and an interminable interlude of screen credits and you are just settling back to watch the movie you came to see, it's time for Junior to announce that he has to be taken to the bathroom.

When the nurse ushers you into the doctor's office for your 10:30 appointment, you are already six minutes late for your 12:00 o'clock lunch date.

WHEN YOU reach the punchline of a long and complicated story, it is time for (a) the telephone to ring; (b) somebody to upset a glass of water; (c) a birthday cake to be brought to the table.

When you arrive at the hospital after a frantic midnight ride to beat the stork, it is time for all symptoms pointing to the stork's imminent arrival to vanish.

When you reach the climax of your whodunit and the detective is about to reveal the identity of the psychopathic fiend who has terrorized the quiet English village, it is time for your next-door neighbors to drop in.

When you get to your car, red-faced and panting after tearing four blocks to make it before the No-Parking from 4-6 ordinance goes into effect, it is 4:01:30 and a policeman is just tucking a ticket onto your windshield.

Institutes Help Solve Time Study 'Puzzle'

FEW THINGS have aggravated and puzzled working men and women more than attempts by management to "measure" work, set work standards and evaluate jobs.

Historic opposition to time study, standard data, predetermined motion time systems and job evaluation was expressed in union constitutions. Today, resolutions expressing union concern in these areas are adopted at conventions of the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions.

A few unions, because of the nature of their particular industry, have made attempts to accommodate to these devices, but the threat and actuality of the "stretchout" and the "speedup" have placed many unions in a position of continued opposition in principle and, where possible, in practice. Union representatives and members also have found that, as they gain competence in dealing with the collective bargaining implications of the more routine systems, management has moved to the more complex, creating a constant problem of keeping up-to-date on new developments.

The AFL-CIO Union Industrial Engineering Institutes are designed to meet the needs of union representatives confronted with problems related to collective bargaining, contract administration and organizing in situations where "work measurement," wage incentives and job evaluation exist or are proposed by management.

Under the joint sponsorship of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the University of Wisconsin School for Workers, full-time union representatives have been attending the Union Industrial Engineering Institutes since the summer of 1958. This summer's institutes in Madison, Wisconsin, will mark nine consecutive years of this service to the labor movement.

The primary function of the institutes is to provide answers to such questions as these: Why is the use of the continuous watch so important in time study? Where do sampling concepts have an application in determining the length of a time study? How can the use of percentages in calculating allowances deprive workers of expected non-productive time? In what way can the union representative raise intelligent questions with regard to the neatly arranged package of evaluated jobs presented by an employer? How can an unworkable point-evaluation plan be challenged?

EVALUATION OF THE INSTITUTES by the union representatives who underwent training brought these gratifying responses to open-ended questions:

- "Now I am not dealing with unknowns. I am better able to protect the membership from unfair workloads, know how to handle grievances better and what to go after in contract language."
- "This training has enabled me to better understand our system of job evaluation, help our stewards understand it, give more intelligent discussions and arguments in grievances pertaining to job evaluation and provided a basic knowledge of what contract language our locals should strive for."
- "We anticipate the companies' moves. As they explain and sell new policies, we are well ahead on what they are and we know what we can expect."
- "We are using the knowledge acquired at Madison to plan and teach a series of conferences for our own unions on work measurement and job evaluation."
- "I have met and held my own with trained industrial engineers from three large companies."

Navy Launches Ship Named for Gompers

that America would become stronger in other ways."

Likening the new ship to the nation, Schnitzler said "a structure has been created, but the great years are still in the future."

He, too, reminded the audience of 400 that Gompers was a man of peace. "Samuel Gompers knew that to remain at peace—and to insure American freedom — the nation must be strong," he continued. "The AFL-CIO holds that same conviction. . . .

"We do not despair of peace. . . . We do not despair because America is strong—not only in a military sense, but strong where it counts even more, in the fabric of American society. And that strength is growing day by day."

To labor and America, Schnitzler said, "this fine ship is not only an addition to our Navy, to our military establishment; it symbolizes the total strength of a free society, and the cause of freedom which one day will prevail throughout the world."

Rear Adm. Floyd B. Schultz, commander of the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard, cited the "pride in workmanship" on the part of both labor and management at the Navy's huge shipyard that built the U.S.S. Samuel Gompers.

When completed the Gompers will furnish facilities for the repair and support of destroyer-type ships, missile systems, anti-submarine weapons systems, and advanced communication and electronics systems. It will have a complement of 135 officers and 1671 men and will contain a large dispensary and hospital for other ships of the fleet.

A geared turbine with a single screw will power it to a top speed in excess of 18 knots.

6 Union Heads

Joining Schnitzler in the official party representing the AFL-CIO were Pres. Daniel E. Conway of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, Pres. Frank Raftery of the Painters, Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes, Pres. Russell M. Stephens of the Technical Engineers, Pres. William E. Fredenberger of the Firemen & Oilers.

Others present at the christening ceremonies included John F. Henning, under secretary of labor; Charles F. Baird, assistant secretary of the Navy; Jack Moskowitz, deputy assistant secretary of defense; Richard A. Beaumont, deputy under secretary of the Navy.

Also seated on the platform were Rep. Floyd Hicks (D., Wash.), whose district comprises the shipyard, and Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.), a member of the House Education & Labor Committee.

Exploitation of Consumer Hit By Margolius

Toronto, Ont.—Consumers are being exploited more widely than ever before, Sidney Margolius, consumer expert whose column appears in the AFL-CIO News, told a dinner meeting arranged by the National Labor-Cooperative Committee.

TV toy advertisers exploit children, disc jockeys exploit teenagers and high-interest credit sellers exploit adults—all involving "a massive waste of family money," Margolius charged.

Margolius pointed out that the worker in both Canada and the United States is a better credit risk than ever before because he is earning more money. Consequently he has become a target for high pressure salesmanship, but "he doesn't have the financial sophistication to go with his improved ability to buy," Margolius added.

"Milk is no longer just milk," he said. "It's irradiated, homogenized, vitamin-fortified, and you're afraid not to buy it even at a premium price because you might be short-changing your children.

"Soap is no longer just soap. It has become a mysterious product that can affect your health and social standing, let alone your love life."

Margolius noted that Canadian workers are falling behind in their fight to stay abreast of the cost of living. Comparative surveys he made in 1949, 1952 and 1965, he said, show that the spread between standards in the U.S. and Canada have widened largely because the cost of living has gone up faster in Canada. But in neither country, he added, can the worker "really afford an adequate standard of living."

TRADITIONAL CHAMPAGNE was smashed against the prow of the USS Samuel Gompers as Mrs. Joseph Holmes, Jackson Heights, N. Y., christened it in honor of her grandfather. The 643-foot destroyer tender was launched at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard, Bremerton, Wash.

Labor-Backed Co-op Starts Work On Vast New Housing Complex

New York—Ground for Co-op City, which will be the world's largest cooperative housing project when it is finished in 1970, was broken on a 300-acre site in the Bronx in the same neighborhood where AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany used to play sandlot baseball as a boy.

"What impresses me most," he said in a recorded message heard at the ceremonies, "is that only 13 percent of those 300 acres will be covered by the housing itself. The other 87 percent will be open space. There will even be space for sandlot baseball players."

The project will cost about $286.7 million and will provide homes for 15,500 families in 35 high-rise buildings of 24, 26 and 33 stories and 236 three-story town houses.

It is sponsored by the labor-backed United Housing Foundation, of which Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers is president, and is financed by a 40-year New York State Housing Finance Agency mortgage of $250.9 million. The City of New York has granted a partial tax abatement of 50 percent for 30 years.

The cooperators are expected to supply about $32.8 million in equity investments at a rate of $450 a room. Carrying charges are estimated at $23 per room per month plus utilities.

3 Shopping Centers

The development will have the world's largest air conditioning system and its own power plant to supply heat and hot water. It will have three shopping and community centers with cooperative supermarkets, drug stores and other enterprises.

Eight six-floor parking garages will provide space for 10,850 cars at a monthly rental of $17.50, while six schools will be built by the city to accommodate an estimated 10,000 children—three schools for children from kindergarten through the fourth grade to be located in different parts of the project, and the city's first "education park," with two 1,800-pupil schools for children in grades 5 through 8 and a 4,000-pupil high school.

No through traffic will be permitted in Co-op City. The development is bounded on one side by the Hutchinson River, along which there will be recreation facilities, a picnic area and a promenade, with a sailing marina a later possibility.

Meany in his message pointed out that the venture will have a "healthy impact" on the area's economy as well as provide needed housing.

"It will provide thousands of jobs," he said, "construction jobs, of course, but also jobs for those who manufacture building materials; for the carpet workers and the appliance workers and all the others involved with household supplies.

"And as the wages earned by these workers are spent, still other jobs will be created. So what you are creating here is not just a $286 million project. You are creating an economic force that will be many times that size."

Potofsky recalled that the ACWA has had 40 years' experience with cooperative housing in the New York City area.

"We have proved that intelligent cooperation can succeed in making life richer and fuller, richer materially and fuller spiritually," he said. "But cooperation must not remain a word in a dictionary—it must be pursued actively and continually."

In a development such as Co-op City, he declared, "cooperation is grass-roots democrary at work," with families representing all races, creeds and colors using the same schools, the same stores and the same churches.

"Peace and good will should be their touchstones," he added.

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, calling the project "a sign of our confidence in the future," also described it as "a towering tribute to the demonstrated success of cooperative housing." The state's mortgage loan—representing nearly 30 percent of the funds committed to date—he said is "a completely sound investment in the future."

"This project buttresses the foundations of our society—for good housing strengthens family life as bad housing breeds social ill," he declared. "Co-op City is, in truth, a mighty spurt toward a better future. Let us dedicate this great project to that future —and to better lives for the people of this great city."

NLRB Aide Overrules GE on Strike Collection

General Electric Co. infringed on the rights of employes when it refused to let their union collect strike donations at plant parking lot entrances at Appliance Park, Ky., a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has ruled.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers charged last year that managers of the GE plant near Louisville refused to let them take up a collection on non-working time at the walkways between the parking lots and plant buildings.

The collection was for members of IUE Local 191, on strike at a GE transformer plant in Rome, Ga. Management of the Appliance Park plant invoked an unwritten rule against plant collections, saying, in the words of the company labor relations manager, that the union "must think they were crazy if it thought they were going to let it take a collection to use against them."

This forced the IUE to station officers on the public roads outside two gates with handbills stating a collection would be made there three days later. The collection produced more than $1,200 for the Rome strikers, but IUE charged the company's rule was unlawful.

Examiner Sidney Goldberg rejected company arguments about property rights. He cited other NLRB decisions and a Supreme Court ruling in the Peyton Packing Co. case, where the court held:

"A rule prohibiting union solicitation by an employe outside of working hours, although on company property . . . must be presumed to be an unreasonable impediment to self-organization and therefore discriminatory in the absence of evidence that special circumstances made the rule necessary" to maintain discipline or keep up production.

Community-Level COPE Drive Spurred by Furniture Workers

Milwaukee, Wis.—Unions must tell the story of their important contributions to the general welfare of the community if they are to get public support on specific labor legislation such as repeal of Section 14(b), National COPE Dir. Al Barkan told the Furniture Workers convention here.

It is "our silence" on the outstanding role played by labor in the fight for medicare, aid to education and other popular programs, Barkan declared, that makes it possible for reactionary employers and newspapers to mislead so many citizens on the real issues of "right-to-work" laws, higher minimum wages and similar measures. He called for greater efforts to publicize labor's legislative achievements and to spur registration and voting among union members and their families.

Barkan's remarks were the highlight of a convention session devoted to political action, during which Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford turned over a check for $1223 as a down payment on the union's COPE quota, and 30 locals were presented with awards for reaching or surpassing their assigned goals in the voluntary fund drive.

The delegates adopted a strong resolution pledging all-out activity to re-elect liberal congressmen and senators and to support COPE organizationally and financially.

The resolution also urged locals "to open and extend the lines of communication to allied groups outside the labor movement." A successful example of this approach was reported by Local 273 of Sumter, S.C., which spearheaded the formation of a committee for the election of progressive candidates in the 2nd Congressional District of that state with the support of other unions, churches, civil rights groups and liberal Democrats.

Earlier the convention heard Adolph Holmes, associate director of the National Urban League, credit organized labor with originating many of the tactics used by civil rights workers. "Civil disobedience," Holmes said, "didn't start with the civil rights movement."

He pointed to the long list of labor leaders who went to jail and died while fighting for their cause. Because of this, he stated, "it grieves me to hear some in the labor movement say we should stop picketing and demonstrating." He urged his listeners never to stop "identifying with the little man. . . . When you quit having concern about human beings, you give up for yourself."

A report by the union's Equal Opportunity committee, setting forth the objectives of obtaining and enforcing anti-bias clauses in contracts, and of checking on employer compliance with Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, was unanimously adopted.

In other key actions, the delegates:

- Approved Pres. Morris Pizer's call for the creation of a voluntary organizers corps to assist the union in reaching unorganized workers.
- Acted to free union representatives for organizing activity by encouraging the establishment of joint boards of adjacent locals and by providing financial assistance for them to handle their own servicing needs.
- Reaffirmed the value of consumer education campaigns in organizing and collective bargaining and urged locals to participate actively in the work of the Union Label Dept.
- Called for higher social security benefits and lower transit fares for the elderly.

Pioneers Feted

A banquet in honor of the union's Midwest pioneers, Nick Blattner of Chicago and Gus Blade of Rockford, Ill., featured a program of songs by labor troubador Joe Glazer, now with the U.S. Information Agency.

Pizer and Fulford were re-elected president and secretary-treasurer by acclamation as were the four vice presidents—Michael DeCicco of New York, Sam P. Sloan of Chicago, Carl Scarbrough of Memphis and Fred Stefan of San Francisco. Three vacancies on the general executive board were filled by Robert Sebers of Cleveland, Harold Kober of Sheboygan, Wis., and Ed Magee of Ionia, Mich.

Hall Sees War Slowed By U.S. Ship Shortage

Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall told the House Merchant Marine Committee that the war in Viet Nam is creating "a vicious shipping circle in which the American merchant fleet is becoming the chief victim of its own deficiencies."

The House committee, under the chairmanship of Rep. Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.), began hearings in February on a broad range of U.S. maritime problems, with particular stress on the adequacy of the U.S. merchant marine in the current Viet Nam crisis.

Hall, who heads the AFL-CIO's Maritime Trades Dept., noted that since last summer, the U.S. has had to turn to foreign-flag shipping for the carriage of both military and commercial cargoes to Viet Nam.

He also noted that in a number of instances the crews of foreign-flag vessels had refused to carry U.S. military supplies to South Viet Nam and that in other instances American-flag shipping companies had been obliged to charter foreign-flag vessels to fulfill commercial commitments, because their own vessels were diverted to military service.

The Viet Nam crisis, Hall asserted, has made it clear that the present American-flag merchant fleet is inadequate to meet either the defense or commercial requirements of the nation, as called for in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, and has also demonstrated that reliance in an emergency cannot be placed upon foreign flags, although such a concept has been supported by both the Defense and State departments.

"Finally—and most important—the Viet Nam situation has shown us that the only way we can ever achieve real strength and security on the seas, in either the defense or commercial areas, is through the creation of a strong and adequate merchant fleet which flies the American flag and which is manned by American seamen," Hall declared.

He urged members of the committee to support the proposals of the President's Maritime Advisory Committee for an expanded American-flag fleet.

Four-Year Battle:

Senate Unit Clears Truth-in-Packaging

A "truth-in-packaging" bill has finally been approved by a Senate committee after four years of hearings and study and is headed for floor action, probably next month.

The bill won a resounding 14 to 3 vote of approval by the Senate Commerce Committee after a number of efforts to modify and weaken it were beaten back.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), who first introduced the measure in 1962, termed it "an excellent bill which reacts effectively to marketplace problems." He said approval by the committee is "magnificent news for American consumers and that includes everyone—packagers and retail shoppers alike."

The bill reported out by the committee is a substitute for the Hart bill introduced by Committee Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.). The measure includes the major provisions of the Hart bill but allows industry to make use of the Dept. of Commerce's voluntary product standards before weights and measures regulations would be drafted by administering agencies.

The AFL-CIO has given its strong support to "truth-in-packaging" legislation as part of the overall need for consumer protection.

Aimed at providing consumers with "accurate information" to "facilitate price comparisons" in the supermarket, the bill would:

- Require that net contents be stated in conspicuous-sized type on the front of packages, parallel to the base.
- Require that contents be stated in ounces, if under four pounds or one gallon—or in whole units of pounds, pints or quarts.
- Forbid qualifying adjectives with the weight—such as "giant half-quart."

The Food & Drug Administration, on food products, and the Federal Trade Commission, on other supermarket products such as floor waxes or detergents, may establish regulations to eliminate some of the proliferation of weights by establishing reasonable weights and measures in product lines, define how much is a "serving," spell out what terms such as "large" and "family" mean and regulate the conditions under which "cents off" claims may be used.

If the FDA or FTC decides regulations are needed on weights and measures in a product line, the bill gives the industry 60 days to file a request for promulgation of voluntary standards. The industry has one year—with the possibility of a six months extension—to come up with its standards.

Hart noted that "these standards would be voluntary," but that there "would be no reason that FTC or FDA could not make them mandatory if it was determined that the voluntary standards were not effective."

A version of Hart's bill was approved by a Senate Judiciary subcommittee in 1964 but the full committee did not act. Last year Hart reintroduced the measure and it was sent to the Commerce Committee. Foes of the bill may try to send the measure back to Judiciary when it reaches the Senate.

Senate Urged to Ratify UN Rights Conventions

Senate ratification of four United Nations human rights conventions, covering genocide, slavery, forced labor and the political rights of women, was urged by U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Arthur J. Goldberg.

In an address to 1,000 delegates to a dinner marking the 60th anniversary of the American Jewish Committee, Goldberg also reaffirmed the federal government's support for the conventions, saying it is the Administration's position "that they should be ratified."

Long Delay

He recalled that the convention making genocide an international crime was sent to the Senate for ratification by former Pres. Truman in 1949. The late Pres. Kennedy sent the others nearly three years ago, he said.

"We supported each of these conventions in the UN, and indeed some of their provisions were suggested by us," Goldberg said. "We spoke in favor of them and we voted for them, for we are deeply concerned with each of the human rights they defend, and indeed our Constitution required that they be protected. Our delay in ratifying these conventions has confused our friends and provided ammunition against us by our foes."

Goldberg rejected criticism of the Senate for the delay, maintaining that differences do not reflect lack of support for the aims of the conventions, but rather "have their genesis in honest doubts . . . that the principles of federalism may not permit us to participate in them."

"It is my very strong belief," he added, "that all the UN conventions submitted to the Senate are consistent with our Constitution, and that we need not fear that they contravene our domestic laws which are more protective of human rights than anything the conventions provide."

Goldberg pointed out the inconsistency of ratifying the UN charter, "which spells out human rights as one of the main purposes of the organization, and then hesitating to ratify conventions that give the charter force."

"Above all," he went on, "I believe ratification is entirely in the United States' national interest. Concern for the welfare of all people is a vital aspect of our foreign policy; but other countries will not take our views seriously unless we demonstrate our willingness to join the international community in international commitments to safeguard human rights."

The 1963 AFL-CIO convention strongly urged the Senate to ratify the genocide convention, pointing out that it had already been ratified by 64 other nations.

Toronto Unions Aid Immigrant Labor

Toronto, Ont.—Twenty Toronto area unions, spearheaded by the Ladies' Garment Workers, have organized an ethnic labor committee to fight local industry exploitation of immigrant workers.

Automation Key Issue:

Distillery Workers Set Contract Goals

Miami Beach, Fla.—With master contract negotiations in the industry approaching a crucial stage, 250 delegates to the Distillery Workers' 25th anniversary convention unanimously reaffirmed a call by Pres. Mort Brandenburg for broadened social security and pension benefits as well as a program to meet the impact of automation.

The issue of automation, which during the past five years has witnessed a loss of 1,000 jobs annually in the industry, was canvassed by Sec.-Treas. George J. Oneto.

Bargaining Next

Brandenburg in his keynote address served notice on management in the distilling and wine industries that the DWU is prepared to "accept any sacrifice" to realize "the collective bargaining goals to which we are committed." He voiced the hope that there would be "realistic accommodation" by such major distillers as National, Schenley and Seagram as well as by California wineries in bargaining sessions scheduled to commence immediately following the convention.

Complicating the bargaining is the prospect of increased taxation and even more regulations, such as the New York State liquor reform law whose constitutionality was affirmed by the Supreme Court last month.

Noting that governments at all levels have received $100 billion in revenues since the end of repeal, Brandenburg warned that added taxes and stringent regulations would "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs." He urged modification of tax procedures and regulations so that the industry could be permitted to "bottle for inventory" and thus establish "the economic foundation for year-round employment."

Full support for the DWU's collective bargaining position was voiced by Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall, head of the AFL-CIO Maritimes Trades Dept. Hall pointed out, however, that some proposals, such as the reduced work week, would require legislative action as well as contract gains.

He told the delegates that the lesson to be drawn from such legislative losses as the failure to win repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act is more, not less, political action—but "political action keyed to independence" on the part of trade unions.

The theme that labor should not be the tail to the kite of either political party was underscored by Al Barkan, national COPE director, who commended the DWU for attaining its COPE quota for the eighth successive year. While acknowledging that the second session of the 89th Congress has not measured up to the standards of the first session, Barkan urged increased COPE activity to assure that there be no cuts in liberal strength in Congress next year which would endanger "great society" programs and stall progress on the legislative front. He also noted that in California and elsewhere, reactionary forces are regrouping and that "complacency on our part can be the road to disaster."

Other convention speakers included Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., Exec. Sec. Peter M. McGavin of the Maritime Trades Dept., Mayor Elliott Roosevelt of Miami Beach, and Joseph Matzner, publisher of the Beverage Retailer.

Approximately 70 policy resolutions, many of them centering on specific industry problems, as well as a number of constitutional changes were to be considered at subsequent convention sessions.

A somber note was introduced at the opening session when the delegates paid silent tribute to the memory of the late Meyer H. Weintraub, an international vice president who died just prior to the convention's opening during the sessions of the general executive board.

ANNUAL LUNCHEON MEETING of AFL-CIO National Community Services conference drew this audience to hear message from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who is chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee and president of the United Community Funds & Councils of America.

Union's Disaster Aid Programs Reviewed at CSA Conference

not take the place of volunteers working to help their neighbor, he said.

Quoting Pres. Johnson's prediction of a shortage of 100,000 social workers by 1970, Beirne urged the delegates to "back voluntarism with professional competence" by recruiting qualified young people as social workers and rallying unions, central bodies, agencies and United Funds to earmark money for social work scholarships.

Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, acting for the CSA staff, presented Beirne with a gift of Steuben glass and, in the conference keynote address, said the idea of community services "is an expression of the fundamental ideals" of labor which the trade union movement never lost.

CSA itself received a special award from Dir. Glenn W. Ferguson of OEO's Volunteers in Service to America for outstanding support of the VISTA program.

Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester of the Intl. Labor Press Association presented special ILPA awards to three winners of a competition for CSA newsletters—CSA representatives Thomas F. Burns, Ft. Wayne, Ind.; Charles Clark, Louisville, Ky.; Nolan Owen and Oscar Wade of Lansing, Mich.

At the closing conference event, the Murray-Green Award dinner, Beirne was to present the AFL-CIO Executive Council's award in memory of Philip Murray and William Green, late presidents of the former CIO and AFL, respectively, to OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver and Eunice Kennedy Shriver, his wife, for services to the mentally retarded and others in need.

Workshop Sessions

The conference had one general session and five workshop sessions on money management and debt counseling; one general meeting and five workshops on strike assistance and unemployment relief; a general discussion on unemployment compensation, food stamps and community planning for aid to the jobless; one session and five workshops on community organization for disaster relief.

Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation reiterated labor's support of legislation for a federal flood insurance program to protect property owners against loss from natural disasters like Hurricane Betsy and area-wide floods.

Gen. James F. Collins, president of the American Red Cross, expressed thanks for labor's cooperation and urged community support of the organization's current special drive for a $9 million emergency fund.

National Dir. Robert E. Edson of Red Cross disaster services reported that in numerous disasters "we have found unions effectively helping meet the needs" created by the emergency.

Deputy Sec. Norman V. Lourie of the Pennsylvania State Welfare Dept. noted labor support for improved public welfare programs and warned that the war on poverty can be lost unless there is a "firm national policy of full employment" and minimum income guarantees.

Inter-American Parley Spells Out Expanded Alliance Role for Labor

Caraballeda, Venezuela—A 31-point "immediate action program" to step up the role of organized labor and labor ministries in Alliance for Progress projects was adopted unanimously at the second Inter-American Conference of Labor Ministers here.

Representatives of 18 nations signed the recommendations, which stressed freedom for labor to organize and bargain collectively as well as union participation in the planning and policy-making stages of AIP programs.

Signing the proposals were representatives of Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Panama, the Dominican Republic, Peru, Venezuela, Uruguay, Paraguay and the United States. Brazil and Haiti were not represented.

The program is intended to implement and extend the Cundinamarca Declaration drawn up at the first labor ministers' conference held three years ago in Bogota.

It was adopted after AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne demanded that the conference "really give something more than lip service or speeches to the workers' needs." Beirne and AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan represented organized labor in the United States.

Workers throughout the hemisphere, Beirne declared, want material things such as higher wages, housing and education, and "are not interested in declarations and conferences and plans."

"We have done much since 1963, but it is not nearly enough," he said. "I am not satisfied with my own government's involvement. I am less satisfied with the involvement and actions of other governments."

Beirne was cheered when he assured trade unionists throughout Latin America of AFL-CIO support in their struggle for social justice and economic development.

No Excuses

"When the U.S. labor movement expresses its preference for peaceful over violent change," he added, "our words are not intended as excuses for halfway measures, partial reforms and compromises with social injustice. . . .

"We are prepared to assist our brothers in Latin America in organizing pressures for reform so massive that real reforms, cutting right to the heart of social problems, can be achieved without disorder and violence.

"When dictators of the Right or Left block these pressures, they will have to reckon with the active support of the American labor movement in behalf of our Latin American brothers. The forces of reaction should not deceive themselves because the working men and women of the U.S. favor peaceful progress through democratic processes. They cannot remain indifferent where and when the avenues of democratic action are arbitrarily closed to the working people of Latin America."

Angel Bucci of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., speaking on behalf of all the international trade secretariats, said Latin American workers look for "positive action" and "want the implementation of programs now."

Pres. Johnson, through Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz sent greetings to the conference, at which each participating nation was represented by union and business leaders as well as by the labor ministers themselves. Pres. Raul Leoni of Venezuela opened the meeting.

Wirtz, who reviewed AIP develapments, said the role of labor ministers is to "face squarely those who fight change because the status quo has been good to them."

Medicare Plan B Hits 90% Level

Ninety percent of the 19.1 million men and women estimated to be 65 or older by July 1, or 17.2 million persons, have signed up for the medical insurance program of medicare—Plan B—the Social Security Administration has announced.

The total includes about 400,000 enrollments received since the registration deadline was advanced from Mar. 31 to May 31. Another letter has been sent to those known to be eligible but who have not made their decisions known in the hope of getting them to decide before the deadline.

The program costs each insured person $3 monthly, with the government matching that amount.

Permanent School Milk Plan Urged

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to set up a permanent school milk program as "one of the best ways of improving the nation's health."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed labor's support of a bill by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and strong opposition to proposed budget cuts in the school lunch and milk programs.

He said in a statement to a Senate Agriculture subcommittee that cuts in these programs "inevitably means that local school boards must either charge students more for their milk, or institute means tests to segregate out the neediest children, or eliminate the program entirely. None of these is a realistic alternative in our view."

Biemiller noted that even in comparatively well-to-do areas, an increase in the price of school milk brings a sharp drop in consumption.

He praised the action of the House in restoring funds for the school lunch program but stressed that "making this program permanent and boosting the appropriation to more meaningful levels is necessary."

At Cabinet Level:

New Agency Backed to Meet 'Total Transportation Needs'

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to meet the "total transportation needs" of the nation by creating a Dept. of Transportation, which would unify a multitude of government agencies that now "often move in conflicting directions."

Creation of the Cabinet-level department is "very important legislation," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a House Government Operations subcommittee, and "of great interest to many of the international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO." He later presented similar testimony before the Senate Government Operations Committee.

The new department will be "a significant step toward making available to our transportation systems the full benefits of modern science and technology," he said, adding that the department would have an important role in transportation safety and "special responsibility" for improving and rebuilding America's transportation system.

Biemiller qualified labor's support by proposing 14 changes which, he said, would make the department an "effective instrument to advance and develop badly needed coordination and strengthening of our transportation system."

He noted that his testimony represented a consensus of the unions directly concerned with the bill, which would bring under one department 100,000 employes, $6 billion in funds and the operations of eight agencies and functions.

The new department's responsibility in the House bill introduced by Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.), would be the full field of the government's transportation activities, including rail, maritime, air, road and urban and interurban transportation. Its function would be to coordinate transportation programs, improve safety, encourage new technology for high quality, low cost transportation, and undertake research in new methods.

A resolution adopted at the federation's 1965 convention urged creation of just such a Cabinet-level department to administer national transportation policy.

"Because of the broad field which the legislation covers," Biemiller declared, "and the diversity of interests of our affiliated unions in the transportation industry, we have taken steps to make sure that in presenting to you the views of the labor movement on the proposed legislation we are reflecting a unified point of view."

His presentation of the proposed 14 changes was in summary form, he said, to "bring together in one place" the various labor recommendations. Each would be dealt with in detail in testimony by the unions most directly concerned, he said.

Biemiller singled out for comment an AFL-CIO proposal which would provide for an office to represent the public in the complex railroad merger, train discontinuance and line abandonment proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It is "truly incredible," he declared, that the public has no voice in ICC proceedings and that the commission must rely upon the "untested self-serving claims" of railroad applicants in cases involving the future welfare of vast segments of our economy.

He also termed an "inadequacy" in the bill its failure to be specific about the position and function of maritime agencies in the new department. As one of the AFL-CIO recommendations he urged that an independent agency be established for the merchant marine with a "consultative relationship" to the new department.

CREATION of Cabinet-level Dept. of Transportation was endorsed by the AFL-CIO in testimony given by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller (left) before the House Executive & Legislative Reorganization subcommittee and the Senate Government Operations Committee. He is chatting with Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.), who introduced the bill in the House.

Shapp Posts Upset Win In Pennsylvania Primary

Milton J. Shapp, a Philadelphia manufacturer who was the state AFL-CIO's "man of the year" in 1963, won the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in an upset win over the party's recommended candidate.

Shapp edged State Sen. Robert P. Casey by about 45,000 votes after a months-long intensive anti-organization campaign. Pennsylvania COPE made no indorsement in the Democratic primary.

Shapp will face Lt. Gov. Raymond P. Shafer in the November general election. Shafer overwhelmed perennial candidate Harold Stassen to win the GOP nomination. He had the strong support of Gov. William Scranton who was barred from running for another term.

Scranton's forces beat back challenges by Goldwater Republicans and rolled up a heavy posthumous nomination for the late State Atty. Gen. Walter E. Alessandroni who died in a plane crash while campaigning. The Republican State Committee will meet June 18 to chose a substitute candidate. Alessandroni was being challenged by a Goldwater supporter for the nomination.

Another challenge by the Goldwater forces to Rep. Richard Schweiker (R-Pa.), who voted for repeal of 14(b), was beat back when Schweiker won easily over former Rep. John A. Lafore.

In other political developments:

- Sen. Herman E. Talmadge announced that he is considering becoming a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor, a post he has held twice before. Former Gov. S. Ernest Vandiver announced he would not be a candidate.
- Mayor John F. Collins of Boston announced his candidacy for the Democratic senatorial nomination. Previously former Gov. Endicott Peabody and Thomas Boylston Adams had announced on the Democratic side and State Atty. Gen. Edward W. Brooke on the Republican side for the seat being vacated by Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R), who is retiring.

Guild Lauds Union Backing In BNA Strike

Response of AFL-CIO affiliates to the boycott of Bureau of National Affairs Publications produced by strikebreakers has been "heartwarming beyond imagination," Newspaper Guild Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson said.

The Guild strike against BNA, now in its second week, will be won, Farson observed, through the cooperation of American labor leaders who, in telegrams and letters, "have expressed scorn for a company which has denied its employes a union shop on grounds that to do so might 'offend' BNA's management customers."

Farson said he could see no difference between BNA management's attittude and that of the National Right To Work Committee's campaign to block repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits states to outlaw union shop contracts. He urged affiliates which have not yet had a chance to cancel BNA services to do so immediately and unions which have cancelled to demand rebates and shut off the flow of any further union information.

The Godless Enemy

Meany Calls on Senate For Strong Jobless Bill

supported the Administration program and the bill introduced by Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), committee chairman and Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.).

After extensive hearings and study the committee voted out a measure that would allow the states to continue to set their own varying standards for amount and duration of benefits.

The committee bill would extend coverage of the unemployment compensation system to about 3.5 million more workers—compared to the almost 5 million in the Administration bill — and sets up a plan to extend benefits for those who have exhausted them but only if certain recession-type conditions exist.

Levy Increase

Changes in the system would be financed by an increase in the federal levy on employers from four-tenths of 1 percent of taxable payrolls to six-tenths of 1 percent. The taxable wage base would be increased from $3,000 to $3,900 a year, starting in 1969, and to $4,200 in 1972.

The additional 3.5 million workers to be covered under the bill would include 1.2 million who work for employers hiring one or more persons for at least 20 weeks a year or who pay wages of $1,500 in any three-month period; some 1.9 million employes of non-profit hospitals, colleges and other organizations; certain agricultural processing workers but not farm workers. The Administration had proposed coverage of farm workers. Currently, workers in companies with fewer than four employes are not eligible for the benefit system.

The committee's plan for extension of benefits for those who had exhausted them would be effective in 1969 and be tied to recession "triggers"—an unemployment rate of more than 5 percent over a three - month period and when the total number of claimants whose regular compensation had run out exceeded one percent of those employes covered. Each state could also initiate the extra 13 weeks if unemployment reached a certain "trigger" point.

The Administration had called for a federal benefit period of 26 weeks beyond the regular state period of benefits.

The President's proposals would have set a federal benefit standard guaranteeing an unemployed worker at least half of his regular weekly pay up to a maximum of 50 percent of the average weekly wage in the state for a period of 26 weeks.

The committee action on the measure was by voice vote. It was hailed by the committee's ranking minority member, Rep. John Byrnes (R-Wis.) as a "defeat" for the President.

SAG Insurance Adds Coverage Of Mental Ills

Hollywood, Calif.—Treatment and hospitalization for mental conditions will be provided for the first time under the Screen Actors Guild-Producers Health & Welfare Plan effective July 1, the trustees have announced.

The plan will pay up to $10 a visit for treatment for up to 50 visits during an eligibility year, with a benefit maximum of $500, and will cover up to 70 days of hospitalization.

The inclusion of treatment for mental conditions was only one of a series of improvements in benefits for actors and their families made public by Gilbert V. Perkins, chairman of the board.

The top allowance for a private hospital room was boosted to $27 a day and the $12 allowance paid under the California Disability Insurance program, previously deducted under the SAG plan, will no longer be offset. Life insurance and accidental death and dismemberment benefits were increased from $4,500 to $5,000 for each actor. The trustees also voted to pay the $3 monthly charge for Part B of medicare for actors, extras and dependents 65 years or older.

House Approves Wage Bill, Adds 8 Million to Coverage

LBJ Vows Battle for Program

Pres. Johnson pledged his Administration to continue the fight for a broad program of economic, social welfare and labor legislation as he addressed 200 members of the Intl. Labor Press Association at a briefing and reception at the White House.

"We will try again and will not relent in our efforts," he said. He listed, among others, repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act; revision of the unemployment compensation law, with higher benefits, and federal standards; an increased federal minimum wage, with expanded coverage.

In introducing the labor editors, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz told the President that "no other group says so much to so many and is so little recognized."

The editors were in Washington for a two-day conference arranged by the Dept. of Labor. Among the speakers were Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, who echoed the President's pledge to continue to press for progressive legislation benefiting workers.

Late for the briefing, the President explained he had been detained by a meeting of congressional leaders, four of whom entered with him. They were House Speaker John W. McCormack, Assistant Senate Democratic Leader Russell B. Long (La.), House Majority Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) and Assistant Leader Hale Boggs (La.).

At the President's request McCormack and Long spoke briefly on the leaders' meeting.

"There is scarcely a measure we have proposed which does not affect

$1.60 Second Step Delayed to 1969

By David L. Perlman

The House voted to increase the federal minimum wage to $1.60 an hour and extend coverage to nearly 8 million workers, including farm workers, but delayed the effective date of the two-step increase until 1969.

After a grueling three-day debate, the House beat back a series of amendments to gut the measure, but a proposal by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell that the second step of the wage increase be delayed from February 1968 to February 1969 carried by a vote of 205 to 193.

The bill would increase the wage floor for 30 million workers now covered by a $1.25 minimum to $1.40 in February 1967. As the House passed the measure, the increase to $1.60 will come two years later.

The AFL-CIO will make a strong bid in the Senate to restore the 1968 date which was in the bill when it was reported out by the House Labor Committee.

The vote for final passage was 303 to 93 and an attempt by opponents to knock out coverage for farm workers and weaken overtime coverage of processing employes was defeated 231 to 168.

A critical rollcall came on reversing an earlier teller vote that would have excluded from coverage 1.6 million workers originally covered in the committee's bill. It carried 200 to 195. Other amendments increased the coverage of the measure to 7.95 million workers.

As sent to the Senate, the bill would extend coverage to large groups of retail, hospital, hotel, restaurant, laundry, school and construction workers and—for the first time in the history of the Fair La-

Workers' Purchasing Power Dips

The purchasing power of the average factory worker dropped between March and April and was barely above that of a year ago, the Labor Dept. reported.

The rise in consumer prices—up four-tenths of one percent in April—lowered the real spendable earnings of a worker with three dependents to $87.32 compared to $87.80 a month earlier. In April 1965 the figure was $87.23.

The monthly rise in the consumer price index stemmed mostly from a hike of eight-tenths of 1 percent in cost of services including restoration of the excise tax on telephone services, higher FHA and VA mortgage interest rates and larger price tags on medical care, automobile insurance and other personal services.

Food prices, which have risen sharply in the past few months, increased only slightly and pork prices dropped 5.5 percent.

More than one million workers will receive a cost-of-living wage increase as a result of the

Shrivers Aid Strike With Award Money

Sargent Shriver and his wife, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, accepted the first joint citation in the history of the AFL-CIO's annual Philip Murray-William Green award—and promptly gave the $5,000 check that accompanied it to the striking grape workers of California.

The Shrivers, honored for outstanding service to the community, at an award dinner climaxing the 11th AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services, paid warm tribute to the men and women of labor for their long record of concern for the poor. (Excerpts on Page 6.)

Mrs. Shriver, who was cited especially for her work as a foster mother for retarded children, said "American trade unionism has brought a more human life to millions of Americans" and added:

"I hope my four sons will grow up to be men like Mr. Murray and Mr. Green, men of peace and men of change."

Murray was president of the former CIO when he died, and Green of the AFL. The award in their names was established by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1956 to honor those who work effectively for the common good.

Double Role

Shriver was saluted for his efforts as head of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the anti-poverty arm of the Johnson Administration, and as former head of the Peace Corps.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, told the audience of more than 400 that the idea of a joint award originated with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Accepting the nomination of Shriver for the Murray-Green award, Meany asked "How about

Labor Strongly Backs New Civil Rights Bill

Discrimination in justice and in housing are "large and acute evils" that must be eradicated, the AFL-CIO told Congress in testimony calling for enactment of the Administration's 1966 civil rights bill.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a House Judiciary subcommittee that the proposed measure will provide "constructive and effective cures" for the evils of discrimination in housing and in the make-up of juries, as well as in dealing with crimes in the exercise of civil rights and in establishing more realistic methods for rights lawsuits.

"The AFL-CIO welcomes the determination of the President and the Congress to face and face squarely the difficult issue of how best to remedy the deficiencies which all of us recognize," Biemiller declared. He was accompanied by Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel.

In giving the federation's "general" support, Biemiller urged that the enforcement provisions in all parts of the bill be strengthened and broadened. Experience with earlier civil rights legislation has taught that "broader scale provisions" are

Labor Law Compliance Urged in U.S. Purchases

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has urged Pres. Johnson and Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara to reverse present Defense Dept. policy by requiring government contractors to comply with federal labor laws.

A council statement named J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., as one of a number of firms which flagrantly and persistently violate the law yet continue to benefit from Defense Dept. contracts. McNamara's department awarded $24 million in defense contracts to the nation's second largest textile manufacturer from January 1963 to July 1965 and more than $21.5 million in the third quarter of 1965 alone while Stevens was pursuing a policy of flouting the labor laws, the council noted.

"This is shocking," the council said in a statement adopted May 6 and held by Pres. George Meany for release until the President and McNamara received it.

Meanwhile, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.) urged in a House speech that the Davis-Bacon and Walsh-Healy Acts be amended to spell out authority for government agencies to withhold contracts from companies found by the National Labor Relations Board to be "open, flagrant, knowing and purposeful" violators of federal laws.

Steelworkers Win Gains in Copper Mines

Toronto, Ont.—The Steelworkers have scored important gains in their longstanding drive to unionize operations of the powerful anti-labor Noranda mining interests.

At Cassiar, B.C., 450 USWA members went back to work after a six-months strike at Noranda's Craigmont Mines, the province's largest copper producer, with benefits of more than $1 an hour over two years.

Wage increases alone range from 59 cents to 98 cents; the starting rate rises from $1.80 to $2.45 an hour; retroactive pay will be 20 percent of gross earnings to July 12, 1965, and premiums for weekend work were boosted. The USWA ousted the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers as bargaining representative just before the walkout.

At Mattagami Lake Mines in Quebec, Local 6131 was certified as bargaining agent for 376 workers by the Quebec Labor Relations Board after the latter had rejected a challenge by an independent group.

Earlier, at Murdochville, Que., the USWA signed a first contract at Gaspe Copper Mines giving more than 7,000 employes substantial wage increases, better vacations and more substantial insurance coverage.

The mine and smelter were centers of rioting and anti-union attacks during a strike in 1957 in which USWA offices were dynamited and looted, one striker was killed and several others were injured.

Hotel Retirees Award Cites Van Arsdale

New York—The nation's war against poverty will not succeed as long as many workers are excluded from federal wage-hour protections, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of this city's Central Labor Council declared.

Van Arsdale's comment came as he received the fourth annual distinguished citizen award of the Pensioners Society of the New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council.

"There are too many workers outside the labor movement who want to be inside," he declared, adding that "if there were a sincere desire to fight poverty, we would have put the agricultural workers and taxi drivers under the Wage-Hour Act long ago."

His remarks were made as he and other leaders of the Taxi Drivers Organizing Committee were seeking to negotiate an initial contract with the city's major fleets.

Walter Sheerin, director of the Pensioners Society, who presided at the awards ceremonies, picked up Van Arsdale's theme, declaring: "We're not satisfied with any anti-poverty program unless it is spread around to include all people."

Van Arsdale received a message of congratulation from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who observed that "no better choice could be made for the award" in the light of the New York unionist's efforts "on behalf of all organized workers and especially senior citizens."

Presentation of the award was made by Sec. James L. O'Hara of the Hotel & Motel Trades Council. Former recipients include the late Bernard Baruch; Dr. Willard C. Rappleye, internationally known educator and physician; and Rep. Eugene J. Keogh (D-N.Y.).

High Wins in Florida As Racist Bid Flops

Florida Democrats rejected a bid to follow in the path of Alabama and nominated liberal and Negro-supported Mayor Robert King High of Miami as their gubernatorial candidate in November.

High defeated Gov. Haydon Burns in a runoff primary by about 90,000 votes after finishing second in the first primary earlier in May. High lost to Burns in a similar runoff race two years ago.

The High victory highlighted a series of primary elections including a sharply fought race for the U.S. Senate nomination in Oregon where labor-backed Rep. Robert B. Duncan defeated Howard Morgan by a 2 to 1 margin in the Democratic race.

The key issue in the contest was the government's Viet Nam policy, with Duncan strongly supporting the President and Morgan supporting the anti-administration views of Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.).

Duncan will face Oregon's Republican Gov. Mark Hatfield in November, Hatfield winning easily over minor opposition. The seat is being vacated by Sen. Maurine Neuberger (D).

In the Oregon gubernatorial contest GOP Sec. of State Tom McCall will face Democratic State Treas. Robert Staub in the general election.

In Oklahoma, the gubernatorial runoff primary in the Democratic Party was won by Preston Moore, former national commander of the American Legion, who defeated former Gov. Raymond Gary. The Republican runoff was won by State Sen. Dewey Bartlett.

In Kentucky, former GOP Rep. Gene Snyder, a Goldwater supporter who lost his seat in 1964, defeated a Republican moderate who supported William Scranton to win the nomination for the district seat. Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) easily won renomination and will oppose Democratic State Sen. John Young Brown in November.

In other political developments:

- Republican Gov. George Romney of Michigan announced his candidacy for another term. Earlier, Romney won the apparent support of New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller for the 1968 GOP presidential nomination, with Rockefeller taking himself out of the race. Rockefeller is a candidate for re-election as governor.
- Sen. Herman Talmadge (D-Ga.) who had indicated he might seek the governorship of Georgia, announced that he would not be a candidate.

CSC Dissolves Advisory Council

New York—The National Advisory Council to the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee and Community Services Activities was dissolved at a dinner here at which AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, committee chairman, and CSA Dir. Leo A. Perlis thanked the members for their services.

Beirne hailed the "sound guidance" the council had given during the 10 years of its existence. Perlis recalled that six of the 10 policy statements it recommended were adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and three others were handled administratively.

Robert E. Bondy, council chairman in recent years, was presented with a gift, and other members received certificates of appreciation signed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Convention Keynote:

Broad Social Goals Urged by Potofsky

By Eugene A. Kelly

Atlantic City, N. J.—Broad new goals for the Clothing Workers and the labor movement were urged by ACWA Pres. Jacob Potofsky in a keynote report to 1,500 delegates at the opening session of the union's 25th biennial convention here.

Recounting "unprecedented" gains for members since the 1964 convention in organizing, wages and welfare benefits, political action, health care and pension improvements, Potofsky declared the time has come for labor to work toward five additional goals in the social welfare field.

He listed them as "the best education and training possible" and the best medical care; a decent home for every family; a job for everyone, suited to his talents; and an income adequate to the needs of every family.

Potofsky's talk launched a five-day gathering in this city's Convention Hall which heard major addresses by Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, United Nations Sec. Gen. U Thant, Canadian Labour Congress Pres. Claude Jodoin, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Puerto Rico Gov. Roberto Sanchez-Vilella, Pres.-elect Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Executive Dir. Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The convention adopted a report by Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum summarizing the gains of the last two years. They included 17,000 new members in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico; more than 75 victories out of 130 National Labor Relations Board elections; charters for some 50 new locals; improved service at four Amalgamated health centers; "significant gains" in insurance and pension benefits and a start on three more cooperative housing projects for more than 15,000 tenants.

Meany in a taped message congratulated the union for an "excellent job" of representing its members and for showing understanding and concern "for the problems of all Americans"—in keeping with the AFL-CIO's belief that "What is good for America is good for labor."

Urging delegates to act in support of the minimum wage bill then awaiting House action, Meany predicted the President will sign a new bill "before the summer is out." But he added: "It will not be enough. We consider passage of this bill only a down-payment on the minimum wage level that must prevail."

Labor intends, Meany said, to "keep up the fight for a $2-an-hour minimum" and ultimately to win "complete coverage for every worker, and the 35-hour week."

U Thant, making his first major talk to a union convention, said members of the UN are convinced that military means will not restore peace in Viet Nam and "this war must be stopped on the initiative of the participants, lest it get out of hand."

Appeals to Labor

No one nation is now capable of policing the world or imposing a pattern on it, he said. The UN official appealed to labor, now the "most powerful single organized group" in the nation, to devote "energy and organization" to the problem of establishing a world order in which peace and democratic principles "really prevail."

"The labor movement," he said, "with its vast influence and prestige, can be a very powerful force in producing the changes of attitude which will be required."

Potofsky warned the convention that conservative candidates for Congress are trying to confuse and divide the voters through campaigns of fear. The radical right, he said, sponsors 10,000 radio and television programs and will spend $40 million this year preaching "hate and reaction" to threaten labor's gains.

"Extremism is a dagger aimed at the heart of labor," he declared. "It would reduce the worker to the economic slavery of the 19th century."

Jodoin, speaking in English and then in French, reported that labor has made a major contribution to the welfare of Canadians in winning better living standards, reduced hours, greater leisure and major improvements in social benefits.

Top target for the future, he said, is job security to protect workers and insure the economic health of the country. Another is making sure that every Canadian has decent living standards, Jodoin said, adding that "at least one fifth of our population is subsisting below a reasonable standard of comfort and decency."

Wirtz said that the U.S. is wasting more than half its potential workforce despite the fact that nearly 97 percent is listed as employed. Many are denied work opportunities, he said, because of their race and lack of education. Others are employed "several notches below" their potential capacity, he observed.

On foreign policy, the convention adopted a resolution urging the Administration to "renew its efforts to negotiate a peaceful settlement" in Viet Nam, and saluting all who through discussion and debate are "making a contribution toward public enlightenment."

Distillery Union Warned On Voting Complacency

Miami Beach, Fla.—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler cautioned against "political complacency" in the upcoming mid-term elections that would result in a "drastic erosion" of liberal strength in the 90th Congress.

The warning was sounded in an address highlighting the week-long proceedings of the Distillery Workers' 25th anniversary convention.

Schnitzler pointed out that such defeats as the failure to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act should not "blind us to the positive contributions" made by the 89th Congress, particularly in such crucial areas as medicare, civil rights and education.

This theme was enlarged upon by DWU Legislative Rep. Nathan P. Voloshen, who particularly emphasized the "twin threats" of added taxation and stricter regulations in the alcoholic beverage industries. These problems, Voloshen said, "can be met only by joint action of labor and management." A policy statement calling for such cooperation was among the 70 resolutions unanimously adopted by the 250 delegates.

A major floor debate took place on a resolution which would change the DWU constitution to permit the president as the "chief executive officer" to give greater authority to the secretary-treasurer, director of organization and executive board. The constitutional change was adopted unanimously after Pres. Mort Brandenburg stated its passage would "gear the machinery of our union to meet the challenge of the master contract negotiations."

These negotiations, starting with National Distillers, are scheduled to open on June 1. The delegates voted full support of demands already presented to management which call for job security guarantees, improved health and welfare benefits and a thorough revision of existing retirement plans.

The delegates voted to hold the next DWU convention in Washington, D. C., in May 1968.

The convention had been addressed earlier by Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall, Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., Executive Sec. Peter M. McGavin of the Maritime Trades Dept., Mayor Elliott Roosevelt of Miami Beach and Al Barkan, national COPE director. Barkan presented an award to the DWU for attaining its COPE quota for eight successive years.

UAW Gives Top Priority in '66 To Register-and-Vote Drive

Long Beach, Calif.—A stepped-up register-and-vote drive to dispel voter "apathy" in this year's congressional elections was put "highest on the list of priorities" by 2,500 delegates to the Auto Workers' 30th anniversary convention.

The convention called on each UAW local union to set up "an active and functioning citizenship-legislative committee within 30 days" and directed all locals to mount "the most effective COPE dollar drive in our history."

Roy Reuther, director of the union's Citizenship Dept., told the convention that defeat of the freshmen Democratic liberals "who made the difference" in writing the "fabulous" record of the 89th Congress would be interpreted by reactionaries as "a mandate to turn back the clock."

The 1.5 million-member union moved into its fourth decade under veteran leadership. Returned to office by acclamation were Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey and Vice Presidents Leonard Woodcock and Pat Greathouse. Three at-large executive board members were re-elected—Ken Bannon, Nelson Jack Edwards and Douglas Frazer.

In the only contest, Olga Madar, the union's recreation director, was elected to a newly-created at-large post intended to give representation to the UAW's 175,000 women.

Miss Madar, endorsed by the administration caucus, defeated Beverly Gibson of an Ontario local by an 8,274 to 2,819 vote.

In a display of solidarity between two unions which bargain with many of the same employers in the aerospace industry, the UAW's officers were installed by Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists.

Animosity Gone

Siemiller traced the relationship of the UAW and the IAM "from the animosity of the 1930's and the '40's to the harmony and cooperation of the 1950's and '60's."

Success of the historic no-raid pact signed by the two unions in 1949 was "the tap root which eventually blossomed into the complete merger of the AFL-CIO," Siemiller said.

As Reuther began his 11th two-year term, the convention unanimously adopted a resolution to donate $1.2 million to Wayne State University in Detroit for a "Walter P. Reuther Library and Labor History Archives." The university will put up the additional $300,000 for the building which will house the historical records of the UAW and several other unions.

Delegates also approved a two-step $1,500 raise for the union's officers, bringing the president's salary to $29,500 by 1968 and the secretary-treasurer's to $25,500.

In another financial action, the convention authorized the use of part of the investment income from the UAW strike fund for domestic projects, including anti-poverty programs. Previously interest from the $43 million strike reserve had been earmarked for the union's Free World Labor Defense Fund. The free labor fund currently stands at more than $3.5 million.

The convention reaffirmed the UAW's "continuing support and devotion" to the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Intl. Metalworkers Federation, whose president, Otto Brenner of West Germany, addressed the convention.

Among the 65 foreign guests, were delegates to the IMF World Automotive Conference, which will open in Detroit May 31. It will bring together representatives of workers employed in different countries by the big international automobile companies to coordinate organizing and bargaining programs and international efforts on behalf of social legislation.

No Appeasement

An international affairs resolution rejected the "unacceptable alternatives" of unilateral withdrawal of U.S. forces from Viet Nam and "further escalation of the war." It said history has shown that "appeasement of aggression invites further aggression" but warned of "brinkmanship" which could lead to "the larger war the President and all of us want to avoid."

Red China's "constant saber-rattling and defiant hostility" has been the main cause of its isolation from the world community, the convention resolution said. It urged the U.S. to reconsider its opposition to admission of Red China into the United Nations in the hope that "the restraining influence of world opinion" would help "defuse its militant belligerency."

The UAW called for shifting the world conflict "from a negative nuclear arms race that nobody can win toward a positive contest between different social systems—one totalitarian, the other committed to freedom and personal dignity." It added: "We need have no fear of the outcome of such a contest."

At the union's gala 30th anniversary celebration on the eve of the convention's adjournment, the UAW gave a special citation to Danny Kaye for his years of dedication to UNICEF — the United Nations Intl. Children's Emergency Fund.

The union described Kaye as "the modern minstrel with the magic power to bring together young and old in the solidarity of joy and laughter" and presented him with a $5,000 check for UNICEF.

Another dignitary who helped the union mark its anniversary was Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz who accepted for Pres. Johnson the UAW's social justice award.

Wirtz spoke feelingly of the outpouring of solidarity with which the UAW delegates had welcomed the Delano grape strikers in the convention's most dramatic episode.

These "workers in the vineyards," Wirtz said, "have done more to remind us of our feelings of 10 and 20 and 30 years ago, to renew our faith in the ability of ourselves to do the kind of job which needs to be done, than almost anything else that has happened."

Earlier, Reuther announced an additional $5,000 contribution to the grape strike, supplementing the UAW's regular monthly donation.

Delegates authorized a special collective bargaining convention next year before major negotiations get under way. It will formulate the UAW's demands in such areas as guaranteed annual salary, wage parity for Canadian and U.S. workers, "wage increases that more properly reflect the increased productivity and greater profitability of UAW industries," and transfer of blue collar workers to white collar jobs.

Reuther reaffirmed the UAW's opposition to formation of a labor party in the United States, while praising the work of Canada's New Democratic Party, whose deputy leader, David Lewis, addressed the convention.

In the United States, Reuther said, "we have been trying to make the Democratic Party the people's party."

Court Upholds Railroad On Operations in Strike

A struck railroad can make changes in employment practices, with permission of a U.S. District Court, to allow it to continue operations, the Supreme Court has ruled.

The decision in a case involving the Florida East Coast Railway and a number of rail unions affirmed lower court decisions and rejected the argument of the Justice Dept. and the unions that the FEC was acting illegally.

The dispute involves the longest strike in U.S. railroad industry, dating from Jan. 23, 1963. The FEC had refused to accept a settlement recommended by a presidential board after all the provisions of the Railway Labor Act had been exhausted.

After the unions struck, the FEC made a number of changes in the union contracts to hire strikebreakers, and the government and the unions charged that the railroad had unilaterally written a new contract in violation of the act.

A federal district court held that the railroad had violated the act but said it could makes changes in the contract "reasonably necessary" to continue to run the road under strike conditions. The court approved some changes and denied others. The decision was upheld by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Supreme Court, in a 7 to 1 decision written by Justice William O. Douglas, said the FEC, with district court permission, could deviate from its contract to the extent necessary to continue operations. Douglas wrote that carriers have a public duty to make "reasonable efforts to maintain service at all times even when beset by labor-management controversies."

The duty, Douglas wrote, "runs not to shippers alone but to the public. In our complex society, metropolitan areas in particular might suffer a calamity if rail service for freight or for passengers was stopped."

Justice Byron White, dissenting, said the majority decision is "very close to a judgment that there shall be no strikes in the transportation business, a judgment which Congress rejected in drafting the Railway Labor Act."

The majority opinion acknowledged that permitting operations with non-union workers after the railway act's procedures had been exhausted could tempt a railroad to "precipitate a strike . . . and even break the union."

Obligation Remains

To restrict this possibility, the court emphasized that a union contract, even after a strike begins, still represents "the rules governing the community of striking employes and the carrier. That community is not destroyed by the strike, as the strike represents only an interruption in the continuity of the relation."

The majority held that a railroad could not hire non-union help under terms and conditions different from those in its union contract without first receiving permission from a federal district court.

In another decision the court ruled that a state may not punish a newspaper editor under an electioneering law for publishing an editorial on Election Day.

Justice Hugo L. Black, for the court, described a 51-year-old Alabama law as an "obvious and flagrant abridgement of the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press."

The court struck down the law as applied to James E. Mills, editor of the Birmingham Post-Herald, who ran an editorial on Election Day calling for support of a mayor-council form of government.

John Haletsky Elected RCIA Vice President

John T. Haletsky, 48, of Philadelphia was elected tenth vice president of the Retail Clerks at a two-day board meeting in Washington, RCIA Pres. James A. Suffridge announced.

For the last year Haletsky has been organizing director of the eastern division, which includes 13 states from Maine to Virginia and the District of Columbia, as well as the Canadian provinces of Newfoundland, Ontario and Quebec.

President's Speech to Auto Union Urges 'New Agenda' for Progress

Long Beach, Calif.—Pres. Johnson outlined to the Auto Workers convention "a new agenda" for social progress and said "the time to start is now."

High on the President's list of the nation's "far from finished" business were such items as full employment, adult education, a meaningful life for the elderly and continuation of the "painful quest" for civil rights and social justice.

Johnson spoke by telephone to 2,500 delegates and several thousand guests assembled for a special program celebrating the UAW's 30th anniversary.

He noted that his speech fell on the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court's "decision that our schools must be color blind," and said: "I talk to you tonight as an optimist."

Full equality—in daily life as well as in law—is "certain" to be achieved, the President said, despite "bitter evidence of how far we are from its full attainment."

Accepting a UAW social justice award from the convention, Johnson noted that most of the "dreams" of the New Deal era have become reality and asked, "What now?" The President offered these suggestions:

"Let's start thinking as hard about under-employment as we have about unemployment. Our goal ought to be not just a job for everybody, but a job that uses all every man and woman has to offer.

"Let's start thinking about full potential as we have thought about full employment. . . . We talk about manpower shortages. They are only the results of our failures to train people to use more than a part of their talents. We waste manpower in this country. We let seasonal unemployment happen as though nothing could be done about it. We watch shortages of labor develop in some areas when there is unemployment in other areas not far away.

"Let's start thinking in a big way about education without the binding assumption that education is only for children.

"There should be large scale educational opportunity on a continuing basis, especially for those who did not get their share when they were young.

"Let's work to build a whole new idea of what is the meaning of growing old. Our concept today is still cushioned by the problems of the 30's. . . .

"And let's start thinking more soberly and realistically about the fact that ours isn't a roller-coaster economy any more. It doesn't depend on the stock market and it doesn't depend on war."

Although the President's address centered on domestic issues, a handful of outside demonstrators in the balcony angered the delegates by unfurling signs attacking America's policy in Viet Nam—similar to the tactics used at the AFL-CIO convention last December during the speech by Sec. of State Dean Rusk. There were a few scuffles, and when Johnson concluded his speech delegates gave the President a 90-second standing ovation. UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther told the demonstrators they had a right to express their views but lashed into them for mistaking the right of free speech for the right to disrupt a meeting.

ILPA Awards Cite Top Union Journals

The labor press came in for some high praise and some constructive criticism from 19 Nieman Foundation fellows who judged the journalistic awards contest of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

The most coveted awards for editorial excellence went to the Machinist, the American Pressman, the Graphic Arts Unionist, the Cincinnati Chronicle, the United Teacher and the Hotel & Club Voice.

"Many of the publications, particularly the magazines, would give mass circulation products a battle for newsstand sales," the Nieman fellows said in their report to ILPA released at the award banquet in Washington.

At the same time, the judges agreed that the three areas where the labor press "needs improvement" are "make-up, photography and the encouraging of reportorial enterprise."

They said that there was no "blatant propaganda" and there was "increasing maturity in the handling of controversial issues . . . and many of the publications took hard looks at the civil rights movement and poverty, problems that affect all Americans, not just union members."

Following is the list of top winners:

International Publications: editorial excellence, newspaper format, the Machinist; magazine format, the American Pressman and the Graphic Arts Unionist (Lithographers & Photoengravers); best front page, newspaper format, RWDSU Record; magazine format, Canadian Labour; best single editorial, the American Teacher; best original cartoon, the Machinist; best feature article, UAW Solidarity; best regular column, IUD Agenda and the Pulp & Paper Worker; best original photograph, UAW Solidarity.

State and Local Central Body Publications: editorial excellence, Cincinnati Chronicle; best front page, San Francisco Labor; best single editorial, Michigan AFL-CIO News; best feature article, Oregon Labor Press; best regular column, Cincinnati Chronicle; best original photograph, Los Angeles Citizen; best community project, Michigan AFL-CIO News.

Local Union Publications: editorial excellence, newspaper format, the United Teacher (AFT Local 2, New York); magazine format, Hotel & Club Voice (Hotel Workers Local 6, New York); best front page, newspaper format, 1199 Hospital News (Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Local 1199, New York); magazine format, Hotel & Club Voice; best single editorial, Overture (Musicians Local 47, Hollywood, Calif.); best original cartoon, Equity; best feature article, the United Teacher and Hotel & Club Voice; best regular column, Hotel-Bar-Restaurant Review (Detroit); best original photograph, Hotel & Club Voice; best community project, the United Teacher.

Rail Unions' Paper Gets Special Award

The weekly newspaper Labor, the voice of the standard railway labor organizations, received a special award from the International Labor Press Association at its journalism awards banquet May 22 in Washington.

The citation, from the Executive Council of ILPA, declared the award was "not for any special project but for its distinguished service, week in and week out, year after year, to the North American labor movement.

"It is the crusading voice of union members in one of the continent's great industries. It is the newspaper from which we all have borrowed freely, so often."

Taxi Drivers Add 7 Units In New York

New York—The Taxi Drivers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, won a clear majority of the votes of workers in seven additional garages, the National Labor Relations Board announced after disposing of ballots challenged in recent representation elections.

That brought 1,000 more members into the TDOC—six units of drivers, one of inside workers. The union, winner of previous NLRB elections, now represents most of the city's 25,000 taxi workers in the organizing drive conducted by the New York City Central Labor Council.

Meanwhile TDOC marked time in its effort to get a first contract while Mayor Lindsay prepared to make final and binding recommendations on three disputed issues—drivers' commissions, union security and length of contract. The drivers returned to work after a brief strike when Lindsay agreed to settle all issues that union and management failed to resolve at the bargaining table.

Machinists Ratify New Boeing Pact

Seattle—Members of the Machinists at 38 Boeing Co. locations ratified, by a 68 percent margin, an agreement restoring a form of seniority to the union-management contract after a lapse of 18 years.

The vote was on acceptance of a manpower control system replacing the controversial "performance analysis" system of rating employes for promotion, demotion or layoff. Other parts of a three-year contract were adopted after a 19-day strike last fall, the IAM said.

Six Shopcrafts Serve Notices On Railroads

Chicago—All six AFL-CIO railroad shopcraft unions formally presented carrier managements across the nation with notices seeking previously announced wage and rule improvements, including a 20 percent across the board wage increase.

While the notices call for negotiations on the individual properties, they also ask that if progress is not made, the carriers arrange for creation of a national carriers' conference committee to continue the bargaining on an industry-wide scale.

The unions, members of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept., are the Machinists, the Boilermakers, the Int'l Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Sheet Metal Workers, the Railway Carmen and the Firemen & Oilers.

Under provisions of the Railway Labor Act, the carriers must reply to the notices within 10 days and initial negotiation conferences must be held within 30 days.

All wage and other proposals would go into effect Jan. 1, 1967, when present contracts expire.

"Officers of the shopcraft unions have agreed to process these notices much more rapidly than we have in the past," said Joseph W. Ramsey, Machinists vice president, "and we expect to reach the showdown point in negotiations before the end of the year."

Labor Editors Hear LBJ Affirm Program

the working man," the President said. "And it is the working man—the reader of your publications—who has the power to turn such ideas into programs."

Urging the labor editors to continue to support "the programs and legislation that keep America moving," Johnson said labor cannot content itself with "bread and butter issues" but must "join with us in the effort to improve our total environment."

"We are no longer content in America in achieving only 'the greatest good for the greatest number'," he continued. "Today the measure we apply to our national progress is how to improve the lot of all and especially of those who have the least.

"What we have done in the past in the service of our conscience is only prologue to what should now be done in the service of our vision. I urge you, as influential members of a great segment of American society, to turn your hearts, your minds and your pens to the enlargement of that vision."

Vice Pres. Humphrey called on the labor movement to help in the campaign to "make our cities more livable." He said the "real enemy within our gates is slumism, the insidious virus consuming city after city." Humphrey spoke of the rot in the cities' core, defining slumism as more than dilapidated buildings: "It is hopelessness, despair and hate."

Wirtz, in his keynote address to the conference, declared that "the almost unbelieveable progress" of the last 25 years is due to labor and the liberals.

"We need a new agenda today for labor and the liberals," he said.

Other government officials taking part in the briefing were Sec. of Commerce John T. Connor and Assistant Sec. of Commerce J. Herbert Holloman; Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development; Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant secretary of labor and special assistant to the President for consumer affairs; Deputy Defense Sec. Cyrus R. Vance; Commissioner Arthur M. Ross of the Bureau of Labor Statistics; Deputy Dir. Keith E. Adamson of the Voice of America; Richard I. Phillips, acting assistant secretary of state for public affairs; Robert H. Fleming, deputy press secretary to the President.

A panel headed by Stanley Ruttenberg, Labor Dept. manpower administrator and former AFL-CIO research director, discussed the problems of matching workers to jobs.

In his remarks to the labor editors, the President announced that he is "directing the secretary of health, education and welfare to make an intensified study of occupational health" and report "at the earliest possible moment on what this government can do."

There are two problems involved, the President said: to isolate and eliminate the hazards that now exist and to test new products and processes so that precautions can be taken to prevent health hazards before they occur.

The problem of the effects of a working man's job on his health "has been neglected too long. It must be neglected no longer," the President declared.

Prior to the Dept. of Labor briefing sessions, the ILPA heard reports from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and COPE Dir. Al Barkan on the current activities of Congress and the outlook for the 1966 congressional and state elections.

The editors received a report also on the initial studies involving community labor papers being conducted by the ILPA under the direction of Pres. Ray Davidson and Sec-Treas. Kenneth Fiester.

F. C. Barnes, Jr., Dies; Pulp-Sulphite Retiree

Apache Junction, Ariz.—Frank C. Barnes, Jr., treasurer of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers from 1944 until his retirement in 1960, died at his home here after a long illness. He was 71.

An ordained former minister of the Christian Church, he joined the union in Longview, Wash., in 1933 and served as an international representative and in the union's Research & Education Dept. before being elected treasurer. Surviving are his widow, Marguerite, and two children.

Focus Shifted to Guild In N.Y. Merger Dispute

New York—Mediator David L. Cole concentrated his efforts in the World Journal Tribune strike on settling the dispute between the publishers and the striking Newspaper Guild as the key to final agreement with all newspaper unions.

With five craft union agreements accomplished, Cole agreed with the Guild's chief negotiator that emphasis in negotiations should now shift to the Guild. He called for night meetings of subcommittees to speed things up.

Guild Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy had informed the mediator that the publishers "apparently want to wrap up agreements with all the craft unions first," but he noted that a whole new contract is at stake in the Guild talks "and that's a lot more complicated than any other problems."

World Journal Tribune Inc. had planned to start publication Apr. 25 but the Guild struck a day earlier because it had been unable to reach a contract agreement with the new corporation on the merging newspapers—the Herald Tribune, Journal American and the World-Telegram & Sun, whose five publications were to be reduced to three.

Major issues between the Guild and the publishers are the number of jobs to be retained by employes in Guild jurisdiction; the method of selecting those to be retained or laid off; and incentives for retirement or resignation, such as improved severance pay.

The Guild plans to canvass its 1,800 members on the three papers to find how many want to work for the new corporation if offered jobs. Some Guildsmen have obtained new jobs or temporary work and the Guild's position is that they should be permitted to resign with full severance pay if they wish.

The publishers first presented the striking union with a table of organization on a take it or leave it basis but since have retreated to the point where "we get a proposed new table of organization almost daily," Murphy said.

THE NAVY'S newest ship, the USS Samuel Gompers, was christened and launched at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard. The 643-foot destroyer tender, named for the founder of the American Federation of Labor, is scheduled for completion next year as the prototype of new support ships. At left is the vessel as it looked at the launching ceremony attended by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and top Navy officials. Above is an artist's conception of the completed vessel at sea. The 20,500-ton vessel will have a crew of 1,800. Schnitzler told the 400 persons attending the launching that Gompers knew the nation must remain strong to enjoy peace and freedom. "The AFL-CIO," he said, "holds that same conviction."

Union Pride Launches USS Gompers

SAMUEL GOMPERS

POSED FOR THE CHRISTENING are: Ass't. Navy Sec. Charles F. Baird; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Mrs. Murray Brown, matron of honor and Mrs. Holmes' sister; Mrs. Holmes; Rear Adm. Floyd B. Schultz, shipyard commander; Sec.-Treas. Schnitzler, and Labor Dept. Under Sec. John F. Henning. Also present were members of Congress.

STERN VIEW of the vessel and, above right, the spray of champagne as the traditional bottle is broken by Mrs. Joseph Holmes, granddaughter of Gompers. Six union presidents attended the christening. Union members at the naval shipyard built the vessel, and Wirtz observed that Gompers would have wanted the honor of the event to go to those "who have worked with their hands and their tools on this vessel." He added: "This day, this ship, the name it carries, belongs to these men and women."

TWO YEARS AGO, at the keel-laying ceremony, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Wirtz watched the early stage of the ship's construction. The Gompers will furnish both repair and hospital facilities for the fleet.

A Leaky Shelter

THERE IS a wide area of agreement among economists, industrial relations experts and social workers that the overhauling and modernization of the unemployment compensation system is essential to the nation's continuing prosperity and to the success of the new manpower policies of the 1960s.

It is shocking, therefore, to find that after a year of hearings and study, the House Ways & Means Committee has reported out a bill with very minimal improvements in a few areas and no change at all in the major area of establishing federal standards for benefits and duration.

The committee's failure looms larger in terms of the existing situation on jobless benefits. In the years since 1935 the program has become a patchwork of underfinanced and outdated state systems incapable of handling the basic problem for which it was designed.

More than 15 million workers are not covered by the system. Those who do draw benefits when unemployed average only one-third of the wage loss due to joblessness.

To meet these deficiencies and the need for extended benefits to cope with recession situations, the Administration developed a bill to strengthen and update the unemployment compensation system during a period when the system was not under stress.

Instead of the progress charted in the Administration bill, the committee reported out a measure that:

- Does not provide for any increase in benefit amount or duration of benefits and continues the wide variation in state laws—in effect allowing them to grow even wider as interstate competition for industry continues.

- Does not provide for any increase in weekly benefits during a recession period despite the fact that the average in some states is still under $25 a week and the duration of benefits is limited to 13 weeks and averages 9 or 10 weeks.

- Does not provide additional benefits for persons whose jobs are automated out of existence, or whose company has closed down, unless the labor market in the state as a whole is deteriorating.

- Does not provide any restraint on the trend toward penalty disqualification of total benefits during the period of unemployment —now practiced in 24 states.

- Does not prevent a state from continuing to exclude lower-paid workers and intermittent employes in order to offset costs of raising maximum benefits.

- Does not make any changes in the present experience rating system except to allow the states to apply it immediately to new employers even before an experience record is established.

- Does not continue the secretary of labor's authority to assure the conformity of state laws but gives this authority to the courts instead.

The committee has labored and brought forth a bill that would at the best add a few million persons to the system's coverage and house them in a patched-up, unsteady and leaky shelter that would give way in a recessionary gust.

Shrivers Cite Farm Workers As Symbol of Fight for Dignity

EUNICE KENNEDY SHRIVER

When my four young sons do grow up, I hope that their lives will be inspired by the dedication and by the energy of these great leaders of the American labor movement and by the patience, toil and sacrifice of the unsung heroes of the rank and file.

American trade unionism has brought a human life to millions of Americans. This is its chief glory. But the battle for human dignity is not yet over. I pray that my sons and yours may write the next chapter of this important history; that they too will be men of faith and men of change who will broaden the horizons of hope for those who have lived too long outside the frontiers of hope represented by trade unionism.

I hope that our sons will be men whose vision carries them also into a third world—the world which still awaits its revolution of hope. That world is deprived of almost everything which we take for granted—outside the economy, without a vote, deprived of adequate housing and medical care and destined to squalor and early death. Pres. Kennedy once said those who make peaceful revolution impossible, make violent revolution inevitable. I hope that my sons will grow up to be men like Mr. Murray and Mr. Green, men of peace and men of change.

SARGENT SHRIVER

We thought that tonight we would like to exemplify in some way not only the words that Eunice has spoken about how we hope that our children will grow up, but also to exemplify in some specific, clear manner our feelings about Philip Murray, William Green and the labor movement.

You've heard lots of protest, of course, about the war on poverty and other activities. I've heard a few in this room as somebody pointed out to me. But I believe that when the sharecroppers, for example, come up to Washington to picket because housing in Mississippi is bad that it's rather significant that they picket us rather than the Housing Agency. When the poor people come to Washington to protest that not enough jobs have been created, that they come to OEO and picket us. When they come to Washington and criticize the fact that not enough money has been put into the war against poverty, they complain to us. I think it shows that they believe that over at our building somebody will listen to them and then maybe somebody will do something about it.

I'd like to think, I hope that those hopes exemplified by the picketing are not doomed to frustration, not because of me or my wife, not because of any single government official or any single government program, not even because of the whole federal establishment.

We believe, and I believe, that there is a movement abroad in this land stirring in some strange places, the voices of silence beginning to speak. In Appalachia, in the vineyards of the West, a storm is brewing. The voice, I suggest, of the Farm Workers Union—the voice of union men everywhere and from that sun-parched valley in California that voice of the farm worker is giving the lie to some critics of the labor movement.

We have all heard those critics who say that unions are only for white people. Or that unions are only for the sons and relatives of union men. Or that unions are a closed society, interested only in themselves and not in the poor. Well, the voice from California says otherwise. It says that the poor everywhere are the concern of the unions.

Today the struggle is still going on. It's the same struggle that William Green and Philip Murray devoted their lives to. It's the same struggle that George Meany and Joe Beirne and all of you at this table and the whole AFL-CIO are fighting today. Eunice and I may have come to this struggle a little late, but we wish to pay tribute to the heroic efforts of the leaders of the past and of the striking farm workers today. We would like to donate this award to assist the families of those strikers, to link arms with those who are in the forefront of the battle and to union men everywhere who are rising in a mighty movement to trample out the vineyards where the grapes of wrath are stored. To us that's a new battle hymn of the republic. A new battle—the war on poverty—a new hymn to the republic undergoing pain, the labor pains, of a new birth of freedom.

Peace Corps Seeks to Repair U.S. Neglect of Pacific Islands

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

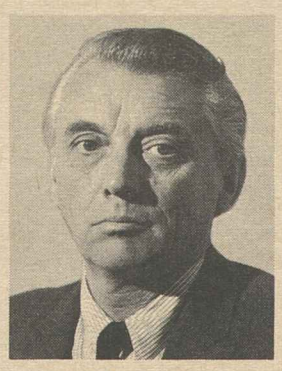
ONLY IN AMERICA, as Harry Golden might say. While everything seems to be coming ominously unstuck in Viet Nam, the Peace Corps has mounted a crash program in recruitment to deal with an embarrassing problem of neglect in another bailiwick of U.S. responsibility called Micronesia, a scattering of islands and atolls in the western Pacific just this side of the Philippines and Japan.



Morgan

If you include the water in between, the area described by the 2,141 land dots of Micronesia —97 of them now inhabited—is larger than the continental United States, which holds the real estate under United Nations trusteeship, and there's the rub. Despite the image of American magnanimity and concern for have-not peoples, conditions are described as "terrible" for the 88,000 inhabitants of Micronesia. Programs of aid and comfort are not simplified by the fact that the Micronesians, rather homely, distant cousins of the Polynesians, speak nine languages with dialectical variations. But the pressure of criticism over their plight has been growing in the U.N. Last spring island health officials sent a petition of grievances to the U.N. Trusteeship Council which dispatched a World Health Organization team to inspect. The team's report—stressing shortages in health facilities and personnel and, presumably, shocking instances of neglect of the natives—will be debated in the Trusteeship Council, probably next month.

It was to muffle the expected explosive effect of the WHO findings and to take sweeping corrective measures at long last that the Peace Corps got into the act. Once the new Peace Corps director, Jack Hood Vaughn, U.N. Ambassador Goldberg, Pres. Johnson and Interior Secretary Udall, whose department, paradoxically, administers far-away Micronesia, were alerted to the dimensions of the emergency, things moved swiftly.

Two waves of volunteers, totaling some 750, are being recruited in a two-week campaign that ends tomorrow. Already responses have been little short of astonishing. One pitch mentioned "tropical islands, enchanted evenings, swaying palms and sun-kissed maidens" but in the next breath spoke of bad roads, broken sanitary systems, disease, and water shortages, in short, trouble in paradise. In a reversal of Peace Corps policy, reenlistments were encouraged for another two-year hitch and several volunteers finishing their first one said "OK." The Peace Corps has received 1,000 applications plus 1,000 inquiries in response to appeals placed in 243 college newspapers.

One Peace Corps official believes the huge interest was stimulated by the call to do a specific job in a specific place. This has not been done before but the approach will be used in future recruitment campaigns.

PACIFIC VETERANS of World War II will remember—or want to forget—some Micronesian landmarks. Discovered by Magellan in 1521 and loosely named the Paradise Islands because the Portuguese explorer's scurvy-stricken crews found fresh fruit there, the main groupings called the Marianas, the Carolines and the Marshalls were built up by the Japanese in the 30s as military and supply bases. Americans had to fight for them bitterly in the agonizing Pacific campaign. Once won, Saipan and Tinian in the Marianas were used as bases for the B-29 flying fortresses which bombed Japan. The Enola Gay took off from Tinian to drop the A-bomb on Hiroshima. Bikini, in the Marshalls, was the site of the first U.S. hydrogen-bomb blast. Palau, Yap and Truk in the Carolines were fiercely contested in the war.

The battle now is against human rot, as a top-heavy bureaucracy moves slowly among the rusting hulks of coral-encrusted tanks and rusting skeletons of Japanese and American planes. An estimated 35 percent of the inhabitants of the island of Yap are alcoholics. A missionary told Washington Post Correspondent Edward Behr, who wrote a revealing reportage on Micronesia, that the natives get drunk because they have nothing else to do.

On Yap, flints and stone money are still used. On Truk and Palau, Behr found impatience with economic stagnation but no thoughts of political independence. At their present stage of development such a breakaway by Micronesians would be sheer folly but the U.S., the world's staunchest advocate of self-determination, is bound to be taunted and not only by Communists for not preparing them for progress. Sen. Hiram Fong of Hawaii has made the geographically ambitious proposal that the islands be integrated with the Hawaiian archipelago.

There are the inevitable strategic problems. The military is loath to give up even vicarious title to such stepping stones, however God-forsaken, but heavy subsidization would be required if the trusteeship were to continue. To open up the area to foreign capital would appear to mean primarily Japanese capital to explore and exploit minerals and marine resources.

Meanwhile, in the undying words of the old travelogues, as the sun sets on Micronesia we say farewell and wish the Peace Corps good luck.

Muskie Anti-Pollution Measure Held 'Honest Response' to Need

AN AFL-CIO spokesman has called the Muskie Anti-Water Pollution Bill "an honest response to a crying need" for water conservation.

"There is plenty of water in this country," said AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty. The real need, he noted, is effective controls and intelligent use of existing supplies. Doherty's statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, heard weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that although "great progress" has been made in research and planning under existing anti-pollution legislation, "I don't think that a single mile of America's rivers has been cleaned as a result of any legislation that is now on the books."

Money is the major roadblock in pollution control, Doherty observed, pointing out that many state and local governments feel they have reached the maximum tax level. The bill introduced by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D., Me.), contrasted with other proposals, "makes more money available to communities for cleaning up their waters," he said.

HE REJECTED the concept of "effluent charges" contained in the Administration's anti-pollution measure, under which fees or fines would be levied against industries that discharge pollutants into lakes, rivers and other waste sources.

That would amount to a "license to pollute," he charged, and the "more profitable industries will pay the charge" and go right on polluting the streams.

Reporters questioning Doherty on Labor News Conference, a public service production of the AFL-CIO, were Orr Kelly of the Washington Evening Star and Eric Wentworth of the Washington Post.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE IMPORTANT NEWS in the May 24 primaries came from Florida, where Democratic voters kicked incumbent Gov. Haydon Burns out of office and nominated Mayor Robert King High of Miami as his successor.

The Oregon primaries produced two unusually well qualified candidates for the Senate seat being vacated by Sen. Maurine Neuberger—Gov. Mark Hatfield for the Republicans and Rep. Robert B. Duncan for the Democrats.

A "peace in Viet Nam" issue was involved in the Democratic Oregon race because Sen. Wayne Morse returned to the state to campaign hard against Duncan—a supporter of Pres. Johnson's policy—and in favor of former Democratic State Chairman Howard Morgan. Rep. Edith Green, senior member of the state's House delegation, also allowed herself to be announced belatedly as in favor of Morgan.

It didn't make any difference; the activities of Morse and Mrs. Green simply proved once again that politicians cannot transfer their private popularity to other candidates. Duncan swamped Morgan at the polls.

The Florida primary between Burns and Mayor High was something else again.

It was a replay of a 1964 contest between the same two candidates, with radically reversed results, and one can merely observe that Burns, an old-line southern politician, did just about everything wrong as he tried to cope with the fact that a great many Negroes are now registered in Florida.

Burns in the preliminary parts of the campaign (the May 24 race was a run-off; they always have run-offs in Florida) talked like a governor who acknowledged the rising aspirations and power of Negro citizens. But he was shocked by the size of High's vote in the first primary and he changed his tactics for the run-off.

He looked up at Alabama and he tried to "pull a Wallace." He charged that High was getting a Negro "bloc vote" and suggested that the natural answer was for white voters to do what Alabamians did—muster a white "bloc vote."

Well, High did get a heavy Negro vote, just as Lyndon B. Johnson did two years ago against Republican presidential nominee Barry Goldwater.

But a funny thing happened. White liberal citizens also stuck to High, who had shown himself a modern-minded mayor who thought there was something more important in political issues today than "bloc voting." High even built up majorities in the up-state areas where race issues have been presumed to be decisive.

So Florida is not Alabama. The thought may be advanced that a number of other southern states are not like Alabama—to wit, the Carolinas, Tennessee and Texas, and maybe Virginia for good measure. We'll have to wait until November to find out about Georgia.

THE PRIMARIES, otherwise, produced the familiar mixed bag of results that justify no conclusions whatsoever about national trends.

In the Oregon 3rd Congressional District vacated by Duncan for the Senate race, a "peace" candidate, former Rep. Charles Porter, won the Democratic nomination.

In Kentucky, Republicans renominated the highly respected John Sherman Cooper for the Senate—and split their votes right down the middle in two rejiggered Louisville congressional districts. They chose a moderate, former Mayor William Cowger, in the 3rd District, but in the 4th District turned to former Rep. M. G. Snyder, a pro-Goldwater spokesman, who was unhorsed in the Johnson landslide two years ago.

Viet Nam, if it is still an issue at all in November, may be an issue between Hatfield and Duncan in Oregon. The Republican governor has been critical of Johnson's policy and Duncan is committed to it.

THE MUSKIE Anti-Water Pollution Bill is "an honest response to a crying need" for water conservation, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty (center) told Eric Wentworth, (left) of the Washington Post and Orr Kelly of the Washington Evening Star on the AFL-CIO public service interview, Labor News Conference, heard over the Mutual radio network.

Consumer Pinch Prime Cause Of Slight Decline in Auto Sales

By Sidney Margolius

BUSINESS LEADERS are trying to blame what they call a "slump" in auto sales on the current criticisms of unsafe features of modern cars.

Actually there is no real slump. After two years of runaway sales, and a busy winter, auto sales have dropped a little but are still very good.

And there are other reasons for what moderate drop has occurred. One is the higher cost of financing cars this year. Another is the general inflationary trend, especially higher prices of basic necessities of food, shelter and medical care and the increased social security deductions this year from pay checks.

Earnings of industrial workers have not been large enough this year to offset these increases. Spendable earnings actually decreased late this winter, the Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported.

Sales of Corvairs especially have been hard hit because of the publicity given to accidents involving earlier models of this car.

In any case, some larger discounts now are available on both new 1966 and used cars as the result of the moderate sales drop. The 1966's already have had some of the safety devices added that will be more widespread on the 1967 cars. Further improvements are expected in 1968 on the basis of new requirements by the General Services Administration.

The auto industry is still insisting that drivers are responsible for most accidents rather than the cars. Of course, drivers and unsafe roads cause most of the accidents. But what is worrying everybody is that the way cars are designed increases the severity of accidents and the harm to the occupants, and that the cars themselves in some cases have been largely responsible for even the accidents.

One point all drivers should realize from the revelations of unsafe cars, is the need to keep cars in good operating condition, with regular attention to brakes, tires, wheel alignment and other critical areas.

It is especially vital to heed immediately any notices from dealers or the factory to bring your car in for correction of defects.

There have been more such "recalls" than the public ever realized before Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.) started his safety investigation. In a little more than seven years, some 9 million cars have been recalled for correction of various defects. That's almost 20 percent of all the cars manufactured in that period.

Not all of these defects involved safety. Some affected conveniences or economy. But you always should assume that any notice from a dealer or factory to bring your car in for inspection and correction of defects, does involve safety, auto clubs are warning members.

In fact, as far as this writer can judge from the reports released by the manufacturers to the Senate committee, a very large number if not most of the recalls do involve safety. Some of the most frequent recalls have been for defects in brake systems, steering and suspension systems.

The safety investigation really revealed a widespread lack of genuine testing of cars, and inadequate inspection before delivery. It is unbelievable that a big company can claim it tests all models thoroughly before putting them into production when you get examples such as the 1961 Pontiac Tempests. They were found to cause hang-ups on bumps and railroad crossings because the front-end cross members were too low.

As a result of the investigation, the Senate Commerce Committee is considering proposing legislation that would make it mandatory for the federal government to establish safety standards, rather than leave it to the discretion of the secretary of commerce, as the Administration has proposed. The manufacturers also would be required to notify owners of any defects by registered mail.

On the record, any car driver will be grateful for the enactment of these stronger regulations.

30-Year Kohler War Vital Case History

ON DECEMBER 17, 1965, the Kohler strike was finally won by the Auto Workers. The conflict, involving the Kohler of Kohler plumbing firm in Wisconsin, had been a bitter, 11-year struggle which became one of the great causes of the labor movement in the 1950s.

Actually, the Kohler strike was of far longer duration—a 30-year labor-management war. The first battle opened in 1934 and lasted until 1941. In this engagement the workers were represented by AFL Federal Labor Union No. 18545.

The period between 1941 and 1954 was one of "cold war" in which the workers planned for unionism and the company armed itself to fight organization of its employes. There was even a preliminary skirmish in 1897 when the National Molders Union struck against the inhuman working conditions and a 50 percent wage cut.

A scholarly but intensely dramatic study of Kohler and conflict, describing in detail each crisis in the 30-year war, is now off the presses. The author is Prof. Walter H. Uphoff, who not only grew up near Kohler in Sheboygan County, Wis., but has long been considered a knowledgeable authority on labor-management relations. He is now director of labor education at the University of Colorado.

Few, if any, strikes in history have ever received such careful, detailed documentation of events—development by development—as Uphoff has given the Kohler strike.

Strikes are never just a handful of people on both sides. Uphoff deals with so many people that he has provided a cast: Kohler personnel and attorneys, union leaders and attorneys, federal officials and staff. He designates persons engaged in the first strike, in the second and in both.

Dozens of sharp photographs help to capture some of the spirit of both strikes to enable the reader to get a better "feel" of the cast and the events in which they participated.

The most dramatic and tragic event of the first strike was the ruthless action of Kohler deputies to keep strikers and their supporters out of the plant after the strikers had been provoked to the point of outrage. Writes Uphoff:

"Evidently some of the deputies ran out of tear gas and resorted to their guns shortly before 9 p.m. When the shooting stopped, two men had been fatally wounded and 47 others were shot, most of them in the back. . . ."

AS DISCLOSED in the McClellan hearings, in both strikes Kohler collected a major arsenal of arms. Although there were numerous cases of entanglement between adversaries on both sides, there were no fatalities in the second strike.

The Uphoff book has value not only as a dramatic history of labor-management conflict, but also gives deep insight into some of the major problems in this area. One such problem is summed up in this quote from UAW Regional Dir. Harvey Kitzman:

"It took only 29 days for Kohler Co. to get an ironclad injunction against its workers and Local 833, but it took the NLRB six years, four months and 21 days to tell the company that it was guilty of unfair labor practices."

What is quite revealing, too, is the role that a company union plays in doing the bidding of anti-union management. In the case of Kohler, however, the company union could take its role only so long and eventually joined forces with the UAW to bring genuine unionism to the workers.

Uphoff's study provides a deep insight into labor-management conflict which should be required reading not only for trade unionists but for management. This book reveals the costly miscalculations of management, its crude tactics and unrelenting policies that cost it dearly in the end—the price of 30 years of anti-unionism. (PAI).

Supermarket Offers Substitute For That Trip to Monte Carlo

By Jane Goodsell

REMEMBER WHEN we used to get our jollies from filling up a book of trading stamps? Seems pretty tame compared to the get-rich-quick opportunities these days. The current scene throbs with the feverish excitement of the casino at Monte Carlo, and it takes a cooler head than mine not to get carried away by the jackpots that are up for grabs.

A trip to the supermarket, which used to be a tedious, ho-hum chore, is now as exhilarating as a day at the races. When the clerk at the checkout stand hands me my Wash-Off patch, my pulses pound with excitement. I dash off, bursting with impatience to hold it under running water to find out if it's the 0-5 I need to win the $500 game of Bonus Bingo.

At the grocery store down the street, I try my luck in the Red Carpet Sweepstakes and, at the station where I stop for gas, I take a whirl at the Americana Game. My eyes glitter with anticipation as I tear open the envelope the attendant hands me. If it's the right-hand half of a bill picturing the Wright Brothers' airplane, I collect $500! No? Well, better luck next time (which will be tomorrow since I buy gas two gallons at a time to give myself more chances) and, anyway, I still have plenty of opportunities to strike it rich this very afternoon.

Incidentally, I must tell you about an experience I had a few days ago. I'd dropped in at my General Tire dealer's shop to check the serial number on my car registration form with the official list of winning numbers and, halfway down the list, I found a number that matched mine exactly—except that two digits were transposed. If the two had been a three, and vice versa, I'd have won a thousand dollars! What a moment that was! I still get dizzy spells, just thinking about it.

BUT THEN, my head spins most of the time these days. Every time I pick up a magazine, I see those advertisements screaming at me to Tear Out! Fill In! Send Away! Mail Now! This Coupon May Be Worth $25,000! When I lie in bed at night, visions of first, second and third prizes (mink stoles! Ford Thunderbirds! color TV sets! diamond dinner rings!) dance through my head.

My daytime thoughts, which used to focus on lackluster problems such as what-to-have-for-dinner, are now as bedazzling as the vision of Kubla Khan. Would I prefer to win a millionaire's vacation in Europe with a pocketful of travelers cheques or a $5,000 shopping spree in my choice of America's most luxurious shops? If I should win the Loving Care Magic Word Sweepstakes, should I choose $15,000 in cash or a second honeymoon anywhere in the world?

The Dow-Jones averages may be in a slump, but I'm not. I'm planning to make my fortune the easy, fun way by winning a lottery.

Vehicle Inspection Urged:

Rubber Union Backs U.S. Tire Safety Bill

The union which represents substantially all of the workers in the U.S. tire manufacturing industry has endorsed federal standards of tire safety and has called for a national tire inspection program.

The United Rubber Workers has a "vital interest" in tire safety, President George Burdon told the House Committee on Interstate & Foreign Commerce, "because our members are directly involved in the production of automotive tires, and because all of us in the URW are distressed, as citizens, over the growing holocaust in deaths and injuries on the nation's highways."

The URW leader urged Congress to go beyond the requirements in the tire safety bill and establish a program for periodic vehicle safety inspection which would include inspection of all vehicle tires.

Burdon pointed out that union workers produce tires under production and technical standards set forth by the company that are not subject to negotiation or collective bargaining.

"We put our best effort into each tire which we build," but the speed, the specifications and the quality of materials are the sole prerogative of management, he said.

The union conditioned its support on assurance to union rubber workers that their pride of craftsmanship is not sacrificed to "the common denominator of the market place" and assurance to the public that it is buying a quality product that the United Rubber Workers can be associated with in good faith, Burdon declared.

The bill would establish minimum safety and performance standards for automobile tires, requires that all tires be labeled with safety information and be graded according to quality. It passed the Senate Mar. 29.

"Our concern is both for the job security of tire company employes who are members of the URW, and for the future of these companies as represented by the managements responsible for their operation," Burdon said.

The requirement for safety labeling will serve to end the confusion among consumers as to "super-safety" and "roadability" claims of various brands of tires, he added.

Similarly, in the grading of tires the consumer is entitled to the clearest possible language tell-him what he is getting. "Catch phrases are no substitute for a consistent and industry-wide terminology by which the automobile owner may make an intelligent decision in purchasing a tire," he stated.

Burdon discounted industry fears of grading, stating that "we believe that this provision will lead to clarification—not to regimentation."

The URW president said he supports "a rational approach to the solutions of the hazards involved in the private operation of a motor vehicle." When a private automobile enters a public highway it becomes a part of the community's public transportation system. "We, therefore, support safety standards for motor vehicles," which, to be meaningful, must include periodic inspection of the vehicles and the tires on which they run, he declared.

WORLD-WIDE gathering of unions that bargain with General Electric Co. brought together delegates from the Intl. Metalworkers' Federation and steering committee of the AFL-CIO's eight-union Committee on Collective Bargaining. With Spanish, English and French interpreters present, delegates reported on GE practices here and abroad. The IMF unionists later attended U.S. union meetings in Schenectady, N.Y., and Atlanta, Ga.

GE Workers of 10 Countries Map Program of World-wide Solidarity

General Electric workers in 10 countries expressed solidarity with the efforts of eight cooperating AFL-CIO unions to raise wages and improve working conditions.

A Washington, D. C., conference called by the Intl. Metalworkers Federation was attended by union representatives from GE plants in Australia, Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan, Turkey, Colombia, Uruguay, Venezuela and Mexico.

Adolphe Graedel, IMF general secretary and conference chairman, told newsmen that the visiting unionists were pleased with the bargaining unity achieved by the eight U.S. unions and the steps towards a similar relationship being taken in Canada.

In reply to questions, he said that if a strike in the U.S. proved unavoidable and GE tried to transfer struck work from one country to another, the IMF would "not remain inactive."

Graedel stressed that the meeting had been held in a "constructive" spirit aimed chiefly at improving collective bargaining. He termed strikes "a last resort."

At the Washington conference, conducted with simultaneous translation in three languages, Machinists Pres. P. L. Siemiller told the visitors that a typical GE tactic to keep wages low is to tell workers, "we won't be able to compete with labor in other countries." But, he added, "this is labor they employ. We are not competing against workers in other countries. We are competing with our own companies."

In a dramatic display of unity among the cooperating unions, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers opened the first of a series of "grass roots" meetings in Schenectady, N.Y.—where the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers bargains for most GE employes.

A day later, IUE Pres. Paul Jennings was the scheduled speaker at a meeting of workers in Atlanta, Ga., an IBEW stronghold.

Besides the IUE, IBEW and Machinists, the cooperating U.S. unions are the Auto Workers, Technical Engineers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers and Flint Glass Workers.

The IMF conference, many of whose delegates attended the subsequent unity meetings in Schenectady and Atlanta, issued a statement noting that the discussions had covered collective bargaining problems with GE around the world. They dealt with "the impact on national economies and on workers' jobs of the movement, or threats of movement, of production from one place to another."

The delegates joined in urging trade unions representing General Electric workers in every country "to join with the IMF in taking the necessary measures, within the framework of the national and international trade union movement, to expand the useful exchange of information, contact and mutual support, on a continuing basis, in order effectively to advance the interests of GE workers everywhere."

Government Urged to Bar Contracts With Firms That Defy Labor Laws

Labor subcommittee, also urged that the NLRB be given authority to assess double or triple damages against deliberate or flagrant law violators so that a violation "will hurt where it counts—in the pocketbook."

The Stevens firm, he said, has so far achieved its objective—to keep the union out. Its violations of the law will, he declared, "be punished by a wrist-slapping" unless the laws are changed.

The council statement said "it is clearly a gross violation of the public interest" for the federal government to enrich a corporation which "flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully" defies a federal statute.

For more than three years, the council noted, "Stevens has openly and continuously fought against the right of its workers to organize" for collective bargaining, using tactics "which have been outlawed for more than 30 years."

Government contractors "should be required to respect the federal labor law, just as they are required to comply" with minimum wage standards and executive orders forbidding discrimination, said the Executive Council, adding:

"It is our view that a company that is openly contemptuous of any federal law—as is Stevens and others—should be disqualified as a federal contractor."

Observing that currently the Defense Dept. policy is not to consider the labor relations conduct of government contractors, the council said "this policy is clearly in error and should be reversed."

The power to establish standards "already reposes in the Dept. of Defense and we urge Sec. McNamara to exercise it." Also, the council went on, "we urge Pres. Johnson to make sure the department protects the public interest."

The council called on Congress to reinforce the executive power of the President by amending the tax laws "so that penalties imposed upon those who break the law can no longer be claimed as 'business expenses' for tax purposes."

The Defense Dept. meanwhile issued a statement that a reply to the council's appeal was being prepared but citing a General Accounting Office ruling that violation of a law that is not part of a contract cannot be "an excuse for denying a contract."

The Stevens firm is headed by Robert T. Stevens, Army secretary in former Pres. Eisenhower's cabinet in 1953-55.

The Executive Council recited this history of Stevens's attempt to prevent its workers from joining the Textile Workers Union of America or any other union:

The National Labor Relations Board last Mar. 22 found the Stevens firm guilty of spying on, coercing and firing employes in three of its 27 plants in resisting union organization and ordered the reinstatement with backpay of 71 fired workers.

The board, ordering the firm to undo the effect of massive and deliberate unfair labor practices, went beyond the usual remedies of reinstatement and notice-posting by directing Stevens to mail notices to the 40,000 employes in all its plants; to call employe meetings during work time and to read the notices; and to give the union access to plant bulletin boards for a year.

Stevens appealed the order to the courts but "did not rely on judicial relief," the council noted. It said that, while the first discharge cases were proceeding to the board hearing level, "Stevens fired another group of workers, including all who testified for the union" at NLRB examiner's hearings.

"The trial examiner castigated the company and called on the NLRB to devise new remedies to meet such persistent defiance of the law," said the statement. While the second set of hearings was going on, "a third round of dismissals and other coercive acts took place."

In the face of this record, and additional charges of conspiracy to rig prices, Stevens has "remained a major supplier of textile materials to the Dept. of Defense," the council charged.

IUE Local Leader Wins Education Internship

Pres. Harold Alpert of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 244, Milford, Conn., has been named winner of the 1966 Labor Education Internship sponsored by Local 189, American Federation of Teachers.

The award entitles Alpert, who also is chairman of the Greater Bridgeport AFL-CIO's Education Committee, to eight weeks of training in labor education financed by an $800 scholarship.

Cement Union Wins Over District 50

Riverside, Calif.—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers smashed an effort by the unaffiliated Mine Workers District 50 to take bargaining rights at the new Certain-Teed Products Co. plant here, winning a National Labor Relations Board election by a 57-1 vote. Fourteen workers voted for no union.

District 50 had negotiated with the company prior to the start of operations and emerged with an inferior contract, which included a union shop, that the NLRB ruled was not a bar to an election, the Cement Workers reported. The plant makes soil pipe.

The company, the union said, held captive audience meetings, sent foremen to make house calls and mailed letters to employes in its unsuccessful effort to defeat the Cement Workers.

Labor Seeks Job Health Fund Boost

Labor strongly urged the Senate Appropriations Committee to add funds for expanded occupational health programs to the House-passed budget for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Edward Lashman asked that a start be made this year to carry out an advisory committee's recommendations for a five-year program aimed at preventing job-caused illness among workers.

The budget request for occupational health is only about half the amount necessary for this purpose, Lashman noted.

He asked also that congressional committees make clear to the HEW Dept. their opposition to any reorganization of the Public Health Service which would downgrade programs dealing with environmental health. He suggested the upgrading of the present division of occupational health to bureau status.

Factory Injuries Rise in 1965

The work-injury frequency rate in factories rose slightly in 1965—not uncommon during periods of increasing economic activity—despite a decline of 7 percent in the last quarter, the Labor Dept. reported.

The rate for the year stood at 12.9 compared with 12.7 for 1964 and 11.9 in 1963, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics announced. The fourth quarter rate was 12.4, compared with 13.4 in the third quarter.

Housing, Jury Bias Hit As 'Large, Acute Evils'

necessary to insure rights, he said.

The fair housing guarantees in the new civil rights bill have the backing of the AFL-CIO in convention resolution, Biemiller stated. Laws already on the books of states and municipalities to outlaw discrimination in housing were placed there with "the full backing, and often on the initiative of, organized labor," he said.

"Equal access to housing, regardless of race, creed or national origin in a free market should be a part of the American way of life," he declared. "Equal opportunity in housing is intimately linked to equal opportunity in schooling and to other civil rights."

Testifying to one of the arguments used by the bill's opponents, Biemiller declared that there is widespread misconception that property values will drop whenever non-white families move into a previously all-white neighborhood.

"There is no documentary evidence to support this contention," he said, "it is a myth that has been completely exploded."

The AFL-CIO spokesman cited a study made for the Commission on Race & Housing of 20 neighborhoods in major cities during a 12-year period. The study disclosed that when a neighborhood became integrated there was more often a price improvement or stability than any price weakening. The report found that "85 percent of the cases either showed upward improvement or remained stable," he reported.

Jury Bias

On selecting juries, Biemiller declared that there is strong need to outlaw discrimination against Negroes and women as well as that which is practiced against persons in low income groups. "Discrimination on grounds of economic status is just as violative of the equal protection of the laws as discrimination on grounds of race or sex."

The AFL-CIO, he said, approves the bill's provision removing present limitations on the power of the attorney general to initiate lawsuits. It should be the duty of the federal government to carry the burden of "vindicating these constitutional rights," Biemiller declared, and not be the responsibility of individuals or interested organizations, regardless of whether or not they can afford the expense of protracted lawsuits.

He cited an instance where parents in a South Carolina community sued to force admission of their children into segregrated schools. Today, 17 years later, when all of their children except one are above school age, the litigation is continuing and the end is not in sight.

The bill's proposal for dealing with crimes against Negroes and civil rights workers will remain, even if enacted, a difficult matter for federal prosecutors, Biemiller observed.

A prosecutor will be required to first prove, as is generally required, that the accused intended to harm his victim; the prosecutor must then also prove that the assailant acted because of the victim's "race, color, religion or national origin" while engaged in the exercise of his rights.

"Something needs to be done," Biemiller warned, noting that the 1965 Report of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights had set forth in "horrifying detail" the "shocking breakdown of law enforcement in the South."

The AFL-CIO spokesman rejected the contention that Congress is tired of civil rights legislation and prefers that 1966 be a year of stock-taking.

"We just don't believe those reports," he said. The "mood of the American people" is for equality of opportunity and we intend to help achieve it, he declared.

Wirtz Shifts Rule Banning Race Records

The federal government will identify employes by race as a means of combatting discrimination and uncovering problem areas, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced.

Wirtz reversed his department's four-year-old ban on racial identification on job records—including records maintained by the U. S. Employment Service and its network of state offices.

He told a meeting of the NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund that statistical data on employment by race is often needed as part of an "affirmative action campaign" against discrimination.

"I am sick and tired," he said, "of the false piety of those who answer inquiries about the racial aspects of their employment or membership practices with the bland, smug answer that 'we don't know because of course we wouldn't keep records on anything like that.' "

Wirtz said no person would be required to list his race against his will and exceptions would be made at present in states with laws prohibiting racial identification on employment records.

Retail-Wholesale Union Cites Organizing Progress in South

By Gervase N. Love

Miami Beach, Fla.—The Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union has had "amazing success" in organizing during the past year in Georgia and Alabama, Pres. Max Greenberg told some 600 delegates to the union's 10th constitutional convention.

In cooperation with civil rights forces, Greenberg said in his keynote address, the RWDSU has "succeeded in channeling the energies of Negro workers" to the point that "the example set by these most exploited and most downtrodden workers has inspired white workers as well."

"Shops with a total of 5,000 workers have been organized in the past year in such places as Selma and Greensboro, Ala., Griffin, Ga., various towns in Florida and other communities which have never before felt the impact of unionism," he said.

"The success of these efforts is a tribute to the leaders and members of our southern affiliates."

Executive Sec. Jack Paley reported that the union has 239 locals in the United States and Canada. Since the previous convention four years ago, he said, 29 new locals were chartered and 31 went out of existence, half by merger with other locals and the rest in small plants that went out of business or fled to non-union areas.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, making his second speech of the day to a union convention, ridiculed talk of "tired blood" in the labor movement and declared that "most of what we've gained in the last couple of years is what labor has been fighting for for years—and much of the leadership over those years has come from the labor movement."

Earlier in the day he had spoken to the Clothing Workers' convention in Atlantic City, N. J. He left the RWDSU session to fly to St. Louis to appear before the Hotel & Restaurant Employes convention. In 16 days, he said, he was traveling 27,000 miles and making nine speeches in six states and two countries.

Wirtz read to the delegates a message of greeting from Pres. Johnson, who hailed the union's contribution to the "dramatic social and economic progress" the nation has made, and to the country's high level of prosperity.

The President pointed out, however, that much remains to be done and declared he would "welcome the continued efforts" of the RWDSU to built the Great Society.

Wirtz, who said he came "to talk over some of our common problems," recounted the country's economic and social gains since the last RWDSU convention in 1962, briefly discussed "where we are" and outlined "where we're going."

In examining the legislative picture, he said flatly that "I don't like the denial of the right to vote" on repeal of Section 14(b).

"But I can't count that year entirely lost despite the failure to repeal 14(b)," he added, "because we've had solid evidence of the resurgence of the organizing spirit, especially in the areas in which this union operates."

He urged letter-writing campaigns to members of Congress in support of consumer legislation, which he said would be the equivalent of a 10 to 20 percent wage increase for those at poverty levels, and for federal unemployment compensation standards.

Wirtz was given a standing ovation when he pleaded for a rethinking of the liberal position and a "new agenda" based on today's needs instead of the "desperation" philosophy of the 1930s.

Greenberg and Wirtz touched common ground in their approach to civil rights, emphasizing the need of translating legal gains into social and economic realities for members of minority groups who have suffered from discrimination and inadequate training and education.

Dir. Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education declared that in the coming congressional and gubernatorial elections the labor movement "faces a crisis of the first magnitude."

The convention COPE committee filed two reports—one for the U.S. and the other for Canada, where the union has 20,000 members. The U.S. section, headed by Vice Pres. Jack Kirkwood, outlined a detailed program for increased political action aimed at strengthening the liberal and labor forces in Congress. The Canadian section, led by Hugh Buchanan, RWDSU supervisor in Ontario, called for a still further increase of affiliations to the New Democratic Party.

Gen. Sec. Juul Paulsen of the Intl. Union of Food & Allied Workers, with which the RWDSU is affiliated, explained the functioning of the international trade secretariat, its services to members and its aid to unions in developing nations. He thanked Greenberg, a member of the IUFAW Management Committee, or executive board for his "never-failing cooperation."

Facing the delegates was an executive board recommendation that the per capita payments, unchanged since 1958, be raised from 85 cents to $1.15 per member per month. Among speakers still to be heard were Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.); Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, Dir. Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, Executive Dir. Jack Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Assistant Dir. H. H. Bookbinder of the Office of Economic Opportunity and Bayard Rustin, civil rights leader.

Rights Leaders Gather For White House Parley

Organized labor will participate in the White House Conference on Civil Rights, called to seek the means to assist the American Negro toward practical achievement of his newly-won legislative rights.

The June 1-2 conference was conceived a year ago by Pres. Johnson, who proposed that scholars, experts, Negro leaders and government officials gather to follow up civil rights legislation with new programs "to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally to achieve."

The conference is viewed as an attempt to involve the total society in the Negro revolution and will consider proposals in four broad categories—administration of justice, education, housing, and economic security and welfare.

The 2,400 persons to whom invitations have been sent are said to represent a cross-section of the nation. Each will be given a chance to speak out on any proposal, on or off the agenda, and whatever consensus is reached will be transmitted to the President, state and local governments and to a wide range of private interests for action.

Arrangements for the conference began in November when a planning session, in which organized labor was a participant, developed recommendations reflecting a variety of viewpoints.

In February the President named AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph as honorary chairman of a 30-member council which was given the responsibility for developing a substantive agenda for the first civil rights conference under White House sponsorship.

Johnson, in his speech at Howard University which announced the conference, said the theme and title would be "To Fulfill These Rights."

The conference's objective would be, the President declared, "to move beyond opportunity to achievement. To shatter forever not only the barriers of law and public practice, but the walls which bound the condition of man by the color of his skin."

Jobless Drop Shifts Ratings Of Six Areas

Six of the nation's major manpower areas moved in March to classifications denoting lower unemployment, the Labor Dept. announced.

One of the areas—Lawrence-Haverhill, Mass.—moved from a substantial unemployment listing (6 to 8.9 percent of the workforce jobless) to a moderate unemployment group (3 to 5.9 percent).

This is the first time since 1955 that the area has moved out of the former category, the department said.

The nation's third and fifth largest manpower centers—Chicago and Detroit—moved from the moderate jobless grouping to the low unemployment category (1.5 to 2.9 percent unemployed). Two major steel centers—the Gary-Hammond-East Chicago area and the Lorain-Elyria, O., area—and Wichita, Kan., an expanding aircraft center. also moved down to the low unemployment listing.

In all, 133 major centers now are in low or moderate jobless categories compared to 121 for the corresponding month a year ago, the department reported.

E. S. Haines Named To Organizing Post

Appointment of Edward S. Haines as assistant director in the Dept. of Organization has been announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Haines, 48, had served as assistant director of AFL-CIO Region 14—Illinois and Iowa—since 1955.

Before that he was on the organizing staff of the former CIO after service as assistant director of organization for the Packinghouse Workers; as a UPWA international representative and, earlier, as president of UPWA Local 580 in New York City.

Hotel Workers Map Drive to Double Pay

St. Louis—Plans to double pay scales and union membership during the next 10 years in the nation's mass feeding and lodging industry commanded the attention of delegates gathered here for the 75th anniversary convention of the Hotel and Restaurant Employes & Bartenders Intl. Union.

With 453,772 members as of Jan. 1, 1966—highest in its history—the union speaks for about twenty percent of the 2.5 million workers in the nation's hotels and motels, restaurants, taverns and other such establishments.

Wage levels in the industry, according to the U.S. Dept. of Labor, showed these averages in January of this year: $1.40 an hour in hotels and motels; $1.35 in eating and drinking places.

Recognized by the AFL Apr. 24, 1891, when Samuel Gompers issued a charter to "The National Waiters Union," the union held its first convention in 1892 with nine delegates representing 450 members with a total treasury of $87.09.

It is now 1,000 times larger, has local branches in 46 states, 9 provinces of Canada, Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia, and its treasury holds upwards of nine million dollars.

In an officers report to delegates, Pres. Ed. S. Miller and his colleagues warned that the rise in the relative proportion of the "working poor" in the labor force—those earning under $2 an hour—means trouble in an economy dependent on a high level of consumption of consumer goods.

The report sets twin targets in organizing and collective bargaining for the union's 528 local branches of one million members, "real wages" high enough to bring "every family in our circle" up to the level of the "city workers family budget," an economic yardstick which calls for about $6,500 a year to keep an urban family of four on a "modest but adequate" standard of living.

Acknowledging that "it's a long way" from present pay scales to the $3 an hour required by the "modest but adequate" yardstick budget, the union's leadership calls for concentration of those legislative measures most likely to add to the "real incomes" of families in low income brackets—denticare, school lunch, the food stamp program, rent subsidies—as well as its principal current goal of wage law coverage.

Miller said there are two chief hurdles to get over in reaching a membership of a million: restrictive state and federal laws, and the "fantastic" turnover of personnel in the indutsry.

He said the union, to show a net gain of 10,000 members since the last convention in 1961, had to initiate or reinstate over 800,000 members—160,000 a year.

He said a major cause of the turnover is the industry's "bargain basement" pay standards.

Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.) told delegates how archaic Congressional rules help conservative forces delay and defeat desperately needed bills—especially labor bills. He asked for support of his efforts to gain action on reorganization.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler presented the first AFL-CIO plaque to an international union with more than 80 percent of its local affiliated to state and city bodies. The hotel union ranks fourth with 86.1 percent.

Walter E. Davis, assistant director of COPE, described COPE's program for using union membership lists in a new registration drive based on the use of computers, with Pennsylvania, northern California and the Washington area as pilot projects.

Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz said he felt certain that the Dent bill—embracing wage-hour law amendments including for the first time hotel and restaurant workers—would pass the House. Wirtz also said "10,000 more people went to work this morning than went home from jobs last night" and that employment is rising at this rate every day.

Unions Urge Independent Ship Agency

AFL-CIO maritime unions joined in urging Congress to make the Maritime Administration an independent agency, subordinate to neither the proposed Dept. of Transportation nor to the Commerce Dept., where it is presently located.

Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers, testified before the House Government Operations Committee as spokesman for AFL-CIO unions affiliated with the federation's Maritime Trades Dept., Metal Trades Dept., and Maritime Committee.

"Past experience," Hall said, has been that the nation's merchant marine has suffered whenever jurisdiction over maritime affairs has been delegated to federal departments whose primary concern has been other fields.

He expressed concern that maritime interests would be "swallowed up within the mammoth, complex structure" of the proposed Transportation Dept.

On the other hand, Hall said, "an independent agency to administer this country's maritime laws would focus greater attention on our decaying fleet, and the ultimate objective of revitalizing the industry and enabling the United States to meet its foreign commerce needs and defense commitments."

Hall's testimony and an earlier statement by the Railway Labor Executives' Association were in accord with AFL-CIO testimony which supported creation of a Dept. of Transportation but asked modifications in the jurisdiction and organization proposed by the Administration.

Rail Proposals

Speaking for rail labor, RLEA Chairman G. E. Leighty noted that the unions he represents have long urged creation of a Cabinet-level transportation department.

He strongly urged, however, that the legislation be accompanied by a moratorium on discontinuance of passenger train service, a temporary freeze on further rail mergers, and establishment of a National Safety Board in the new department "to have a voice in the maintenance of tracks, bridges and other facilities which are essential to safe rail operation."

Leighty strongly supported, as had AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, a proposal by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) for establishment of an office in the new department to represent the public.

In a related area, Hall also testified before the House Merchant Marine Committee in strong support of a buildup in the U.S.-flag merchant fleet.

The Viet Nam crisis, he said, has shown the unreliability of foreign-flag shipping to handle American military cargo. At the same time, the need to divert the limited supply of American-flag ships to meet military needs has increased the proportion of commercial cargo carried on foreign-flag ships.

UPWA Hikes Dues, Steps Up Organizing

Los Angeles—Delegates to the Packinghouse Workers convention voted to strengthen their union's finances to counter a long-term job decline in the meatpacking industry with expanded organizing in allied fields.

The per capita tax, presently one hour's pay each month with a $3 ceiling, was raised at both the top and bottom. The $3 ceiling was removed, resulting in bigger payments from higher-paid workers. An additional 25 cents a month, earmarked for the strike fund, will be paid by members making less than $3.05 an hour.

The UPWA honored at its convention a writer whose expose of working conditions in the packinghouse industry early in the century aroused the nation's conscience and paved the way for reforms. It gave its Citation of Honor to Upton Sinclair on the 50th anniversary of the publication of "The Jungle."

"In a very real way," the citation said, "we are the beneficiaries of his crusading vigor, his sensitive understanding and his noble courage."

The 86-year-old author was unable to accept the award in person, but a union official will bring it to Sinclair's home.

Ralph Helstein, who marked his 20th anniversary as UPWA president, was unanimously elected to a new two-year term. All other officers were also re-elected, including Sec.-Treas. G. R. Hathaway and Vice Presidents Russell R. Lasley and F. W. Dowling.

Delegates voted to permit the executive board, if the finances of the union permit, to raise salaries of officers and other officials whose pay is specified in the constitution by an amount not to exceed the percentage increase in the common labor rate in the meat packing industry since 1962.

The convention took the unusual step of calling for a consumer boycott against a company it has under contract.

The resolution was aimed at the Cudahy Co. and charged that the firm is seeking "to undermine working conditions established over 25 years of collective bargaining and to destroy the collective bargaining strength of the union."

It charged the company with using the no strike clause of the contract as an "umbrella" while arbitrarily manipulating job loads, duties and pay structure.

Previous Lockout

It was a "don't buy" campaign, the union noted, which helped bring the reinstatement of hundreds of Cudahy employes who were locked out during a dispute of more than four months.

In other resolutions, the convention:

- Called for expanded public works programs to provide a job "for every person willing and able to work" and proposed a minimum income allowance as a "practical current solution" to problems of persons unable to work or find jobs.
- Asked more effective penalties against employer unfair labor practices and community intimidation of union supporters based on "fear of job loss, fear of plant shutdown, even physical fear if they exercise their right to join a union."
- Called for unrestricted negotiations to end the war in Viet Nam and a declaration of U.S. willingness to halt bombings and join in a cease fire.
- Supported Administration proposals to expand the meat inspection program, including authority for federal inspection if states fail to meet standards.

The convention also called for bargaining rights for farm workers, gave a rousing reception to the two leaders of the Delano grape strike—Larry Itliong of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and Cesar Chavez of the National Farm Workers Association—and voted strong support of the boycott of DiGiorgio products.

CPI Rise Drags Down Worker Buying Power

April CPI. About 975,000 in automobile, farm and construction equipment and aerospace will receive 4 cents an hour based on the change in the index since January. About 75,000 others will receive increases ranging from 1 to 3 cents an hour and another 5,000 workers from 3 to 6 cents. More than 17,000 transit workers will receive increases of 3.5 to 8 cents an hour based on index changes in Chicago, Pittsburgh and Boston.

Pres. Johnson, at a press conference, said "we have much to be thankful for" in the present economic situation. He displayed a chart showing that while consumer price increases had averaged less than 1.5 percent in the U.S. since 1960, price increases in five other countries were at least twice that great.

"We are reaching a point," the President said, "that we have worked for so long, trying to get employment for most of the people. When you reach that situation you run into other problems. . . . I would rather have these problems than problems that come when unemployment is high and incomes are low."

The CPI at 112.5 was 2.9 percent higher than a year ago. The February to April increase of 1.4 percent in the index was described by the Labor Dept. as the largest since the same months in 1951 during the Korean War.

Nearly half of the 2.9 percent rise over the year was caused by a 6 percent climb in food prices, the department said, especially meats, which averaged 17.5 percent higher. Consumer services were up 3 percent for the 12-month period.

The net spendable earnings of factory production workers—gross earnings less federal income and social security taxes—declined to $98.24, a 10-cent drop, between March and April because of a seasonal cutback in the workweek, the department said, although average hourly earnings rose by one cent to $2.69.

The department's report on real spendable earnings—the actual purchasing power of the worker's wages—noted that "in recent months, real net spendable earnings have shown no significant changes from year-ago levels because of advances in consumer prices and the increase in social security taxes which became effective in January 1966."

GI Education Aid To Start June 1

Educational benefits under the "Cold War GI Act" are available starting June 1 for persons who served at least six months on active duty and were discharged after Jan. 31, 1955.

AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin noted that many union members and children of union members will be able to take college or high school courses under the new law.

Benefits for fulltime students range from $100 a month for a person with no dependents to $150 for those with two or more dependents. Proportional amounts are available to part-time students.

Counseling service on the new program is available from Veterans Administration offices.

There's a Reason For Everything

Los Angeles—The grievance committee of a Packinghouse Workers local here was pleasantly surprised when it won 14 grievances in a single meeting with management. The boss, committee members said, was the "most agreeable ever."

Two days later, the UPWA newspaper reports, the union members got an inkling of the reason. The boss quit.

Shrivers Aid Strike With Award Money

Eunice, too?" Beirne added: "He was right, and when we checked the record, we knew it."

Beirne is president of the Communications Workers and also of United Community Funds & Councils of America.

Of Mrs. Shriver, Beirne said "she has never sought public notice; she has avoided it. She has not advertised her long, devoted service to the cause of the mentally retarded."

In a graceful talk, Mrs. Shriver, a sister of the late Pres. Kennedy, noted that she had recently given birth to her fifth child and said that when her sons are grown "I hope their lives will be inspired by the dedication and the energy of these great leaders of the American labor movement and by the patience, toil and sacrifice of the unsung heroes of the rank and file."

She expressed the hope that "our sons will be men whose vision carries them also into a third world" —the world of those "outside the economy, without a vote, deprived of adequate housing and medical care, and destined to squalor and early death."

Shriver was recognized for his work in the crusade against poverty as OEO organizer and director, for the work of the Peace Corps which he also organized and formerly headed, and for assistance to the handicapped.

"If there is any one man who symbolizes the spirit of hope and opportunity, it is Sargent Shriver," Beirne said.

In expressing thanks, Shriver noted "there is a movement abroad in this land, stirring in strange places—the voices of silence beginning to speak."

Citing Appalachia and the vineyards of the West, the OEO director identified some of the voices as those of the grape strikers, of "union men everywhere."

The voice of the farm worker is giving the lie, Shriver said, to those critics who say labor unions are only for white people, or only for the sons and relatives of union men, or that unions are a closed society, interested only in themselves and not in the poor.

"The voice from California says otherwise," Shriver declared. "It says that the poor everywhere are the concern of unions." It says that the struggle of the poor is still going on—"the same struggle that William Green and Philip Murray devoted their lives to."

Asserting that "it's the same struggle that George Meany and Joe Beirne and all of you at this table and the whole AFL-CIO are fighting today," Shriver said:

"Eunice and I may have come to this struggle a little late, but we wish to pay tribute to the heroic efforts of the leaders of the past and of the striking farm workers today."

Introduced to the award audience and strongly applauded were a group of servicemen back from the war in Viet Nam and a group of workers from VISTA—Volunteers in Service to America—one of the OEO's operating programs.

Also saluted was Gen. Alfred Gruenther, retired president of the American Red Cross, who was the 1963 Murray-Green award winner. Gruenther paid tribute to the AFL-CIO for its work with the Red Cross and its "sense of dedication."

MURRAY-GREEN AWARDS are presented to Dir. Sargent Shriver of the federal Office of Economic Opportunity and his wife, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, for devoted service to handicapped persons. Presentation was made on behalf of the AFL-CIO by Federation Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, at the 11th AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services. With the medallions went a $5,000 check which the Shrivers donated to aid California grape strikers.

Senate Panel Approves Federal Employe Raise

A unanimous vote by the Senate's Post Office & Civil Service Committee virtually assured 1.8 million salaried federal employes of a 2.9 percent pay raise this year, plus a package of long-sought fringe benefits.

The committee made only a few minor changes in the pay bill which passed the House in early April by a 392-1 vote.

Both the House and Senate bills would take effect July 1, six months earlier than the President has proposed. And both applied the Administration's proposed "average" increase across the board, thus raising the amount for lower-paid workers and reducing the increase for higher-bracket officials. The two bills also ignore the Administration request for authority to compel early retirement of higher-grade employes.

Fringe benefits provided include the right to retire at full pension at age 55 after 30 years service and at age 60 after 20 years of service. The legislation also improves overtime benefits and increases uniform allowances.

The cost of the package is only slightly above the 3.2 percent "guideline" which the Administration imposed as a ceiling on a pay bill. However both the House and Senate committee ignored a proposal that employes be required to help pay for added retirement benefits through a higher contribution to the contributory retirement fund.

A hotly-debated participation sales bill passed the House, 206-190, with only minor changes from the Senate-approved version. The Senate then accepted the House amendments, clearing the bill for the President.

It permits the Federal National Mortgage Association to sell to the public participation certificates in pools of direct loans made by federal lending agencies. The purpose is to generate additional funds for new loans, without the need to appropriate more money. The government would pay the going market rate in interest to purchasers of sales certificates, regardless of the interest rate on the original loans. Opponents charged that the effect would be to force interest rates up.

House Expands Wage Coverage, Delays Date of $1.60 Minimum

bor Standards Act — a substantial number of farm workers.

Newly-covered non-farm workers would start at the $1 level next February. Their guaranteed minimum would rise 15 cents a year until they catch up with the $1.60 rate.

Farm workers would move from $1 next February to $1.15 the following year and a final step of $1.30 in 1969.

The heated debate cut through party lines. Nebraska's Rep. Dave Martin, chief GOP opponent of the bill, led off with a charge that the proposed step-up in the minimum wage would be "completely violating" the Administration's 3.2 percent wage "guidelines." It would put small enterprises out of business, he claimed, and increase unemployment.

A fellow Republican, Rep. Alphonzo Bell (Calif.), took the floor to read a letter from the President's Council of Economic Advisers declaring that the bill "will benefit the welfare of the nation" by helping to overcome "substandard wages and working conditions." It is not inflationary, the council said, and poverty-level wages should not be held to guidepost levels but "should move up at a more rapid pace."

Florida's Rep. Claude Pepper (D) recalled that in 1938, when the first wage floor of 25 cents an hour was imposed, employers who were paying as little as 9 cents an hour said they would be ruined by the bill. "They charged that I was a traitor to the South to advocate such legislation," Pepper said, adding: "No part of the nation profited more than the South from the minimum wage legislation."

Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), chairman of the subcommittee which drafted the bill, said it attempted to rectify the fact that minimum wage protection is presently denied "to those who need it most, those who are employed in the lowest paid industries."

Service Trades Growing

He noted that the big expansion in employment in recent years has been in the service trades, where wages often are below the poverty level. Dent observed that if all the amendments proposed were adopted there would be nothing left in the bill and he warned that many of the sponsors of "compromise" amendments would vote against the bill even if their "compromises" were accepted.

Dent led the effort to keep the 1968 date for the $1.60 floor, despite Powell's surprise acceptance of the change.

Supporters of the bill were caught with too many of their number off the House floor early in the debate and an amendment which would have had the effect of knocking 1.6 million retail and industrial workers out from coverage was tentatively approved on a 120-109 non-record vote. Before final passage, however, the amendment was deleted on a 200-195 rollcall.

An attempt by Martin to delete all coverage for farm workers was beaten on a 157-149 vote.

Two modifications in the farm labor coverage were accepted by the House.

One exempted sugar field workers who are presently covered by prevailing minimum wages set administratively by the secretary of agriculture under the Sugar Act. These vary from state to state—currently 90 cents an hour in Louisiana and $1.35 in Florida.

The other change exempts persons who commute daily from a permanent residence to work for less than 13 weeks a year on a hand-harvest operation traditionally paid by piece-rate.

The House also accepted an amendment which allowed an employer to credit tips received by a waiter or other service worker toward 45 percent of the minimum wage. The committee bill would have set the maximum credit at 35 percent the first year, going to 45 percent in 1971. The bill allows a worker to appeal to the secretary of labor if he thinks the employer is crediting him with more tips than he received.

The House, however, voted down an attempt to exclude time spent washing up, changing clothes or eating from the hours which must be paid. It would, opponents pointed out, be the first time an employer would have an excuse for "snooping" on the length of time a worker spends in the bathroom.

The big addition to the committee bill was the inclusion of school employes, a group which embraces some low-paid custodial workers.

Coverage of retail employes would be extended in two stages. Next February the volume-of-business test for a covered enterprise would drop from the $1 million level to $500,000 and a year later to $250,000.

All hospital and nursing home employes would be covered, adding some 1.4 million persons. All construction and laundry workers would be included. Wage coverage would be extended to local transit workers, including previously exempt non-profit systems, although drivers would remain excluded from overtime protections.

The bill raises the minimum wage in Puerto Rico on a percentage basis. However an amendment by Powell maintains the present authority of industry review boards to cancel or reduce the increase.

NLRB Case Rise Traced In 30th Annual Report

Thirty years ago the National Labor Relations Board, in its first year of existence, handled 31 employe elections. In the fiscal year 1965 the figure was 7,824—a measure of the increase in activity in the area of labor-management relations.

The NLRB made the comparison in its 30th annual report. Putting its statisticians to work, the agency found that over the 30-year period it had handled 200,000 unfair labor practice cases and had conducted more than 140,000 representation elections which permitted more than 19 million workers to decide whether they wanted to bargain collectively with their employers through a union.

The report for the year 1965 showed that refusal to bargain charges leveled against employers were up 25 percent over the prior year and that illegal discharge and other forms of discrimination against employes continued to be the dominant charge against employers.

Unions won 4,680 elections in the 12-month period, or about 60 percent of the total, the board reported.

Taxi Union Wins First N.Y. Pact

New York—With an emphatic vote of approval, representatives of 24,000 taxi drivers and garagemen ratified a landmark first contract providing better wages, shorter hours, pensions, health and life insurance and a full union shop for all drivers, full-time and part-time.

The vote at an overflow meeting in the Hotel Commodore signified the close of one era for the AFL-CIO Taxi Drivers Organizing Committee and the start of another keyed to building the union.

Contract terms, agreed to by labor and management in 80 garages after a five-day strike and mediation by Mayor Lindsay, will go into effect retroactive to May 17. It took the TDOC, formed by the New York City Central Labor Council, more than 20 months to unite industry employes and achieve a contract.

"We've laid the foundation," Council Pres. Harry Van Arsdale told the union's wage and policy committee. "Our job now is to build solidly and well."

Great Achievement

AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Michael Mann told the assembly it had won "the greatest single organizing achievement since the late Thirties."

Among major provisions of the 18-month contract are:

- An increase in driver commissions from 44 percent of meter income to 46 percent as of last May 17, rising to 47 percent next Dec. 1 and averaging $4.50 a week for the contract term.
- Retirement pay of $50 a month for those aged 65 with 25 or more years of service with any New York cab fleet.
- Full union shop.
- Breakdown pay for time spent with a disabled cab.
- Life insurance with a special $5,000 benefit for death while on duty.
- Grievance procedure ending in arbitration of disputes.
- Call-in pay.
- A scholarship program for children of covered workers.
- Health and welfare benefits.

The mayor made a final and binding decision on several disputed points. Expressing regret that all issues could not be settled in collective bargaining, Lindsay said "it is time for the parties to learn to live together for the good of all."

Special Arbitrator Eric J. Schmertz, named by Lindsay, awarded mechanics and other inside workers a pay raise of $4 a week; a five-day 45-hour week now, going to 40 hours in December; overtime premium pay; three paid holidays and other improvements.

If House Action Stands:

Wage Floor Delay Priced At $2 Billion

America's lowest-paid workers will lose nearly $2 billion unless a House-passed amendment to the minimum wage bill is knocked out by the Senate.

The amendment was hastily tacked on the bill in a surprise "compromise" engineered by Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N. Y.). It would delay for an additional year the second-step increase in the wage floor for 30 million persons now covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The extra year's delay would mean an estimated $1.96 billion less in pay envelopes.

Under the bill brought to the floor by the House Labor Committee, which Powell heads, the present $1.25 minimum would rise to $1.40 next Feb. 1 and to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1968.

At Powell's suggestion, made without consulting other committee members and without touching base with the Labor Dept., White House or congressional leaders, the House put off the $1.60 wage level to Feb. 1, 1969.

AFL-CIO economists say the extra year's delay will deprive a full-time worker paid at the legal minimum of more than $400 in wages.

Suggested Delay

Powell suggested, but did not sponsor, the postponement while the House was considering an even more drastic three-year gap between the $1.40 and $1.60 wage steps.

The three-year delay was proposed in an amendment by Rep. Thomas G. Morris (D-N. M.).

Labor legislative experts, who were following the progress of the bill closely, are firmly convinced the House would have rejected the Morris amendment. They believe that Powell's willingness to go along with a 1969 effective date impaired support for the committee bill—even though on the eventual rollcall Powell voted against the amendment he suggested.

Here's how the situation developed on the afternoon of May 26, as the House was nearing the end of its three-day debate on the bill:

LBJ Pledges No Turnback On Rights

The United States will not "turn back" from the path of racial justice and full as well as equal opportunity, Pres. Johnson told 2,400 delegates to the White House conference on civil rights.

He warned segregationists of both races that America is a single nation and that if its diverse people "are to build just and fruitful lives for themselves and their children . . . they must do it together."

Johnson, in an unscheduled appearance at a dinner meeting of the conference, assured the delegates that he was not asking "that righteous anger be silenced" or "that harmony be purchased at the price of individual freedom."

The President stressed, however,

Meany Cites Basic Need For Jobs

By David L. Perlman

An action program to bridge the gap between America's promise and performance in overcoming centuries of racial injustice was laid before 2,400 delegates summoned by Pres. Johnson to a White House civil rights conference.

Delegates were also urged, in a message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, to keep in mind the overriding importance of a full employment economy to make equal opportunity meaningful.

The program drawn up by conference leaders called for bold new steps at every level of government and by private groups to:

- Create immediate job opportunities for Negroes at all levels of skill, coupled with stepped-up training for better jobs.
- Provide "quality education for all" equal to that now available to "the fortunate few," while reducing racial concentrations in schools through "color-conscious" planning.
- Provide adequate open housing for low and moderate income families and, in the process, break down the ghetto walls of inner cities and the exclusion barriers of the suburbs.
- Assure equality in justice and law enforcement, protect Negroes seeking to exercise new-won rights in the South, and strive to defuse the powder-keg relations between police and Negro communities.

The action program was drafted by a 30-member leadership council, headed by Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, dean of civil rights leaders, served as honorary chairman and delivered the welcoming speech to the conference.

5 Negroes Win County Nominations In Alabama Primary Run-Off Votes

Five Negro candidates won Democratic nomination for county offices in Alabama's party run-off primary May 31, but voting was light and apathetic generally. Eight Negro candidates for nomination to the state legislature were defeated, including some in districts where the Negro population heavily outnumbers white residents.

The massive "bloc" voting appealed for by both white segregationists and civil rights leaders did not materialize. In Macon County, where there are 23,000 Negroes to slightly more than 4,000 white residents. Lucius D. Amerson, a Negro Korean War veteran, won nomination for sheriff by a margin of only 3,497 to 3,113. Three other Negro candidates also won nomination by narrow margins for such offices as tax collector and Board of Revenue member.

In Perry County, Isom Atkinson defeated a white opponent for nomination for a seat on the county commission.

Federal observers watched the polls in six counties but the balloting was orderly as well as light. Run-off primaries for three statewide offices and three congressional seats proved insufficient to attract voters in large numbers.

In North Carolina primaries on May 29 all incumbent House members, including veteran Rep. Harold D. Cooley, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, were renominated easily in Democratic races. So was Sen. B. Everett Jordan.

Two run-off primaries are scheduled for June 25. In the 5th Congressional District, Democrats Nick

IUE Wins Back Big Magnavox Cabinet Plant

Jefferson City, Tenn.—The big Magnavox plant here went union again after a five-year lapse. Workers voted 929-792 for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The Jefferson City Cabinet Co., a Magnavox subsidiary, employs more than 2,200 workers in the IUE bargaining unit. IUE called the election its biggest victory since 1964.

The plant had been represented by IUE Local 748 until management replaced 800 workers and temporarily floored the union during a 1961 strike.

When the 800 won reinstatement in an arbitration order last October, they intensified the union drive that had been carried on in their absence. Next step, the union said, is a contract spelling out employe rights.

The election campaign was sparked by an in-plant committee of 250 workers, assisted by IUE District Pres. David J. Fitzmaurice, the IUE organizing staff and the staff of the AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Paul Christopher.

Plant conditions, the union said, had deteriorated by election time to the point where wages were 20 cents an hour below those in a comparable IUE plant, seniority and rights to job bidding were ignored, workers were transferred, had their rates cut or were fired without right of appeal.

CIO Pioneer Germer Dies At Age of 86

Rockford, Ill.—Adolph Germer, leader of the former CIO who took part in a miners' strike at 13 and later helped organize the auto industry, died here of cancer. He was 86.

When working men and women needed help, "he was there," said Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther in a message of sympathy to Mrs. Germer.

Recalling that Germer quit school at 11 to work in dangerous coal mines, Reuther said his strike participation in 1894 "launched him on his long and dedicated life of tireless effort to organize the unorganized" and advance their well-being.

Germer was the first full-time organizer hired by the CIO. He played a major role in the sit-down strikes of 1936 and 1937 and later served as CIO regional director in Detroit and New York, as president of the Michigan CIO Council, and as a top organizer for many industrial unions. He retired from active union work in 1955.

He served at various times as vice president of the United Mine Workers; as assistant secretary of the World Federation of Trade Unions; and as national secretary of the Socialist Party, from 1916 to 1920.

Two years before he died, Germer donated his personal papers and records of his organizing days to the State Historical Society of Wisconsin in Madison.

James Jones Named To Labor Policy Post

Appointment of James E. Jones, Jr., as director of the Office of Labor-Management Policy Development, was announced by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. Jones for 10 years was counsel for labor-management relations and general legal services in the office of the Solicitor of Labor.

EXECUTIVE BOARD members of the American Newspaper Guild join Bureau of National Affairs picket line after reaffirming full support of the strike by the Washington-Baltimore Guild's BNA unit. Board members declared BNA was struck because of anti-labor practices, including refusal to grant union security against company intimidation and reprisals. The board resolution also expressed appreciation to unions and others who have backed the strikers by cancelling subscriptions to BNA services and publications. Pictured at left are ANG Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson, BNA Picket Chairman Matt Amberg and ANG Pres. Arthur Rosenstock.

Coast Oil Unions Agree On Joint Action Plans

San Francisco—Four unions have agreed to an unprecedented joint action program within the huge Standard Oil Co. of California, with cooperation to include mutual organizing efforts.

The agreement also covers coordination of collective bargaining for the more than 15,000 employes in the four unions' jurisdiction. The affected employes are a majority of non-supervisory workers in every phase of the company's operations throughout the West, from extracting crude oil to selling the finished product to the motorist.

The four unions are the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; the Intl. Union of Petroleum Workers, a branch of the Seafarers; the Western States Service Station Employes, and the Petroleum Workers. The last two are unaffiliated.

The trailblazing agreement was signed after a daylong conference here. It follows last year's successful three-month boycott against the company.

A conference spokesman, Joseph Appelbaum, OCAW organizing coordinator, declared:

"Standard Oil of California is one of the five largest and one of the wealthiest oil firms in the nation. It has long been able to play employe groups off against each other, frustrating legitimate collective bargaining aims.

"This agreement is a major step in ending fragmentation of union efforts and should result in substantial improvements" for all.

Union Goals

The conference invited unions not present to join in the agreement, which provides for:

- Coordination of collective bargaining efforts.
- Mutual organizing programs under which the unions will cooperate in completing organization of company workers.
- Joint meetings of officers and stewards of different unions and joint training efforts.

The conference set up a four-man subcommittee which is to meet July 7 at OCAW Local 1-561 headquarters in San Pablo, Calif., to work out implementation of the program. Subcommittee members are OCAW Intl. Rep. Joe Misbrener of Richmond; Carl Anderson of Seattle, representing WSSSEU; Joseph A. Hughes of Walnut Creek, representing PWU, and Dave Kiel of Richmond, IUPW executive board member.

Data before the San Francisco meeting indicating that Standard of Cal can afford to meet reasonable union economic proposals included the company's $391,200,000 net profit in 1965, up 13.3 percent from 1964, a return which union economists set at 11.9 percent of net company worth.

New Dangers Posed:

Job Health Risks Tied to Technology

Pneumonoultramicroscopicsilicovolcanoconiosis.

This, explains Dr. Murray C. Brown in the May issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist, is a lung disease which attacks soft coal miners.

But there are many other occupational diseases and hazards, with shorter and simpler names, which are just as dangerous and disabling, Dr. Brown adds. Benzene, cadmium, radiation and ultrasonic sound waves are some he cited.

In his article, "Health Hazards in the Workplace," Dr. Brown point out that few occupations are hazard-free. And, he adds, as the dangers in traditional occupations are identified, the rapid changes of modern technology open new areas of potential health hazards.

Dr. Brown, who is chief of the Division of Occupational Health, U.S. Public Health Service, says that 1964 data show that sick absence and other factors interfering with worker performance caused a production loss amounting to about 7.5 percent of the U.S. gross national product.

He said other data show that workmen's compensation expenditures for medical care and cash payments to workers and their dependents climbed to $1.6 billion in 1963, a rise of 80 percent in nine years.

But, he emphasizes, more important than these measurements is the human cost—the impact on the worker whose health is damaged and on his family's plans.

"How can one calculate the countless family plans that have to be scrapped, the domestic dislocation caused when the breadwinner falls ill with some work-connected illness?

"What of the hazards," asks Dr. Brown, "of hearing loss, the dangers to eyesight, the gradual dulling of the sense of smell—all of which may be caused by the work environment?"

A more tragic case, he notes, occurs when a worker suffers the cumulative effect of a material he has handled without trouble for years.

Office workers are now vulnerable, Dr. Brown says, with the spread of duplicating machines and other devices. There is danger from the inhalation of fumes and vapors of chemicals as well as from ultra-violet radiation.

Ionizing radiation is a danger to aircraft workers, dental assistants, fire alarm makers, glass makers, machinists, nurses, tile glazers and lab technicians, he notes.

Cadmium holds serious dangers for storage battery makers, ceramic makers, dental amalgam makers, engravers, lithographers and solderers, he adds.

Benzene Hazards

Benzene can produce anemia, afflict the central nervous system and do a variety of damage, he continues. This danger confronts dry cleaners, furniture finishers, oil processors, painters, welders, printers, photographic chemical makers, bronzers, cobblers and degreasing workers.

He also discusses environmental and physical agents, warning that radiation and other hazards are as large a danger as chemical agents.

A variety of degenerative diseases, along with deadly cancer, have been traced to industrial processes, he writes.

"With the expanding technology of American industry has come a long train of potential health hazards—effects upon the human body by exposure to vibration, microwaves, ultrasonics, infrared, ultraviolet, lasers, masers and other electromagnetic phenomena being developed," Dr. Brown notes.

He urges unions to survey the hazards in their plant areas and processes and undertake detailed studies of air contaminants and exposure to physical agents.

He warns that, while many large companies now have their own experts on occupational diseases, protection of workers in smaller shops, plants and worksites "is often badly neglected." Dr. Brown calls on labor to pay special attention to this area of small and medium-sized plants.

President Orders Study On Occupational Health

Excerpts from remarks by Pres. Johnson to the Intl. Labor Press Association at the White House, May 23:

The time has also come to do something about the effects of a working man's job on his health. This problem has been neglected too long. It must be neglected no longer.

Since World War II dozens of new materials and hundreds of new manufacturing processes have been introduced into our factories. And new hazards have come with them.

We do not know the full, long-range impact of these new hazards on the health of our workers.

We do not know enough about what really happens to men and women who handle chemicals, plastics, asbestos, petroleum products, and glass.

We do not know enough about the effects on a worker subjected to extremes of heat, cold, noise, or humidity.

Despite all the research we have done, we do not even know the full effects of radioactivity.

But we do know that the hazards are real. We do know that work-related diseases and other physical and mental disorders are on the rise. That trend must be reversed—and we are moving to reverse it.

Last March, we amended the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act to extend federal safety precautions to all of the nation's coal miners.

And we are going to extend federal health standards to cover, not only coal miners, but all other miners as well. The Metallic and Non-metallic Mine Act, which has passed the House and is now in Senate committee, will protect our men mining copper and uranium, or working in sand and gravel quarries—practically everyone who labors under the earth to earn his livelihood.

I am also directing the secretary of health, education and welfare to make an intensified study of occupational health. He will report to me at the earliest possible moment on what this government can do:

- First, to isolate and eliminate the hazards that now exist; and
- Second, to test new products and processes so that precautions can be taken to prevent health hazards before they occur.

Leon Climenko Dies at Conference

New York—Leon Climenko, deputy industrial commissioner of the State Labor Dept. and former assistant to Matthew Woll, late vice president of the former AFL, died while attending a civil rights seminar at Unity House of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Climenko, 53, was named to head the New York City office of the State Labor Dept. in 1965 after 20 years of prior service. His associates said he tried to interpret the state jobless insurance laws liberally and to maintain good relations with the labor movement.

Climenko was a member of the New York Times advertising staff in the Thirties, joined the Seafarers in World War II as a member of the merchant marine, and as Woll's assistant in 1943-44 worked with Labor's League for Human Rights.

Senate Reversal Urged:

RWDSU Vows Fight Against $1.60 Delay

By Gervase N. Love

Miami Beach—The Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, fighting for reversal of the House vote deferring the $1.60 minimum wage until 1969, will help carry the battle to the Senate, delegates to the 10th constitutional convention declared.

They replied with shouts of approval and "we'll be ready" when Pres. Max Greenberg warned:

"Don't be surprised if you get a call in a couple of weeks to mobilize your people to go to Washington and let the Senate know how we feel about this."

The convention then unanimously passed a resolution reiterating labor's call for a $2 per hour minimum wage "with coverage of every person who works for a living." The resolution said "the main battleground in the War on Poverty is the arena of the minimum wage" and declared that "no bigger blow could be struck against poverty" than by instituting the $2 pay floor.

The resolution was approved following an impassioned plea from Vice Pres. David Livingston to reject compromises and whittling down, "the politics of the best possible," and when the bill gets to the Senate to "start practicing the politics of the necessary and the right and the just."

The convention after two hours of debate voted overwhelmingly to raise per capita payments to the international from 85 cents to $1.15 per month—the first hike since 1958. The raise will permit broadened organization work, expanded services to locals and a pension plan, which was adopted later for fulltime staff members of the international and its locals and joint boards.

The union also flatly rejected the so-called 3.2 percent wage guidelines as "unfair and improper" and declared that "we will not abide by them." The curbs have the effect, the delegates charged, of forcing union negotiators to discuss new contracts "with a monkey on their backs."

The resolution charged that current inflationary pressures are the result not of "workers getting too much pay," but of "unconscionable profits racked up by big business."

In other actions the convention:

- Voted to change mandatory executive board meetings from three to two a year, and the international general council meetings from once a year to once between the quadrennial conventions.
- Supported the Kingsport (Tenn.) Press strike, including a boycott of the World Book Encyclopedia and the Childcraft series, and supported the national consumer boycott of DiGiorgio Co. products invoked in the strike of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and the National Farm Workers Association.
- Voted pay raises of $2,500 each to Greenberg, Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps, Executive Sec. Jack Paley and Executive Vice Presidents Arthur Osman and Alex Bail. All were re-elected to new four-year terms.
- Gave cash and pledges totaling $3,000 for members on strike at the Industrial Uniform & Towel Service Co., Dallas, Tex.

Shrivers' Gift Transmitted to Grape Strikers

A salute to Delano grape strikers for their "courageous spirit" and "fine demonstration of union solidarity" was paid by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a letter transmitting a $5,000 check from Sargent and Eunice Kennedy Shriver, winners of the Murray-Green award of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The Shrivers asked that the money accompanying the award go for needed social services for the strikers' families. Meany therefore sent half to the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and half to the National Farm Workers Association.

The donation "from two such great Americans" is a "heartwarming indication of the strong sentiment in your behalf which manifests itself throughout the finest elements" of the nation, Meany wrote. He extended best wishes and hopes for continued progress in bringing "personal dignity and economic justice" to the families of grape field workers.

The AFL-CIO has voted full support of a national consumer boycott of food products grown and marketed by the DiGiorgio Co., largest grower in the Delano, Calif. area and spearhead of opposition to union organization of workers.

1st-Year Hikes Average 3.7% In Major Pacts

First-year wage increases averaged 3.7 percent in major agreements negotiated in the first three months of the year compared to 3.8 percent for the entire year 1965, the Labor Dept. reported.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics noted that bargaining activity was relatively light during the first quarter with major settlements affecting about 325,000 workers.

For the same three months a year ago, the first-year wage increase was 4 percent. First-year increases are the amount of wage hike agreed to for the first year of a contract running two or three years.

The BLS report noted that the first quarter 1966 agreements averaged 3.7 percent over the full term of the contract, compared to 3.3 percent for those negotiated in the same quarter of 1965.

Senate Urged to Keep Packaging Bill Intact

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to defeat crippling and delaying amendments to the truth-in-packaging bill, which it termed the "minimum legislative protection due to the public."

The Senate opened debate on the key consumer bill, but put off votes on the major amendments until the week of June 6.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller noted, in a letter to all senators, that the legislation had been somewhat watered down in the Senate Commerce Committee.

"Frankly, we would prefer a stronger bill," Biemiller said, "but we are satisfied that the compromise legislation proposed will make a significant contribution to the interest of the consumer."

Two strong attacks were being launched at the bill as the Senate debate got under way.

Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.) was pressing for an amendment which would strike from the bill all references to packaging— making it, in the senator's words, merely a "clarity in labeling" bill.

And Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) served notice that if the Cotton amendment were beaten, he would move to refer the entire bill to the Senate Judiciary Committee, despite its approval by the Commerce Committee.

Asking senators to vote against this motion, Biemiller said:

"In view of the lengthy period in which packaging and labeling practices have been under study in Congress and the extensive compromises incorporated in the present bill, such a move can be interpreted only as a hostile effort to kill this much-needed legislation by interminable delay."

The bill, long-sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), sets standards for labeling which include conspicuous display of weight and contents, unclouded with adjectives such as "giant half-quart."

It authorizes the Food & Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission to establish standard weights and measures where there is presently such a confusing variety of sizes that a consumer is hard put to make a meaningful comparison. However manufacturers would be given a full opportunity to adopt voluntary standards before the government acts.

Six Republican members of the Commerce Committee attacked the packaging section of the bill as interfering with the "free choice" of consumers and a step towards "1984" government domination. They claimed the public will "rebel in disgust" if the number of sizes of potato chip packages is reduced.

Per Capita Increased By Hotel Convention

St. Louis—Delegates to the 75th anniversary convention of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes & Bartenders Intl. Union voted to raise monthly per capita payments of the locals from 60 to 80 cents and re-elected the union's top officers.

Pres. Ed S. Miller was returned for his fourth term and Sec.-Treas. Robert L. Diefenbach was chosen for his first full term. He was first named to the post in 1963 to complete the unexpired term of Jack Weinberger, who retired at 80.

The convention also voted to raise the president's salary to $50,000 a year and the secretary-treasurer's to $43,000.

Miller, 65, is a member of Bartenders Local 420, Kansas City, his home town. Diefenbach, 57, a waiter by trade, is a member of Hotel & Restaurant Local 117, Belleville, Ill.

Delegates also elected 11 vice presidents by unanimous action:

Marcel A. Kenney, Hyannis, Mass.; David Siegel, New York City; Myra K. Wolfgang, Detroit; Paul C. McCastland, Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; James E. Blakely, Chicago; Lester J. Green, Denver; Phil L. Valley, Milwaukee; Gertrude Sweet, Portland, Ore.; C. T. McDonough, San Francisco; Onofrio Zambri, Toronto, and Richard Smith, Chicago.

A series of resolutions and committee reports adopted by the convention called for:

- Senate action to strengthen minimum wage improvements by granting federal overtime and hourly rate standards fixed for other crafts to hotel and restaurant workers.
- A substantial increase in organizing staff to implement a program aimed at doubling the union's membership in the next 10 years. The union's officers reported membership at 453,772 in January of this year.
- New collective bargaining sights to lift wage scales from present "bargain basement rates" to figures approximating the "city worker's family budget," a yardstick figure currently requiring about $3 an hour to meet basic needs of an urban family of four.
- Vigorous support for all measures aimed at yielding "social income" to the working poor—broader access to food stamp plans, free school lunches, rent subsidies, Neighborhood Youth Corps and other Great Society programs capable of adding to the real wages of low-wage workers.

Chicago Teachers Elect Desmond

Chicago—John E. Desmond, vice president for eight years of Teachers Local 1 here, will take office July 1 as president for a two-year period. He was elected over Charles Skibbens, 4,553 to 4,421.

Desmond succeeds John M. Fewkes, who said he will be a candidate instead for the AFT presidency. Desmond, a former classroom teacher here, promised cooperation with new Supt. James F. Redmond in making Chicago schools "the best" in the country.

The Wage 'Stretch-Out'

THE MINIMUM WAGE bill passed by the House is an important first step in the war on poverty. Its extension of federal wage-hour protection to nearly eight million more workers—and a substantial number of farm workers—will have a meaningful impact in the struggle to bring an adequate standard of living to all Americans.

But the delay in increasing the wage floor to $1.60 an hour in February 1969 instead of 1968 is a serious imperfection in the bill. It will unnecessarily postpone for one year—in terms of the bill approved in committee—the additional 20 cents an hour so desperately needed by the "working poor."

The year's delay, voted by the House by a narrow margin, will perhaps affect most seriously those groups lagging in education and skills whose earning power is limited and whose needs are greatest.

Simple justice and equity require the Senate to wipe out the "stretch-out" amendment injudiciously proposed by the chairman of the House Labor Committee and adopted by a 205 to 194 rollcall. The "working poor" cannot afford the luxury of delay.

'Slingshot' Enforcement

WE SEND the labor board "with a slingshot to enforce our laws against an armored Goliath, and the days of David are over. If we want the laws we pass to be enforced, we must equip the agencies we create with power to deter the law violators."

That's how Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.) assesses the struggle between the giant J. P. Stevens Co. textile complex and the National Labor Relations Board on the issue of union-busting.

In a speech in the House, Thompson, a veteran member of the House Labor Committee, noted that Stevens "has so far lost all the battles but has won the war. It has achieved its objective—to keep the union out. Its violations of the law, assuming the reviewing court upholds the labor board, will be punished by a wrist-slapping. The contest between the J. P. Stevens Co. and the U.S. government is unequal."

Thompson proposes several remedies and legislative reforms:

"First, currently the National Labor Relations Act authorizes the labor board to order the reinstatement of employes discharged for union affiliation with back pay. This back pay award does not compensate the employe for his financial loss; nor does it deter the wrongdoer. The back pay award has been called nothing more than a hunting license for union-busters. I suggest that we give the labor board authority to assess double or treble damages against certain violators—those who have been deliberate or repeated or flagrant in their violations of our laws."

"Second, the laws should be amended so a violation will hurt where it counts—in the pocketbook. Moreover, it does not make sense for the federal government to subsidize with lucrative contracts the individuals and companies which violate our laws. Accordingly, I propose amendments to the Davis-Bacon and Walsh-Healey Acts so as to give the contracting agencies of our government power to withhold contracts from the companies which the labor board finds to be in open, flagrant, knowing and purposeful violation of our laws."

Statistics Staggering:

30-Year Labor Board Record Underscores Huge Assignment

ON JULY 5, 1935, the National Labor Relations Board came into existence as an independent agency. It had two major jobs:

1. To stop unfair labor practices both on the part of management and unions as laid down by the National Labor Relations Act.

2. To supervise in an orderly fashion representation elections at which workers could select unions to speak for them at the collective bargaining table.

Behind both these tasks was the basic philosophy of the National Labor Relations Act that unions were good for the country; that workers should be given encouragement in their exercise of "full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

How well has the NLRB fulfilled its job of protecting and advancing those rights?

The board has just published its annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1965, and has taken the occasion to review in broad terms its achievements over the first 30 years of its existence.

Simply on a quantitative basis, the record is staggering.

● Over its first 30 years, the NLRB has handled more than 200,000 unfair labor practice cases affecting hundreds of thousands of workers. About two-thirds, or more than 133,000 cases, involved complaints against management while one-third involved complaints against unions.

● Over the same period, the board has conducted more than 140,000 representation elections which permitted more than 19 million workers to decide whether or not they wished to join unions. On an average more than 60 percent of the voters in such elections have decided that they did want such representation.

Nor has the pace of the work slowed down. If anything it has increased at a dizzy pace. In 1936, there were 865 unfair labor practice cases received by the board. During 1965, there were 15,800. In 1936, there were 31 representation elections conducted by the NLRB. In 1965, there were 7,824.

The mere statistics give a graphic picture of the huge labor-management problems that face the American people over the years and put into perspective the relatively minor nature of labor-management strife that reaches the strike stage.

BUT WHAT of the qualitative record? This is somewhat spotty.

● Despite heroic efforts by the board, the time lag in the settlement of disputes is still dreadfully long.

In 1958, for example, it took an average of 116 days for a complaint to be issued in an unfair labor practices case. In 1965, the average was 59 days. But issuance of a complaint is merely the beginning. Hearings must be held. Arguments must be heard. The board must ponder the recommendations of its trial examiners. Appeals can be made to the courts and new appeals on top of those. Years go on.

In the end, a union may emerge victorious—but dead.

The NLRB is struggling to cut down on this immense waste of time, but much still remains to be done in this area.

● Some of the most vicious forms of anti-labor activity have been eliminated, although management violence, particularly in the South, is far from over.

● Yellow dog contracts have been outlawed, but more subtle ways are still employed to wangle promises by workers not to join a union.

● The use of racial hatred—again mostly in the South—has been outlawed as an anti-union device.

● The NLRB has cracked down repeatedly on the illegal discharge of workers for union activity —$2,759,550 in total back pay was awarded during 1965 for such discharges—yet illegal firings continue to be a potent management weapon as the NLRB report itself admits.

The report gives greatly added weight to complaints of the AFL-CIO that strong action is needed to crack down on employers who "are permitted to intimidate and terrorize workers who exercise their right to join a union."

The NLRB history of the past 30 years is a history of ups and downs in the fight to guarantee the right of American workers to form unions and engage in collective bargaining. It is equally clear that much still remains to be done if the great dream of 1935 is to be realized.

Those Nieman Fellows Get An Education Too

For the editors of the nation's labor papers and magazines the annual journalism awards banquet of the International Labor Press Association, AFL-CIO, is the year's highlight.

For it is then that the contest winners get their accolades, the awards are presented, pictures taken, and the editors learn not only what they won, but why.

The contest is judged by the Nieman Fellows, young newspapermen of ability chosen for a year's study at Harvard of subjects of their own choosing—and at full pay.

But it is a two-way street. For if the ILPA editors learn from the judges' comments, the Niemans get an education too.

Said this year's judges' report:

"If the 19 members of the 1965-66 Nieman class were not aware of the labor press before coming to Harvard, they are now. We believe that sharing the judging burden not only enabled us to give more time and consideration to each entry, but also served to give us all a valuable introduction to another aspect of our profession. Thanks for a thoroughly enjoyable, truly educational experience which we will long remember."

So wrote Howard K. Spergel, education editor of the Houston Post, who chaired the contest committee.

The Niemans were "delighted to find that the harangue and blatant propaganda which have characterized the popular image of the labor press are becoming extinct."

They found "an interesting maturity in the handling of controversial issues and a willingness to examine knotty social problems in a fairly objective manner." And they added:

"Happily, the entries generally escaped the parochial issues which have received an overabundance of coverage in the labor press, such as attacks on 'big management' and stories about contract negotiations. Many of the publications took hard looks at the civil rights movement and poverty, problems that affect all Americans, not just the union member."

The top entries in each category, they found, "had professional quality and many of the publications, particularly the magazines, would give mass circulation products a battle for newsstand sales."

Three major areas need improvement, the judges declared. They are makeup, photography and encouragement of reportorial enterprise.

There are too many headline fonts, the pages of many papers look dirty and cramped, and there is too little experimentation with odd sizes and column widths.

There is not enough intelligent cropping of photographs, use of air brush and touch-up, or experimentation with odd-shaped cuts. There are too many pictures of local presidents, too many mug shots, too many posed photos of "a bored-looking group standing about doing nothing."

As to features, there should be more stories about people and fewer focussed on technology. The judges said they would like to see "more investigative reporting and fewer reports based on speeches, conferences and handouts. Several publications allowed their men to dig and the results generally merited contest prizes."

In too many cases, the judges said, editorials were written "to fill the allotted space. Some were obviously padded and said nothing new after the first few paragraphs. There is also a need for more editorials on local union issues, but then, this often takes courage."

The judges found photos and cartoons the weakest categories in the contest. The cartoon entries generally lacked imagination and artistic quality, most of the editorial cartoons were "cliches and at least one humorous attempt was tasteless."

The biggest flaw, according to the judges, was the lack of controversial letters to the editor.

"Although some papers had such columns, only one in the entire contest printed letters which argued with the party line. We believe that the establishment of a vigorous letters column would be one of the best ways for the labor press to destroy the argument that it is merely a vehicle for the establishment's views."

In addition to Spergel, the following Niemans were among those who judged the contest: William Hodding III, Nieman chairman, associate editor, Delta Democrat-Times, Greenville, Miss.; Jack Bass, governmental affairs reporter, Columbia, (S.C.) State; Robert A. Caro, reporter Newsday, Long Island, N.Y.; David E. Corbett, associate editor, Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune; Charles A. Ferguson, state capital correspondent, New Orleans (La.) States & Item; Robert H. Giles, editorial writer, Akron (O.) Beacon Journal; Donald D. Jackson, assistant editor, Life Magazine; Robert C. Maynard, reporter, York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily; Robert H. Metz, stock-market reporter, New York Times; David Miller, copy editor, New York Herald Tribune; James F. Montgomery, business editor, Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution; M. Wayne Woodlief, reporter, Norfolk (Va.) Ledger-Star; Ralph Hancox, Canada, editorial writer, Petersburg, Ontario, Examiner.

For contest purposes, publications are divided into three groups. Publications of national and international unions are in Group A; those of state and local central bodies or with multi-local readership, in Group B; those of individual local unions in Group C.

Awards are made for editorial excellence, best front page, best single editorial, best original cartoon, best feature article, best regular column, best original photograph, best community project. First place winners get plaques; others, certificates of merit or honorable mention.

All 19 Took Part

The annual ILPA journalism awards contest has been judged since 1961 by the Nieman Fellows of Harvard University. The Fellows are young newspapermen (under 35), awarded a year's study at Harvard, at full salary, on the subject of their choice, in recognition by the Nieman Foundation of their ability and future promise.

Sometimes a panel of Nieman Fellows —five or more—judge the ILPA contest. This year all 19 took part. The choice is theirs. While the Niemans get a general briefing from the ILPA officers, they are otherwise on their own. The ILPA takes no part in the judging.

Since each year brings a new batch of Fellows to Harvard, what pleases a group one year may not appeal to their successors, but that's the way it goes.

772 Entries By 73 Papers

This year's ILPA journalism awards contest drew 772 entries from 73 papers. The 33 papers of internationals sent in 450; those of central bodies, 100; those of local unions, 222.

More than a third of the internationals entered the contest; only a seventh of the central body papers, and a fourth of the local union publications.

The 29 top awards, the 46 certificates of merit, and the 11 honorable mentions were won by 36 papers or magazines. Six of the top awards went to 15 papers, which also won 19 of the merit certificates and five honorable mentions. The 14 others which won top awards also gathered in 19 of the certificates of merit and five of the 11 honorable mentions.

Of the 772 entries, 164 were feature stories; 157 front page; editorial, 124; general excellence, 113; regular column, 64; photo, 57; cartoon, 53; community project, 8. (The last is open only to central bodies and local union publications.)

UNION AT WORK

IAM on Ballot Spells Victory

First appearance of our union's new name, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, on a Federal election ballot brought victory to employees at the National Aviation Facilities Experimental Center, Atlantic City, N.J.

Grand Lodge Rep. Joe Mastriani reports that these employees won the International Association of Machinists by a decisive majority over the American Federation of Government Employees in a union representation election conducted recently by the Federal Aviation Agency under Presidential Executive Order 10988.

IAM Lodge 707 is preparing to negotiate the first union agreement benefiting the Atlantic City members. The NAFEC facility works on projects to promote air safety.

Anthony Daiuto, William Eagan, Nick Tullio and Ross Glidewell, committeemen for Lodge 707, helped the new members win the International Association of Machinists.

LBJ Asks Congress

- To repeal 'Right-to-Work' laws (Taft-Hartley Section 14(b))
- To raise and extend the minimum wage
- To require double time for some overtime
- To modernize system of unemployment benefits

Highest Rates Set on Qantas

Stutz

IAM members on Qantas Empire Airways, Inc., the Australian airline, have ratified a new 2½-year contract which raises pay from 32 to 46 cents an hour over the life of the contract.

Adolph Stutz, general chairman for IAM District 141, reports that by Oct. 1, 1966, hourly rates for lead maintenance technicians at San Francisco will go from the present $3.87 to $4.33 and, at Honolulu, from $4.17 to $4.63.

Foreign airlines, such as Qantas, traditionally have paid higher rates than U. S. lines.

Under the new agreement, members on Qantas will receive retroactive pay at the rate of 4½ per cent of their gross earnings covering the period from Oct. 1, 1964 to April 30, 1965. Other new benefits include vacation improvements, an extra paid holiday and a shorter work week of 37½ hours.

A Note on Our New Name And a Modern Type Face

This is now, officially, the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. We will carry the new name and emblem in all future issues in conformance with the 1964 convention recommendation, the membership vote in the November referendum. For short we will still be known as the IAM.

There is no change in the name of this newspaper, but we have changed the type on the flag above and on the back page. It is a strong, clean modern type face called "Craw Clarendon." The old type, an Old English script called "Cloister," no longer seemed appropriate. Old English script, and modern machinists and aerospace workers, belong to different centuries.

Chartering New Union at Union Carbide

The 2,230 members of the new lodge are employed at Union Carbide Corp., South Charleston, a plant that until recently defied union organization for some 40 years.

Mr. Siemiller, who on July 1 will succeed IAM President Al Hayes, applauded the members of Lodge 598 for their efforts in winning the union.

Mr. Smith commented that the reason Union Carbide's South Charleston plant was organized was "because we stuck to the issues and didn't promise people the world." Shown, l to r, are Mr. Siemiller, Mr. Smith, William Martin, lodge president; Trustees Hank Greene and Ronald B. Ownby; James C. Copenhaver, vice president; Ed Burns, secretary-treasurer; N. W. Coiner, conductor; Denver P. Dent, recording secretary; and Billy O. Keaton, trustee. Sentinel Herbert Reese was absent when photo was taken.

Q-C Job Upturn Still Needs More Action

The Cincinnati area movement to step up employment here and general job opportunities is being active but it still needs more steam to match job growth elsewhere in the nation. According to the latest statistics, Ohio employment rose 1 per cent in September over August and was 3 per cent higher than September one year ago. Cincinnati showed 2 per cent over the year. But Cincinnati was the tail end of the state dog of Ohio's eight largest cities. Canton, Columbus showed 6 per cent up; Akron, Youngstown were up 5 per cent; Cleveland, Dayton and Toledo were up 4 per cent.

These figures for this area are far from the drum-beating proportions indicated by a Cincinnati Chamber press release, saying "unemployment took a nose dive." When the area matches other Ohio urban centers, it will be ample time for sounding drums.

Chamber Fights Modernization Of Jobless Insurance

Programs launched by the U. S. Department of Labor, supported by the AFL-CIO and the Johnson administration, to modernize and mend the ripped seams in the Unemployment Compensation system after 30 years of atrophy, is being bitterly opposed by the national Chamber of Commerce. The lead in hostility to making the system better suited to 1965 problems in economic stability is taken by the Ohio Chamber of Commerce. The Ohio Chamber seems to consider their hostility as a matter bolstering their pride. The Ohio CC News Bulletin for November gives a rundown of their complete and unreconcilable war against proposed federal regulations to make the jobless insurance set-up work more efficiently for community stability.

The Chamber news item says:

"Aroused business, concerned over the Administration's proposal to federalize state unemployment compensation systems, is moving forward on two major fronts after many months of intense Ohio Chamber of Commerce activity.

• Ohio U. C. specialists are playing leadership roles in a series of Washington strategy conferences, the latest held October 29.

• Meanwhile, as the first session of the Congress adjourned, Ohio businessmen are carrying facts developed by the Chamber to Congressmen at home, showing clearly how the proposal, H. R. 8282, would affect their own businesses.

"With the first alert sounded in early 1965, a series of OCC bulletins and meetings followed as hearings before the Ways and Means Committee were scheduled for August. In preparation for its major leadership role in these hearings, the Ohio Chamber took an extensive survey among member firms to try to get some estimate of the costs.

"The Washington strategy conferences and the work at home followed the hearings. Leadership at the last Washington conference was essentially the same as at an earlier meeting sponsored by the Ohio Chamber. Automobile, steel, glass, rubber, aerospace and shipping enterprises were represented.

"The intense interest in the Washington conferences, plus the numerous personal contacts with Congressmen supplemented by staff field work, dramatize the aroused business community attitude in opposition to the proposed Federal take-over."

HOLD TO THE LIFELINE!

STRUGGLE grows tougher for labor to keep wage-earner income and pay rates in equitable parity with increases in manpower productivity. See lead editorial on page six.

Anti-Labor Forces Gird To KO Labor Friends

Labor across the country, and in particular the Cincinnati area labor movement, is going to be forced into rallying tough defensive preparations if they are going to stand up against a fiercely generaled and heavily mortared and cross-fired attack against representation in Congress by Congressmen friendly to labor.

A right wing conservative attack, funded by segments of business and industry that want to torpedo labor gains, aimed at knocking off all of the 51 new Congressional friends of labor is already in the making.

For Cincinnati labor such an attack as friends of labor and the plain citizenry means attacks on Ohio freshmen Congressmen Jack Gilligan, Robert Sweeney and Rodney Love (of Dayton and Hamilton). The break-throughs won in the first session of the 89th Congress for the plain American people have infuriated the more shallow thinking elements of selfish corporate power as well as the bitter right wing. These groups are out to lift the pin ball machines back to their way of shooting.

In addition to long range planning for the 1966 elections, the anti-labor alliances are gunning for an obstructionist score in the final session of the 89th Congress next year.

Between now and January 10, when the second session of the 89th Congress opens, anti-labor forces will be shaping their campaign to block repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's Section 14(b) and other measures of direct interest to the labor movement.

A survey by Press Associates, Inc., shows that the Senate filibuster, led by Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, that blocked consideration of 14(b) repeal, has given anti-labor groups new encouragement. With the exception of one group, no major industries such as auto, aircraft, steel or textile threw their support to repeal. The anti-labor groups are now going all out to enlist their backing and secure a solid front against a new repeal move in the new session.

The anti-union forces also recognize that the trade union movement will engage in a strong push for four proposals: repeal of 14(b), higher minimum wages, modernization of jobless pay and situs picketing.

Their plan is to try to enlist big business in a package deal, a strong, well-financed coalition to oppose all four. They reason that even firms which have found that union shop provisions in contracts are not objectionable would join the coalition because of their interest in opposing at least one of the other three measures.

The National Association of Manufacturers co-sponsored, along with other business groups, a National Conference on Unemployment Compensation in Washington recently.

A number of state and industry unemployment compensation experts recommended amendments to save employers' money by holding down benefits to the jobless, stepping up the experience rating, increasing both Federal and State rates, and the like.

Peace Corps Member Reports

John Bruning, former CHRONICLE staff writer and photographer, Peace Corps volunteer, reports in this issue from the South American Peace Corps field in Ecuador. One of the many Cincinnati area trade unionists who responded to the appeals of President John F. Kennedy for aid in bringing America's helping hand personally to the world's troubled and undal-developed people, Bruning in his feature report (which will appear in two parts) brings us an inside view in words and photographs of the workings of Peace Corps personnel on the downside of the world. # A Better Labor Press Is The Goal of ILPA

The International Labor Press Association, formed in 1956, is an affiliate of the AFL-CIO, with almost 400 member publications.

"The officers of ILPA work in close cooperation with my office," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared in a letter to presidents of AFL-CIO affiliates. "Their efforts to assist member publications and insure adherence to ethical standards are in complete conformity with AFL-CIO policy."

The ILPA was formed to improve the quality and effectiveness of the labor press, help establish new publications and protect the legitimate labor press by fighting corrupt imitators. It has succeeded in helping put out of business many racket publications trading on the good name of the labor movement.

Recognition has mounted with the years. President Meany is now a traditional speaker at ILPA conventions. The Labor Department stages a two-day conference every other year, addressed by top government officials. The 1963 conference included a meeting with President Kennedy and a reception at the White House; the 1964 conference included an address by President Johnson at the White House and a press conference, first such conference ever held by a president. The 1966 conference included a White House meeting with an address by President Johnson, followed by a White House reception.

Increasingly, the Federal Trade Commission, the Better Business Bureau and district attorneys lean on the ILPA for its data on racket publications.

More and more various unions, in their regional conferences, lean on ILPA publications as an educational aide. The ILPA Press Relations Guide has gone through many printings, and more than 50,000 copies have been distributed. The calls come not only from American unions, but from those abroad. In its field, the Guide is an international best seller. Other ILPA publications are also in brisk demand.

Biennial conventions are planned around workshop sessions led by authorities on writing, readership, layout, makeup and effective use of photos and other illustrations.

An annual labor press journalism awards contest is judged by the Nieman Fellows of Harvard University, young newspapermen awarded a year's study at Harvard in recognition of their work.

State and regional conferences, especially valuable to editors of smaller papers, are held yearly, usually in cooperation with a university.

The ILPA office keeps a sharp eye on legislation and regulations affecting the labor press.

The ILPA Reporter, a monthly newsletter, is a clearing house for information and ideas. A labor press directory is issued biennially. (The demand is constant, and rises especially in an election year.)

The 145 local union publications constitute the largest single group of the 397 members of ILPA. Next come the 110 publications of central bodies, followed by the 102 publications of international and national unions. (These are present figures; there has been a steady annual increase.)

The AFL-CIO accounts for two publications, its department publications for seven and the Canadian Labour Congress for one.

There are nine Canadian local publications, eight regional associations and 15 associate members.

Of the more than 30 international or national unions not represented, most are too small to have publications.

ROBERT C. WEAVER, Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, addressing the labor editors' conference. That's Ray Davidson, ILPA president, seated.

CANCEL BNA service, was the plea of Urcel Daniel (at mike) as many unions already have done, because the Newspaper Guild is on strike against a near-sighted management that refuses to grant a union shop. Seated, Henry Santiestevan, who introduced Miss Daniel as a former colleague on the west coast, and who also scored in the journalism awards contest as editor of the IUD Agenda, and Kenneth Fiester, ILPA secretary-treasurer, and a strike veteran himself.

ONE-PARTY PRESS?

It sure is—the commercial press, we mean. It's a one-party press, all right, and we aren't talking about Democrats and Republicans.

Any time the Democrats think they've got a complaint about the press, they ought to take a look at the labor movement and count their blessings.

The papers that loved Jack Kennedy then and love Lyndon Johnson now just can't stand trade unions. It's easy enough to understand. The people who own the press—and the TV and radio—are employers. They bargain with unions. They KNOW unions are mean, unreasonable and obstinate, because their own unions won't let them have their own way.

It's pretty hopeless to expect editorial support from these folks. Some papers (out of conscience) and more TV-radio stations (by law) give unions a fair shake on news. Opinion is another matter.

So is it hopeless? Not at all. There is another press—the labor press—to provide at least a partial balance. It is already doing well; it could do better with greater understanding and support from the labor movement.

We need more labor papers, and especially more good labor papers. We need more local and community papers. If you don't know how to start, there's a place to ask. Write to:

Morgan Says:

Flexibility of Teacher Corps Offers Hope to Poor Schools

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

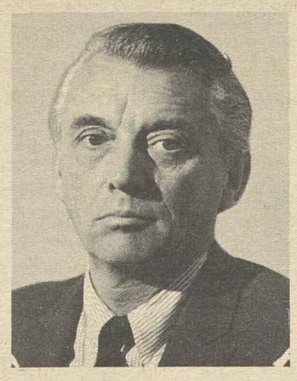
RICHES ARE NOT necessarily equated with perfection but surely the richest nation in the world can do better than this: there are at least 5 million children across this opulent land trapped in the crevices of poverty, either in city slums or the gritty areas of want out in the countryside.



Morgan

Their parents were caught there too, and in all likelihood, their grandparents. They have been imprisoned in what sociologists call the "poverty cycle." It may be too late for the older folks to break out of it in terms of "bettering themselves," of moving steadily upward on the economic scale. The war on poverty may get some relief to them eventually, their health needs may be dealt with more satisfactorily as medicare and other programs expand; their lives may even be thinly embellished with some adult education project. But if emphasis has to be divided, then the potential assets the nation must concentrate on are the children.

These 5 million with a heritage of poverty will only grow up to turn over this same barren bequest to another generation if they stay in the cycle. But there is hope for them to escape: education. It is a narrow hope at best, because so much time has been lost and the problem is so big. But nothing should be ruled out as impossible in this space age.

If we can land a man on the moon, as we will, the Great Society ought to be able to land an under-privileged child on his feet. The chances are brightened by the fact that many federal programs now have a kind of interlocking action. In the Office of Economic Opportunity's community action battle plans, Operation Head Start has not only demonstrated what can be done to get children on their way up by concentrating on the kindergarten age, but it has revealed the need for parental training in the care and feeding of these boys and girls.

Operation Upward Bound is concentrating on salvaging the educational potential of high school youngsters, converting them into college material instead of leaving them on a growing dump heap of drop-outs. Now this effort is about to be fortified by the deployment of new troops, the National Teacher Corps.

Pres. Johnson formally proposed this unit nearly a year ago. He jostled Congress into creating it last session, but the action was meaningless because the legislators thoughtfully refused to appropriate a penny in funds. The atmosphere has been a little improved in this session and now the Corps is about to come into existence on a sort of cadre basis with a congressional OK for a $9.5 million budget. This is supposed to be enough to send about 1,700 Corpsmen (and women) into poverty areas, but the experts estimate at least 10,000 volunteers are needed over the next three years, calling for some $60 million in operating funds.

PART OF THE difficulty is due to a kind of reflex "states' rights" resistance and local fears that a long federal arm will reach out and "control" public education. The Administration is trying to counter that with the explanation that the recruits will be paid the going teacher salary in the areas where they serve (ironically already too low in most places); they will be under the authority of local—not federal—officials and they will supplement—not supplant—local teachers.

In the slums and rural depressed areas, the poverty cycle and the teacher shortage are interrelated. Poor schools, most of all, need more teachers. But poor schools, least of all, can offer facilities and salaries to attract teachers. Result: an aggravated shortage and the teachers working often are not up to the terrific and peculiar educational challenges posed by poverty-stricken neighborhoods.

It is hoped the Teacher Corps can break this revolving impasse by augmenting experienced teachers with specially trained college graduates who need not possess degrees in education. The Corps will provide such training plus special emphasis on the approach to problems of the poor. Furthermore volunteers will spend only half their time teaching. For the other half they can pursue —at government expense—a master's degree in any field they wish; it doesn't need to be teaching.

It may be this flexibility, it may be the tapping of little human reservoirs of adventurous dedication and good will as the response to the Peace Corps demonstrated, it may be a combination of both; in any event applications for the National Teacher Corps are reportedly surging in at more than 600 a day.

Let's hope that this impressive response will act as a kind of lobby in itself, pressuring Congress to provide adequate funds for this venture before it is too late and everybody's rising expectations are dashed in disappointment.

End to Tax Credit Urged:

Corporate Profits Boom Held Main Threat to U.S. Economy

BOOMING CORPORATE profits and resulting heavy outlays for new plant and equipment pose the greatest threats of inflation in the economy today, an AFL-CIO economist has declared.

Pointing out that corporate profits have been on a steep and steady rise over the last five years, Irving Beller of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research said that the capital goods sector of the economy "is showing signs of inflationary pressure."

By contrast, Beller said, "the consumer sector," which reflects the income of workers, shows "very few signs of such inflationary pressures."

He noted that while "the share of corporate income going to profits, even after five years of expansion, continues to go higher and higher . . . the share going to wages and labor compensation in general has been going down." His statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Beller urged that the 7 percent tax credit presently allowed corporations for capital expenditures be removed to avoid creation of "productive capacity that will not be used—capacity that will eventually lie idle."

"I DON'T THINK that this had any justification when it was originally introduced in 1962," he said, adding that even without that special tax break, there would have been "enormous increases in capital expenditures as a result of the healthy economic growth" that has taken place in recent years.

Beller said that the investment tax credit is currently boosting annual corporate profits by "about $1.5 billion."

Reporters questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, aired weekly over the Mutual radio network, were Eileen Shanahan of the New York Times' Washington bureau and Stanley Levey, labor correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE CALIFORNIA Republican primary on June 7, in which the political future of TV actor Ronald Reagan is at stake, should reveal something about the current strength of the GOP's right wing in that turbulent state.

Reagan, who is opposed for nomination for governor by former Mayor George Christopher of San Francisco, has run a campaign reminiscent of that other movie star, George Murphy, two years ago. And Murphy was elected to the Senate.

Everybody knows that Reagan was a principal fund-raiser in 1964 for the right-winger's hero, former Sen. Barry Goldwater. But he has carefully backed away from letting his campaign managers be the same ones Goldwater used in the state and carefully avoided attacks on social security, the federal income tax and a few other Goldwater targets.

Such are the subtleties of California politics that the public opinion surveys have shown Reagan ahead of Christopher for the GOP nomination—but lagging far behind when it comes to the next question, as to which might have the better chance against incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown in the general election.

A significant fact is that Reagan, while backing away from too close an identification with Goldwater, nevertheless can't help talking on many issues like the former Arizona senator.

He is against open-occupancy housing legislation, he acknowledged to a Negro audience, because he sees it as a threat to "freedom." He was against the Voting Rights Act passed last year. He is against "crime in the streets." He is opposed to the urban renewal program. He is in favor of introducing Mexican nationals, again, as workers on California's factory farms.

Gov. Brown's state unemployment insurance system, he says, has been turned into "prepaid vacations for a segment of our society which has made this a way of life." On school consolidation—surely a proper subject for state leadership—he's against it unless the consolidation is approved by vote of the people of the districts involved.

Reagan will unquestionably get the votes of those who in 1964 gave Goldwater a narrow but decisive victory in the GOP presidential primary over Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York. The principal support for Christopher comes from the elements that have long been affiliated with the moderate Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel. As for the rest of California's Republican voters—who knows?

THE ELECTION news from Alabama, uniformly discouraging at the time of the first Democratic primary May 3, remained discouraging following the May 31 run-off primary.

Candidates for statewide office backed by the (white) Citizens Council were victorious. Two state senators who helped filibuster to death a proposed constitutional change to allow Gov. George C. Wallace to run for a second successive term were defeated.

There was one bright spot. The Dallas County (Selma) Democratic Committee, under the gun of a federal court, officially certified the nomination of Wilson Baker for sheriff over incumbent James G. Clark. There had been a dispute about counting the ballots in several boxes left unguarded overnight.

It was Clark's mounted "possemen" who pursued and whipped fleeing Negroes across the fields when the first abortive Selma-to-Montgomery demonstration march was attempted last year. Even after the sheriff was enjoined from interference with the later successful march, he stood at the roadblocks as the marchers passed them sporting in his lapel the white button bearing the single word, "Never."

Baker, at that time head of Selma's municipal police, gave full protection to orderly demonstrations permitted under court order. Moreover, he could not have defeated Clark merely by Negro "bloc voting" against white "bloc voting"; the races are almost evenly divided in Dallas County. A substantial number of white voters must have cast their ballots against Jim Clark.

TODAY'S GREATEST inflation threats are booming corporate profits and resulting heavy outlays for plant and equipment, AFL-CIO Economist Irving Beller (center) told Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Eileen Shanahan of the New York Times on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO public service interview aired over the Mutual radio network.

House Rollcalls on Minimum Wage

There were three key votes in the House on the bill to increase the minimum wage and extend its coverage.

Column I is the rollcall rejecting an amendment which would have denied coverage to 1.6 million persons, primarily retail employes. On this vote, 186 Democrats and 14 Republicans supported labor's position by opposing the amendment; 111 Republicans and 84 Democrats voted to reduce coverage.

Column II is the vote by which the House delayed for an additional year the second-step increase in the minimum wage to $1.60 an hour. Voting for the delay and against labor's position were 110 Republicans and 85 Democrats. Voting against the delay were 178 Democrats and 16 Republicans.

Column III shows the defeat of a labor-opposed motion to send the bill back to committee to eliminate coverage of farm workers and to weaken overtime coverage of processing workers. Voting against recommittal were 195 Democrats and 37 Republicans; for recommittal were 90 Republicans and 77 Democrats.

"Right" votes on labor's scoreboard are indicated by the letter "R" while "Wrong" votes are designated "W." Other symbols: A—Absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

$6 Million Budgeted:

Clothing Workers Press Organizing

Atlantic City, N. J.—The Clothing Workers have cleared the way for a vigorous organizing campaign by doubling the organizing budget to $6 million in the coming two years, Pres. Jacob Potofsky announced at the close of the union's 25th biennial convention here.

ACWA's current organizing progress has been satisfying but "now is the time to really drive hard" in the unorganized apparel plants, mainly in the South and Southwest, Potofsky said.

Convention delegates representing 385,000 workers in the U.S., Canada and Puerto Rico pledged the union's resources to a continuing campaign of organization.

They nominated Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum for additional two-year terms without opposition and approved a constitutional change raising their salaries from $25,000 to $30,000 a year. Both have held their present posts since 1946.

Board Enlarged

The delegates voted to expand the executive board from 23 seats to 25 and nominated 21 incumbent vice presidents and 33 additional candidates. Balloting will be by mail, with the names only of those accepting nomination on the referendum ballot.

The convention approved strong policy statements on apparel imports, foreign affairs, consumer legislation, civil rights and other issues.

It also called for establishment of a national Dept. of Consumer Affairs and passage by Congress of improved minimum wage and consumer protection laws.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, in a major address to the delegates, called for a national drive against "slumism," which he described as poverty, illiteracy, discrimination and hatred—"not just broken-down buildings" but "poverty of the person" and the spirit.

The war against slums and deprivation is "a war in which all of us must enlist" because "we have the resources and capacity to abolish the scourge of slumism—we must have the will," Humphrey said.

NAACP Executive Dir. Roy Wilkins praised organized labor for its support of civil rights for all and said he is confident labor will "continue in the path its more enlightened units, such as the ACWA, have charted and followed."

Assistant Labor Sec. Esther Peterson, who is also special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, called for technical assistance by the government to help industries meet higher labor standards, protection for consumers such as the truth-in-lending and truth-in-packaging bills, and strengthening of the rights of women workers.

Pres.-elect Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers brought delegates a message of friendship from ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky and saluted the ACWA for its pioneering achievements in the field of cooperative housing. The two unions have helped achieve a better life for members but one continuing problem remains—that of achieving sufficient earnings, Stulberg said.

THE CLOTHING WORKERS' 25th biennial convention approved a $6 million budget for an expanded organizing drive in the next two years. More than 1,500 delegates attended general sessions.

TWU Vote Backs Officer Changes

New York—Members of the Transport Workers voted by an 8-1 margin in a national referendum for constitutional changes involving union officers. The changes confirm the appointment of Sec.-Treas. Douglas L. MacMahon and Executive Vice Pres. James F. Horst.

MacMahon and Horst were named by the executive council after the death of former Pres. Michael J. Quill Jan. 28. Quill was succeeded by Matthew Guinan, who had been secretary-treasurer and executive vice president.

Boss Glove Boycott Backed by AFL-CIO

The AFL-CIO pledged its "full cooperation" with the Clothing Workers' expanded consumer boycott campaign against Boss Manufacturing Co. voted at the union's 25th biennial convention.

Federation Pres. George Meany told ACWA that major unions with members in large plants will be contacted to guard against purchase of Boss gloves and to support the boycott.

IUE Recruits Job Trainees In 12 Cities

Members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers will conduct a house-to-house drive in 12 key cities to recruit 1,500 disadvantaged persons for on-the-job training programs in the electrical manufacturing industry.

Under a $156,000 Labor Dept. contract, the IUE will seek out unemployed and underemployed persons for training and assist them during the training period, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced.

The cities selected for the first recruiting drive are Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Boston, Newark, N.J., and Springfield, Mass.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings signed the Manpower Development & Training Act contract with Manpower Administrator Stanley H. Ruttenberg and assigned IUE Civil Rights Dir. William S. Gary to the drive.

Ruttenberg said the IUE is the first union to launch an on-the-job training program on a wide scale with a "buddy" system to aid the disadvantaged.

Stronger Labor Role Urged in Health Field

Sharply stepped-up labor involvement in the organization of community health services will be necessary under the new medicare amendments to the Social Security Act, participants in the first AFL-CIO conference on health care agreed.

Conferees from a dozen unions, and from medical schools, the federal government and labor education departments of six universities agreed that all hospital and health manpower resources will be under severe strain when the medicare amendments become effective July 1.

Reporting on the conference theme—After Medicare, What?—the delegates agreed that labor central bodies, city and state, should take the initiative in developing comprehensive care programs on a community and multi-union basis. Cited as one example on the city level was the program of the Cleveland, O., AFL-CIO and other community groups.

Unions have a long history of leadership in advancing health services in this country and have been "the single most powerful influence in the improvement of health benefits," Dr. Carruth J. Wagner, chief of the bureau of medical services of the U. S. Public Health Service, told the conference.

The close cooperation of labor, education, the health professions and government will be needed to meet the need for many more health workers—records personnel, nurses' aides, and other paramedical staff members, Dr. Wagner said.

Dr. William Kissick of the Office of the U. S. Surgeon General said the public has come to recognize that "every American should be entitled to the best possible medical care without regard to economic status." This will require the involvement of labor as the "largest organized body of consumers of medical care," Dr. Kissick reported.

Other speakers included Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Assistant Dir. Richard E. Shoemaker of the Dept. of Social Security; Frank Emig of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities; Malcolm Evans, Auto Workers; Ted Ellsworth, University of California at Los Angeles; Dr. S. J. Axelrod, University of Michigan School of Public Health and spokesmen for the Group Health Association of America, Inc., the Machinists and the Community Health Foundation.

Five Negroes Win Run-Offs In Alabama

Galifianakis and Smith Bagley ran first and second in a four-candidate race but Galifianakis, a state representative, fell short of an absolute majority. The seat is being vacated by Democratic incumbent Rep. Ralph J. Scott.

Republicans have a run-off primary scheduled in the 10th Congressional District between W. Hall Young and Donald W. Wirick to pick a nominee to challenge Democratic incumbent Rep. Basil V. Whitener in November.

Otherwise, politically, a replay of a 1964 battle shaped up in Tennessee when Gov. Frank G. Clement said he would challenge incumbent Sen. Ross Bass for Democratic nomination to a full six-year term. Bass defeated Clement two years ago in a contest to fill the remainder of the unexpired term of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver.

Republicans also have a primary battle set for the Senate nomination. Howard H. Baker, Jr., beaten by Bass in the general election in 1964, is seeking the GOP nomination again. His opponent is Kenneth L. Roberts, state campaign manager two years ago for Republican presidential candidate Barry Goldwater.

Clement in his 1964 campaign criticized Bass for having supported civil rights legislation although the governor has since then sought to mend relations with the state's Negro voters. He has indicated that this year he will assail Bass' "support" of repeal of Section 14(b).

Two filibusters by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) prevented the Senate from ever actually having a vote on repeal, but Bass voted three times for cloture to shut off the filibusters.

Extra Year Delay in $1.60 Pay Base Priced at $2 Billion in Lost Wages

ment was on the floor and the New Mexico congressman had just finished a speech urging the delay on the ground that a jump from $1.40 to $1.60 one year later would be too abrupt and would "overheat" the economy.

The committee bill, which Morris sought to amend, was itself a carefully fashioned compromise—the result of an agreement by labor, the Administration and the ranking members of the House Labor Committee. Powell himself, on March 10, announced before television cameras a final "meeting of the minds" on the timing of the increase.

As Morris finished his speech, Powell asked him whether he would "accept an amendment to his amendment" which would delay the second-step increase for two years instead of three years.

With alacrity, Morris agreed, declaring:

"I would personally rather have the 36 months, but if the gentleman from New York and the committee feel they can compromise on 24 months, I would certainly yield to their great wisdom and judgment."

Powell absolved the committee from the deal, replying:

"I am doing this unilaterally and not on behalf of the committee. We have not discussed it at all."

Any Sponsors?

After this exchange, Morris inquired whether anyone was offering the two-year stretch-out amendment Powell had suggested.

Powell replied that he was not "personally" offering such an amendment, "just engaging in colloquy" to find out if such an amendment would be agreeable to Morris.

A few minutes later, Rep. William H. Ayres, an Ohio Republican, formally offered the amendment, declaring that he was "very happy that the chairman of the full committee," referring to Powell, "has agreed to accept it."

The floor manager of the bill, Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), made it clear that he wasn't accepting any such amendment and the issue went to two votes.

The first test was a non-record vote while the House was meeting as a Committee of the Whole. With a number of members absent, the teller count was 160 for the Ayres amendment, 121 opposed.

As observers noted and newspaper stories reported, Powell did not vote either way on that test.

Later, on the rollcall which hammered the amendment into the bill, Powell voted against the stretch-out amendment he had suggested—thus ending up with a "right" vote on the AFL-CIO scoreboard.

The rollcall for the Ayres amendment was a close 205-194—a switch of only six votes would have reversed the outcome.

The narrow margin appears to bear out the contention of legislative analysts that the more drastic three-year wage stretch-out could certainly have been defeated.

White House Conference:

Rights Parley Keyed To Action Program

sounded the keynote, declaring the 20 million Negro Americans "will no longer be pacified by slogans or tokens . . . nor should they."

The program presented to the conference, Humphrey readily conceded, would appear startlingly "radical" to many. But, he asked, "What are the alternatives?"

Fulfilling the legitimate expectations of the civil rights revolution, Humphrey said, "will be America's most urgent domestic task for many years to come."

Meany's message called for passage of the pending civil rights bill and urged "a far faster pace" of school desegregation aided by "a special multi-billion dollar federal school fund."

Above all, he said, "there must be jobs at good wages for all who can work. There must be an adequate system of income maintenance for those who cannot."

Dialogue Begins

In a dozen workshops, the delegates began the dialogue—seeking to break down broad generalities into specific actions they can undertake in their home communities and programs they can present to their organizations.

Joining in the two days of discussions was a cross-section of concerned America—Negro and white, college deans and slum dwellers, union officials and corporation presidents, civil rights militants and moderate white southerners, clergymen of all faiths and ranks. Labor's contingent of about 100 came from large and small unions and from state and city central bodies.

It was an audience wrenched in the heart by Randolph's account of "the destructive and devastating impact of the ghetto" and his warning that: "Every day's delay in breaking down the barriers of segregation in housing, schools and discrimination in jobs means irreparable damage to hundreds of thousands of human beings."

The solution, he said, can't wait until people "are educated out of their prejudices" or "until everyone loves his neighbor."

Negroes, he stressed, are not asking for "love" but for "their rights as citizens and human beings."

The conference marked a new step in the move towards self-isolation from the mainstream of the civil rights movement by the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, which boycotted the conference even though one of its spokesmen had served as a member of the leadership council.

Resolutions Allowed

A controversy over conference rules was apparently averted by a compromise which permitted introduction and voting on resolutions in the final sessions of the 12 workshops.

The council had originally barred formal resolutions on the ground that the limited time of the conference and its broad scope made it impractical to devote hours to parliamentary maneuverings.

The no resolution policy was sharply attacked by spokesmen for the Congress of Racial Equality and the council, after determining that a substantial number of delegates favored some form of voting, adopted the workshop resolution policy on the eve of the conference.

Workshop sessions were still in progress as the AFL-CIO News went to press and the conference was scheduled to wind up with a final dinner meeting. A summary of the views expressed at workshops, as well as resolutions adopted, was to be presented to Pres. Johnson.

Factory Hiring Down for April

The factory hiring rate declined nearly 10 percent in April—from 52 to 47 per 1,000 workers, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Labor Dept. reported. This was accompanied by slight fall-offs in the seasonally adjusted layoff and quit rates.

The decline in hirings resulted, BLS said, from a reduction in new hires. But the April figures may represent only a temporary drop since both the accession and new hire rates had reached high levels in March, according to the report.

Clean Elections Bill Proposed by Johnson

Pres. Johnson sent a proposed "clean elections" bill to Congress, in line with a pledge in his State of the Union message last January, intended to change radically the traditional methods of financing political campaigns.

Principal features of the Administration measure are designed, the President said, to eliminate the "evasion" and "circumvention" invited by existing laws covering political contributions and to encourage wider public participation in the financing of campaigns to reduce "undue influence of large contributors."

The wider public participation would be encouraged by allowing citizens a maximum of a $100 tax deduction for political contributions —federal, state or local.

The "evasion" of existing election expenditure laws would be attacked by eliminating technical "ceilings" of $3 million for a national committee during presidential years while there is no limit on the proliferation of committees that may raise funds and spend them in behalf of a candidate.

The Administration bill is marked by several features that represent, in part at least, departures from previous "clean elections" proposals considered by Congress for more than a decade:

- It seeks to put teeth into the theoretical maximum of $5,000 in contributions from any person for any candidate by requiring that all contributions—to committee, candidate's treasurer or any other group —be counted in the total.
- The maximum $100 tax deduction for political contributions would be allowed any taxpayer whether he itemizes deductions on his federal income tax return or takes the "standard deduction" of 10 percent.

The AFL-CIO has urged an actual tax credit—a reduction from the tax owed—for political contributions rather than a mere deduction from taxable income.

- The Administration bill would apply to primary elections as well as to general elections.
- It would recognize tax deductibility for contributions to political committees working for a candidate as well as contributions to formal party organizations.

USWA Canned Milk Aids Viet Children

Five hundred cases of canned chocolate milk are en route to Viet Nam—a gift of the Steelworkers to children attending schools organized by the Vietnamese Federation of Labor.

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel wrote Pres. Tran Quoc Buu of the Vietnamese federation that the milk is a "token of solidarity" from USWA local unions throughout the nation. He said the union is also furnishing through CARE 800 school kits along with quantities of sewing, physical education, needle trade and classroom supply kits for distribution by Viet Nam unions.

his conviction that "we shall either move this nation toward civil peace and social justice for all of its citizens, or for none."

He added: "We shall either find the means to open employment to all our workers, to find decent housing for all our families, to provide a good education for all our children, or we shall see the American promise spoiled for each of them."

There is no "sanctuary" for anyone, Johnson affirmed, "from the effects of widespread poverty and discrimination."

In tackling the problems of jobs, education and housing—"the tap roots of poverty"—mistakes have been made and "we will make others," the President said. "We will arouse hopes as we have already done, that cannot be quickly fulfilled. But," he stressed, "we are moving. We shall not turn back."

Johnson took note of the diversity of views expressed at the conference, telling the delegates: "Your President may not agree with everything you do, but he will consider everything you say."

4 Douglas Plants Go to Auto Union

A representation election in four Tennessee plants of the Douglas Aircraft Corp., conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, resulted in a 115-35 victory for the Auto Workers.

The plants are in Sparta, Monterey, Cookeville and Carthage, and turn out components for military and space purposes. Present employment totals 158 persons, with plans for expansion to 3,000.

Free Labor Institute Graduates 13th Class

The American Institute for Free Labor Development is educating 20,000 Latin American workers and union leaders yearly, the graduating class of the 13th training program was told in ceremonies at AFL-CIO headquarters.

The 19 newest graduates of the four-year-old school now return to eight Latin American nations to extend further the teachings of trade unionism "tailored to the needs of the workers and their country," AIFLD Administrator William C. Doherty, Jr. declared.

The students, who completed the first program of advanced training for trade union educators, were urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to "work not for themselves alone, not for their members alone but for their entire society as a whole" upon their return home.

Meany told the students that the path their unions took in achieving these ends was of their own choosing, though U. S. unions admittedly have a selfish interest in the AIFLD.

"It is in the interest of American labor that free unions exist all over the Western Hemisphere," he said. "Where workers are not free, soon all social institutions are not free."

Preceding his remarks, Meany read a message from Pres. Johnson who saluted the "conscientious students" for their eagerness and knowledge which will "open new vistas of hemispheric progress and achievement."

David Bronheim, deputy coordinator for the Alliance for Progress told the graduates that they "return to the hemisphere on the march."

"Your job is to lift the heads of those who have been unable to lift their own," he said.

Joint Program

The AIFLD is an international program by the AFL-CIO in conjunction with business and government to develop democratic trade unions and encourage free collective bargaining in Latin America. The program also includes projects for worker-owned housing and "impact projects" ranging from disaster aid to playgrounds.

AIFLD's educational impact on Latin America was noted by Doherty, who pointed out that during the last three years, the institute had established in-resident training centers in 20 different countries. Workers who attend these centers return to their unions in the outlying villages and provinces to put their new knowledge into practice.

The program in Washington is primarily aimed at advanced training for union specialists.

Speaking for the graduating students, Angel Sandoval Esponoza of Peru declared their hopes were "now fortified by the armor of newly-gained ideas and knowledge" to help in their "struggle for a democracy with bread, peace and freedom."

The graduates also were addressed by the president of the Inter-American Development Bank, Felipe Herrera, and Rev. Benjamin L. Masse, associate editor of America magazine.

The students represented unions in Argentina, Bolivia, Colombia, Chile, Ecuador, Peru and Venezuela.

Court Upholds New Districts In Maryland

The State of Maryland became one of the last to learn what its congressional districts will be for this year's election when the Supreme Court upheld a lower court decree dividing the state into eight districts substantially equal in population.

The Maryland General Assembly failed in both 1965 and 1966 to devise a congressional districting plan that met the "one man, one vote" standards laid down by the high court.

A 1965 redistricting bill passed by the state legislature was suspended when it was petitioned to popular referendum and later held unconstitutional by a three-judge special federal court.

A 1966 special session summoned to devise a new plan collapsed in bickering and adjourned without action. The federal court then issued its own redistricting decree and prohibited any referendum on the legislature's 1965 plan.

The Supreme Court upheld the lower court in a summary order rejecting last-ditch protests without discussing them.

Jobless Rate Climbs Back to 4 Percent

May Level Moved Up By Youth

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate rose to 4 percent in May as women and student jobseekers swelled the unemployment count, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The key seasonally adjusted jobless rate moved up from 3.7 percent in April to 4 percent in May, returning to its January level. The rate had dipped to 3.7 percent in February, its lowest point in nearly 13 years and held at 3.8 percent in March.

Arthur Ross, commissioner of labor statistics, was unperturbed by the jobless rise.

"The overall movement is still upward and unemployment will resume its decline later in the year," Ross told reporters.

He read the "mixed trends" of the May job picture as a "deceleration in the rate of growth."

In May, total unemployment rose 140,000 to 2.9 million, the Labor Dept. report said, noting:

Rise Pinpointed

"The increase was concentrated among women and younger workers. On the other hand, the demand for adult male workers continued very strong and the rate of unemployment for workers covered by unemployment insurance reached a new low."

On the employment side of the picture, non-farm payroll jobs showed a jump of 575,000—170,000 more than seasonal—to a total 63.1 million, the report said.

The rate of advance in the non-farm area during the past two months has "tapered off from the rapid expansion of the first quarter," the Labor Dept. added.

Total employment failed to show the expected seasonal rise, mainly because bad weather held down the usual May increase in agriculture, the report continued. Total jobs increased by 650,000 to 73.8 million. Of this rise, agriculture accounted for only 100,000—about half a million less than expected due to bad weather delaying farm activity, the report said.

Ross said jobseeking students may have accounted for one or two-tenths of the three-tenths rise in the jobless rate.

The rate for the 14-17 year-old group jumped from 12.5 percent in April to 14.7 percent in May. This group made up 690,000 of the 2.9 million total jobless.

Of this group, the 16 and 17-year

'Truth-in-Packaging' Bill Wins Strong Senate Vote

Measure Designed To Aid Consumer

By David L. Perlman

The Senate heeded the voice of the consumer and passed a truth-in-packaging bill designed to curb deception and confusion in the marketplace.

It approved the labor-supported bill, 71-9, after rejecting a series of amendments which would have either taken the guts out of the bill, killed it, or transformed it into a boomerang against consumers.

Pres. Johnson, praising the Senate action, called the bill "one of the most important" of the year and urged swift House approval.

Senators Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), who first introduced a packaging bill in 1962, and Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee and floor manager for the measure, held the line against a barrage of Republican-sponsored amendments.

The chief attacks came from:

• An amendment by Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.) which would have stripped from the bill all references to packaging. It would have transformed the legislation, as Cotton phrased it, into a mild "clarity in labeling" bill. The amendment was beaten, 53-32.

• Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen's attempt to pigeonhole the bill by having it referred to the Judiciary Committee for further consideration. The bill came out of the Commerce Commitee, but Dirksen argued that it had anti-trust implications that fell within the jurisdiction of Judiciary. The Senate rejected the claim, 64-19.

• An attempt by Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R-Ky.) to make the bill unacceptable to its principal supporters by tacking on an amendment giving manufacturers the right to set and enforce minimum prices for their products. This device used to be called "fair trade"; the latest euphemism is "quality stabilization." Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) commented: "We're trying to help

IAM, Lines Study Panel Pact Terms

Negotiators for 34,000 members of the Machinists and five major airlines headed back to the contract bargaining table to consider recommendations by a three-man presidential panel for a settlement of their deadlocked contract talks.

The emergency board was named by Pres. Johnson Apr. 21 to head off a strike of IAM ground crews at Eastern, National, Northwest, Trans World and United airlines.

It recommended a 42-month contract retroactive to Jan. 1 with wage hikes totaling 48 cents an hour for top-rated workers, 34 cents for all others; shorter wage steps in a progression schedule, and other changes.

IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller said "we know many union members will be disappointed and dissatisfied" but the union is ready to "work out an agreement our members will buy and thus avoid the necessity of a work stoppage."

The union will be free to strike July 5 if a settlement is not achieved.

Calling its elected general chairmen on the affected lines to Chicago for discussions, the IAM pointed out that "final action in this dispute will be decided only by a vote of IAM members on the five airlines."

The union started joint negotia-

Meany Gives Charter To N.Y. Taxi Union

By Eugene A. Kelly

The "complete cooperation" of the AFL-CIO in helping build a strong union of New York taxi drivers and garage workers was pledged by Federation Pres. George Meany as he presented a charter of affiliation to the newly-formed taxi union.

Meany welcomed representatives of some 24,000 taxi industry employes to the ranks of labor and congratulated the union for its successes to date. But he warned "it's the job of you taxi drivers to build the union."

Asserting that the New York taxi industry needs a vigorous union, Meany said earnestly: "Now put this in your pipe and smoke it—you can't have much of a union unless you build an organization" that, like the AFL-CIO itself, works together for the good of all.

He presented the charter to Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City Central Labor Council, as head of the committee which over a 20-month period organized the union, won representation elections in most of the city's fleet garages and, under the spur of a five-day work stoppage, won sizable benefits in a first contract with taxi employers.

Also present at the ceremony viewed by some 150 taximen, who left New York at 5 a.m. for a five-hour bus trip to Washington, were five AFL-CIO vice presidents and the federation's New York Regional Dir. Michael Mann.

The vice presidents joined in welcoming the new union—New York City Taxi Drivers DALU 3036—and told the audience that

Bruising Election Battle Shapes Up in California

A bruising election battle for the governorship of California shaped up for this fall as Goldwater-backer Ronald Reagan overwhelmed a moderate Republican to win the GOP nomination to face Gov. Edmund G. Brown.

Reagan's identity with the conservative Goldwater wing of the Republican Party, solidly established in the 1964 campaign, apparently was no barrier to his 2 to 1 defeat of the GOP moderate, former San Francisco Mayor George Christopher.

Four years ago a Goldwater candidate was easily defeated in the GOP primary by former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, who later went down to defeat by Brown.

Brown, bidding for a third term as governor of the nation's largest state, defeated Los Angeles Mayor Samuel W. Yorty by an 11 to 8 margin with four other minor candidates making some inroads into Brown's margin.

Lieut. Gov. Glenn Anderson won renomination easily over two opponents and will face GOP candidate Robert H. Finch in November.

The Democrats picked up a seat in the 14th District when Jerome Waldie won a special election to fill out the uncompleted term of the late Rep. John F. Baldwin, a

Meredith Ambush Shows Need for New Rights Act

The shooting of James Meredith on his freedom walk in Mississippi "demolishes" the argument that no further civil rights legislation is needed, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany said the shooting of Meredith shows "there are still those who would use murder to prevent the achievement of racial equality in America." He added:

"A federal law is essential to curb such terrorism and to punish its perpetrators. This is one of the provisions written into the Civil Rights Act of 1966, now before Congress.

"The act must be passed."

NEW ENGLAND locals of the Rubber Workers were assured of the active support of the region's congressional delegation in efforts to reverse a tariff cut on rubber-soled footwear which is threatening the jobs of a large group of URW members. Hosts at the meeting, seated in foreground with backs to camera, were House Speaker John W. McCormack (D-Mass.) and Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.). The local union delegates were accompanied by URW Pres. George Burdon and other international officers.

2-Day Walkout:

Strike Brings Gains At Western Union

The Commercial Telegraphers called off their first Western Union strike in 14 years after winning management's agreement to an improved new contract for 20,000 members across the nation.

The new pact provides wage increases of 9 percent over a two-year period for all covered employes except bicycle and walking messengers, who will get a 5-cent raise per hour. Also won were job protection, special raises for workers with technical skills, eventual elimination of all pension plan contributions by CTU members, and lowering of the mandatory retirement age.

"We consider it a good pact," union Pres. E. L. Hageman said in announcing the end of the two-day walkout.

"We asked for raises totaling 15 percent and won 9, plus some very important improvements."

Effective June 1, CTU members get wage hikes of 4.5 percent, with another raise of the same amount after a year.

They won a job security guarantee providing that employes with five or more years of service cannot be subject to a reduction in force but must be given a comparable job at no reduction in pay.

Employe contributions in the Western Union pension plan will, under the new pact, be reduced to 29 percent in 1968, 13 percent in 1969, and to zero by Jan. 1, 1970.

The mandatory retirement age will be reduced by stages from 70 to 67.

The CTU walked out June 8 after failing to budge a management position it called "rigid and inflexible."

New Offer

A short protest walkout June 1 brought management back to the bargaining table with a new offer June 3, when the company withdrew a previous offer of selective raises for "skilled workmen" in the plant department.

Its next offer of a 4 percent raise this year, and another 3.9 next year, plus a 4-cent raise for messengers, was rejected by union negotiators as "unacceptable."

The negotiations resumed after the June 8 walkout with the assistance of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. In less than 48 hours the settlement was achieved.

Public telegraph service was closed down, but Western Union supervisors operated leased wires and overseas services during the strike.

In New York, telegraph messages within the city were delivered by members of the Communications Workers, which recently won bargaining rights for 4,500 Western Union employes. But CWA agreed to respect all CTU picket lines and withheld a vote on contract terms until the CTU negotiations ended.

The slow pace of negotiations was attributed by the union to Western Union's "put and take" technique—taking money from one category and putting it in another, but never changing the total amount offered. Settlement was achieved when the company finally upped its total package, the CTU said.

Workers Fired in 1950 Finally Win Back Pay

Sixty-nine members of the Carpenters Union, wrongfully fired in 1950, will finally collect $164,000 in back pay.

The U. S. Supreme Court refused to review a decision handed down by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals last December upholding a backpay award by the National Labor Relations Board. The case had bounced back and forth between the courts and the labor board since 1952.

Most of the workers were reinstated in 1956 and others were subsequently offered their jobs back, but the lost pay claims dragged through protracted hearings, briefs, arguments, amended answers, orders, decisions and five appeals to higher courts.

A large part of the delay, the appellate court had noted, was caused by a serious shortage of qualified NLRB personnel between 1956 and 1960.

The backpay award, originally issued in 1960, is against the Mastro Plastics Corp. of New York City and a successor firm, Mastro Industries, Inc.

Court records show that the workers were unlawfully fired in November 1950. The NLRB, in March 1953, upheld charges brought by Carpenters Local 3127 and ordered the workers reinstated with back pay.

The Supreme Court agreed to review a case involving interpretation of the Taft-Hartley Act's provisions on secondary boycotts and "hot cargo" clauses.

The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals had held that the Philadelphia District Council of Carpenters had acted illegally in refusing to install prefabricated doors for three contractors, where the doors were required by job specifications.

One issue is whether the Taft-Hartley Act bars a contract clause forbidding an employer from using prefabricated materials, when the purpose of the clause is to preserve work traditionally done on the job.

In other action, the Supreme Court:

● Accepted for review a case involving the right of a member of an unaffiliated union, the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse Workers, to sue his union for damages for failing to process his grievance.

● Denied review to a lower court ruling allowing an anti-trust suit to be brought against a local of the Journeymen Horseshoers.

Office Pact Covers Babysitting Costs

Waco, Tex. — Working mothers will receive a "babysitting" allowance in addition to overtime premium pay under a novel contract clause negotiated by Local 277 of the Office & Professional Employes with the American Income Insurance Co. here.

Women with children who are required to work on Saturdays, Sundays, holidays or more than one hour overtime during the regular workweek will be paid a "supplemental child care allowance" of 75 cents a hour.

Job Stability Program Set By Steel Union

Toronto, Ont.—The Steelworkers' executive board, meeting in Canada for the first time, voted to launch a new community action program aimed at stabilizing employment and creating new jobs in U.S. and Canadian towns threatened by plant closings.

Pres. I. W. Abel said a special committee of USWA district directors will be named soon to start pilot programs in selected areas.

The board acted after receiving a report that some 60,000 members have been "made permanently jobless" in the last three years as a result of "technological changes, marketing factors and unilateral decisions" by management.

Expressing alarm at the extent of job losses "during one of the greatest periods of economic growth and prosperity," the board predicted that unemployment and worker dislocation will get worse and said "we should plan for this now."

It noted that the USWA already has the nucleus to start a program in the job and income security benefits provided by existing contracts; technicians skilled in the administration and extension of those benefits, and a "trained staff which works with governmental agencies of all types."

These union resources should be "harnessed with the power and influence of other community groups under a coordinated action program," the board decided.

NLRB Finds Firm Guilty Sixth Time

For the sixth time since 1959, the Frosty Morn division of Tennessee Packers, Inc., has been found guilty of illegal practices to destroy a union at its Clarksville, Tenn., meat plant.

The National Labor Relations Board upheld an examiner's finding that Frosty Morn, called "an habitual violator of the Act in a six-year struggle against the union," laid off two members of the Meat Cutters because their NLRB testimony led to the reinstatement of three other laid-off members.

Pay Loss Restored

The board ordered Frosty Morn to make up any pay lost by one employe, Ann Schuff, during her discriminatory three-month layoff in 1965.

Management's actions, the examiner reported to the board, showed that "it had not changed its ways nor abandoned the intense anti-union attitude" which led to five previous NLRB orders against it.

In another order involving one of the previous cases, the board directed the firm to give $10,166 backpay to Ophelia Hutchinson and $8,683 backpay to Claudine Warren—both amounts to be plus interest—for their illegal layoffs from Oct. 3, 1962 to Dec. 26, 1964. Additional payments will be assessed later against Frosty Morn for lost pay since the latter date, the board indicated.

Eagles Salute 2 Union Leaders

Milwaukee, Wis.—Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers was inducted into the national "Hall of Fame" of the Eagles at a salute-to-labor dinner here and in turn presented the FOE's Green-Murray award for outstanding leadership to Pres. George A. Haberman of the Wisconsin AFL-CIO.

Schoemann, an AFL-CIO vice president, was honored for outstanding service to the nation and this community. Haberman has served since 1943 as state central body president. The Green-Murray award perpetuates the memory of William Green and Philip Murray, presidents respectively of the form AFL and the former CIO at their death

UFWA Ousts 'Independent' Despite Pact

Los Angeles—The Furniture Workers ousted a management-imposed "independent" union as representative of Carlson Furniture Industries workers here despite an existing contract. The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was 35 for UFWA Local 1010; no union, 17; Confederated Industrial Workers, 1.

The NLRB, in ordering the election, ruled that the existing contract between the employer and the "independent" had been reached in violation of federal labor law and thus was not a bar to a new representation election.

The setback was the second in recent weeks here for a group headed by Anthony Doria, who was ousted by the Allied Industrial Workers on corruption charges. Building Service Employes Local 399 recently defeated the Doria union, 127-5, at Sunset House Distributing Corp.

For nearly two years Carlson workers had been struggling to free themselves of representation by the Doria operation, the UFWA said.

The labor board, after investigating UFWA charges, ordered the furniture firm to end the agreement with Doria and stop supporting him. Also it ruled that management had unlawfully canceled a 10-cent hourly raise because employes opposed their contract.

Carlson was ordered to reinstate, with backpay and interest, UFWA supporters fired for opposing Doria.

Leather Goods Workers Weigh Contract Guides

Atlantic City, N. J.—Collective bargaining guidelines binding upon each affiliate together with a program to organize the unorganized were urged on the 30th anniversary convention of the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers here.

The need for bargaining guidelines formed a major theme of the keynote address by Pres. Norman Zukowsky, who called on the 400 delegates to give the union "the necessary authority to assure that from this time forward, no affiliate will have to go it alone."

Zukowsky said adoption of such guidelines would "enable us to raise our sights at the bargaining tables."

To implement both the bargaining and the organizational programs, an increase in per capita payments was recommended for consideration by the delegates. The additional funds would also be used to finance such other projects as a union label department, a legislative office in Washington, and an engineering department to cope with growing technological problems.

In a statement on the James H. Meredith shooting, the convention recorded its "shock and sorrow," declaring that "it is tragic that a nation capable of landing men on the moon is as yet incapable of permitting men and women to walk freely in our midst."

Later sessions were to include addresses by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Snitzler, Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.), State AFL-CIO Pres. Vincent Murphy and National COPE Dir. Al Barkan.

Panel Terms Studied In Airlines Dispute

tions with the lines more than seven months ago after the companies agreed to the first such meetings in their bargaining history.

Failing to agree, both sides asked the help of the National Mediation Board, again without success. Talks were broken off and the IAM was preparing to call a walkout when the President intervened.

He named Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), Prof. Richard Neustadt of the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration, and David Ginsburg, Washington lawyer, to the emergency panel. They held public hearings in May and later presented recommendations which the President said "reflect the highest order of imagination, judgment and wisdom."

Morse told reporters at a White House news conference that though the panel is convinced the recommendations are "genuinely noninflationary" it excluded "from the very first day we met" any consideration of wage guideposts such as the 3.2 percent figure advocated by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

The dispute involves eight national issues and more than 40 local issues, which the parties now must settle.

The major proposals of the emergency board were:

● Wage boosts for Group A (top-skilled mechanics) of 18 cents an hour for the first 18 months; 15 cents for the following 12 months, and another 15 cents for the final 12 months.

● For all other workers—those in Group B—similarly spaced raises of 14 cents, 10 cents and 10 cents an hour.

● Raises retroactive to Jan. 1, 1966, as the union asked, but a contract term longer by six months than the parties had previously agreed on.

● Contract reopening on wages Jan. 1, 1968, if the Consumer Price Index has risen 2.9 percent or more from 1963 through 1967, with final and binding arbitration if no agreement is reached on base wages.

● Vacations of four weeks after 15 years—a "breakthrough" for the union, according to Morse.

● One additional paid holiday—Good Friday—for a total of eight.

The board rejected company demands for three wage groupings, instead of two, and for retention of present pay steps within grade. It recommended the elimination of three wage steps and rejected union proposals for a wage-escalator clause, paid daily lunch period, higher overtime pay for holidays, premium pay for licensed mechanics, and full company payment of health, welfare and pension benefits.

Based on an average of $3.52 an hour now paid top-skilled mechanics, the board formula would raise that group to $3.70, $3.95 and $4 over the contract term. The union had asked raises of 5 percent, 5 percent and 4 percent each year over a three-year period, or $3.70, $3.88 and $4.04 for top mechanic.

Taxi Workers Welcomed into Labor's Ranks

taxi employes, especially in the port of New York, should be "good will ambassadors" for the nation. They were:

Pres. David Sullivan, Building Service Employes; Sec. Joseph D. Keenan, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Pres. Paul Jennings, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Pres. James A. Suffridge, Retail Clerks.

The organization of taxi employes is a "pretty good example of what imagination and determination can do," Meany said. He praised Van Arsdale as a man with an idea who followed it to success.

The AFL-CIO, he explained for new members, is a federation of unions, a coordinating agency for all the activities that unions must do together.

Unions Autonomous

"We don't interfere with their internal affairs, such as their contract negotiations," he declared, adding that a major federation activity is legislation "for the benefit of all the people of America."

The reason, he said, is that "we find that things that are good for all the people of America are very good for our members."

The free public school system came into being some 100 years ago, he went on, "largely because of the organized support" of workers and their unions.

Minimum wage law improvements, achieved with the active backing of the labor movement, will have a notable effect on the purchasing power of the nation, Meany said.

Asking "why do we do this?" he answered that "everything we do is a part of our own war on poverty" and "the more prosperous the entire community is the more prosperous our members are."

Of the hundreds of thousands who are fully employed and have to get relief funds "because they don't make enough to live on," Meany said "it is in our best interest to bring them into the main stream of American life."

He listed other labor achievements—social security benefit improvements, medical care for the aged, civil rights legislation, aid to education—and stressed labor's interest in workers throughout the world to the extent that 25 percent of federation income is spent outside the U. S.

Ohio AFL-CIO Shifts Leadership Structure

Cleveland—Pres. Frank W. King and Sec.-Treas. Robert D. Bollard were re-elected to two-year terms without opposition during the Ohio AFL-CIO fifth constitutional convention here.

The more than 2,200 delegates to the convention also approved a constitutional change which makes the president the chief executive officer of the federation and the secretary-treasurer the chief administrative officer, completing a transition which was begun two years ago.

The delegates also elected 24 vice presidents and adopted more than 100 policy resolutions forming the state AFL-CIO's legislative recommendations for the 1967 session of the Ohio General Assembly.

One of the major resolutions called on the legislature to place on the 1967 fall ballot "an equitable reapportionment plan" to reshape the state's congressional districts so they are "compact, contiguous and near-equal in population." The measure also urges placing on the ballot a constitutional amendment containing suitable safeguards against future gerrymandering of congressional districts.

The convention reaffirmed the organization's advocacy of "meaningful" reform of Ohio's "highly regressive" tax structure, restated its opposition to rate increases in existing regressive levies such as sales taxes, and renewed its offer to join with any group "genuinely interested in establishing an equitable tax structure."

Law Changes Asked

In another resolution, the membership urged the U. S. Senate to "restore the vigor" to the federal unemployment insurance bill and pledged to work toward changing Ohio's jobless insurance law to raise weekly benefits to two-thirds of the state's average weekly wage, extend the duration of benefits from 26 to 36 weeks and to require employers to pay unemployment insurance taxes on total wages rather than on the first $3,000 of an employe's annual earnings.

The labor group announced its intention to seek a state law establishing the right of public employes to organize and bargain collectively on wages, hours and working conditions and to work for repeal of the state's Ferguson Act, which prohibits strikes by public employes, substituting for it grievance, fact-finding and arbitration procedures.

Other resolutions called among other things for:

● A statutory minimum wage in Ohio.

● A "little Wagner Act", spelling out the right of workers in intrastate commerce to organize and bargain collectively.

● A "fair injunction" law, which would call for notice and oral hearing in court before an injunction could be issued in a labor dispute.

Speakers at the three-day convention included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Auto Workers Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, National COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan, and Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Actors Queue Up to Aid Operation Head Start

New York—Members of Actors' Equity are swamping Operation Head Start headquarters with offers to donate their services to help the program in the neighborhoods where it operates.

The union authorized its members to exercise their skills and experience free of charge in the campaign to help both underprivileged children and their parents to become better citizens.

"It will also benefit the actors participating because of their contact with minority groups," said Chairman Stanley Tackney of Equity's Head Start Committee. "Furthermore, it will eventually bring more people to the theater."

Dramatic and poetry readings in English, Spanish and other languages are planned, along with dance recitals. The programs will last a minimum of one hour. Group discussion leadership also will be offered by the union members.

A letter to members said the program was intended to bring home a realization of the cultural heritage of minorities; to give the minority groups a sense of pride in their race, culture and language; to show how their culture can be even further integrated into the Great Society, and to instill pride in the contributions minorities have made to American culture.

"In addition to providing a cultural experience to the entire community, the program would instruct both youngster and parent," the letter said. "Not only will they participate in such programs as spectators, but it is hoped they will be motivated to participate in future planning of programs and supervision of the events."

Mrs. Bea Fitzpatrick, supervisor of the parent activities division of Operation Head Start, reported that scores of performers have offered their help "to break down the fears and prejudices that people have of other ethnic groups to which they haven't been exposed and with which they haven't shared experiences because of a lack of communications."

Gleason Back In Saigon for Port Survey

New York—The Longshoremen announced that union Pres. Thomas W. Gleason is in the port of Saigon, Viet Nam, for his third survey of cargo-handling conditions to help speed up the flow of goods for military and civilian use.

Eight additional ILA members also are in Saigon, the union said, to join Gleason as consultants to the State Dept.'s Agency for Intl. Development and for stevedore firms.

Gleason made his first trip last October and another in January at the invitation of the AID, which finances the importation of goods at the rate of about $350 million a year for shipment from Saigon to up-country ports.

The union financed Gleason's trips and those of ILA loading experts. Their recommendations, made on the scene and in testimony before congressional committees, have raised the capacity of Saigon port by 100,000 tons, the union said.

'Met' Agents Ratify Pact With $7 Gain

New York—Members of the Insurance Workers employed by Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. voted in nationwide balloting to ratify a new two-year contract with a benefit increase package averaging $7.11 a week.

The new pact covers 8,500 Met agents in all states—2,400 for the first time. It renews expiring agreements in four states—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Missouri—and provides initial coverage for agents in 33 new units.

Gains include commission increases totaling $2.61 a week and security benefits put by the union at $4.50 a week. The latter include early retirement at age 60 after 20 years of service, plus $80 per month until the retiree reaches 65; improved group life insurance, and other improvements.

For retired employes the Met agreed to add the value of federal medicare benefits to the company medical plan; to eliminate the $9.50 per month contributed by retirees, and to add company-paid supplemental medical benefits.

The Met had refused for four years to bargain for agents in 33 units until the National Labor Relations Board ruled, in a case returned to it by the Supreme Court, that elections were properly held in units smaller than state-wide. Bargainers for the disputed units then joined other union negotiators in the final contract talks.

ACROSS THE BOARD increase in social security benefits will be sought from the next session of Congress, Pres. Johnson reiterated in addressing members of the National Council of Senior Citizens in the White House rose garden. Others, from the left: Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball; Health, Education & Welfare Under Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen; NCSC Pres. John W. Edelman and Executive Dir. William R. Hutton.

At Seniors' Convention:

LBJ Asks 'Rights' For Elder Citizens

The National Council of Senior Citizens, meeting in a Washington hotel at the opening session of its annual convention, moved to the White House rose garden at the invitation of Pres. Johnson and heard him proclaim a "new Bill of Rights for older Americans."

More than 500 oldsters, sitting at the sun-drenched gathering, cheered and applauded as the President ticked off "these practical goals" for today "if there is to be a truly Great Society tomorrow":

- The right to an adequate income.
- The right to a decent home.
- The right to a meaningful retirement with work for those who want it, and for others, the right to go back to school, to develop new skills and hobbies, and to volunteer their services in community programs.

Johnson called the right to an adequate income "the basic right of every older American" and said "too many of our older citizens are still struggling along on shoestring incomes, suffering real hardship" and need.

Noting that social security benefits are the major source of retirement income for most oldsters and are "not nearly fair or decent enough," the President followed up an earlier pledge with the announcement that he has asked Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner to develop proposals for improving retirement benefits "across the board" for the 21 million beneficiaries now on the rolls and for future beneficiaries. A proposal will go to Congress next January, he said.

Award of Merit

On behalf of the senior citizens, Pres. John W. Edelman gave Johnson an award of merit for "giving hope and leadership" to the elderly and voiced their "deepest gratitude and profound respect."

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey rode from the White House to the convention hotel with delegates on one of their chartered buses and told them in a key speech that Johnson's plan to boost social security benefits "tied to the price level" will be realized only if the President gets "a Congress he can work with next November."

Humphrey said "our opponents are now beating the drums against rent supplements" and other Johnsonian proposals and added "I insist that, if we can spend billions of dollars to put a man on the moon—and I am one of the strongest supporters of the moon program—we can spend a little more to put a man on his feet here on earth."

The vice president gave awards for the council to Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.); Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.); State Rep. Louis Wolfson of Florida; Frank Harris, columnist, Boston Globe; the Steelworkers' Union; and freshmen congressmen—all for their interest in the welfare of elders.

At its closing session the council heard a report on election prospects from Dir. Alexander Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education and voted to ask Congress to:

- Raise social security benefits to $150 a month for individuals, $300 for couples from the present $80 and $142 averages.
- Provide jobs for the elderly poor and strengthen the rent supplement program to give investors more incentive to provide better housing.
- Enact the truth-in-packaging bill calling for more meaningful labeling, and the truth-in-lending bill to provide a true interest rate on small loans.
- Make seven improvements in medicare including the elimination of all present deductible and coinsurance features; making all who qualify for social security and railroad retirement cash benefits eligible for medicare benefits; and use of generic names instead of brand names in prescription drugs under medicare.
- Authorize more new nursing facilities and better housing.

Johnson touched on medicare in his White House talk also. "Tell your members and their friends to cooperate with their physicians in scheduling hospitalization," he said. "Alert your hospitals to the requirements of the law, particularly the non-discrimination" section.

Kenin Joins In Tribute To Stokowski

New York—Labor joined in a civic salute here to Leopold Stokowski, musician and conductor, who received the "golden door" award of the American Council for Nationalities Service and then led part of his American Symphony Orchestra musicians in a Mozart serenade.

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin praised Stokowski as a "distinguished American of foreign birth" who has for nearly 50 years made significant contributions to the culture of his adopted land.

One of his convictions, Kenin said, is that organized labor should play an active role in encouraging the cultural arts. At Stokowski's urging, Kenin and other union leaders helped him establish the American Symphony.

Kenin announced that, at Stokowski's request, the AFL-CIO Executive Council agreed to query its 129 affiliated unions on further labor interest in the fine arts.

Musicians at the ceremony were provided through the AFM Local 802 through a grant by the Recording Industries Music Performance Trust Fund, Kenin said.

Weaver Sees Rights Act Ending 'Panic Selling'

Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development asserted that the Administration's proposed new Civil Rights Act would do away with "panic selling" of homes based on racial fears because housing discrimination would no longer be possible anywhere in the nation.

"We would, for the first time, have a comprehensive means of ending discrimination in housing," Weaver said. In contrast, an attempt to achieve the same result through an executive order would be a "fragmented approach," inasmuch as it would apply only to housing with federal financing, he noted.

Interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, heard on the ABC radio network, Weaver said: "We have estimated that, no matter how far an executive order might go, it would cover only about 60 percent of the total market. This would leave an escape hatch of 40 percent to provide unfair competition."

He called attention to the recent California Supreme Court decision striking down as unconstitutional the controversial Proposition 14, which barred fair housing legislation in the state. The decision, Weaver said, lends backing to the opinion of Atty. Gen. Nicholas DeB. Katzenbach on the constitutionality of Title IV, the housing section of the proposed new federal Civil Rights Act.

On other housing matters, Weaver took the view that the $12 million in rent supplement payments appropriated by Congress would be enough for the current fiscal year, but he expressed hope that more funds will now be voted by Congress for the next fiscal year.

The rent supplement program would aid persons of limited incomes, including elderly people, by making up the difference between one-fourth of their incomes and the rents charged by private, nonprofit housing sponsors.

No Forced Moving

Weaver noted that under the rent supplement program, as contrasted to public housing, tenants would not be required to move if their incomes rise beyond the minimum standards, although the rent subsidy would end.

He called the Demonstration Cities program, now before Congress, "a brand new and most exciting approach" to the problems of the cities.

"This will be a large-scale attack on a problem on which we have just been nibbling for the over 30 years that I have been in the field of housing," he said. "This program would be concerned not only with doing something about the physical aspects of our slums, an effort to upgrade housing, streets, neighborhood facilities, etc., but individuals as well. It's aimed at providing better education, health and other human facilities."

Rising Need Foreseen For Skilled Craftsmen

The growth of America's economy plus replacements for those who die or retire will create job openings for more than 4 million skilled workers in the next decade, the Labor Dept. has estimated.

Employment requirements for craftsmen in a wide range of trades are expected to jump from 9.2 million in 1965 to about 11.4 million in 1975, according to an article in the department's Monthly Labor Review by Allan F. Salt, of the Division of Manpower & Occupational Outlook in the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The demand will be pushed upward, Salt says, as "our increasingly complex economy" requires more skilled workers to get it started and keep it going. Industries and technologies grow at different rates, he points out, and the demand for some skills may decline as that for others grows.

"The demand for mechanics and repairmen—to install and maintain the increasing amount of complex equipment that will be used by industry, government agencies and private households—is expected to grow more rapidly than the demand for other skilled workers," Salt writes.

"Employment requirements for foremen are expected to grow rapidly, because the increasing intricacy of productive processes requires a higher ratio of supervisors to workers.

"In the building trades, new construction and maintenance and repairs will more than offset rising output per worker, and the number of building trades workmen is expected to increase moderately."

The demand for skilled machining workers, due to wider use of techniques such as numerical control, is expected to rise "only moderately," he writes, while "rapid technological changes in printing techniques and equipment" will probably make possible increased output with few additional workers. Some individual printing trades will grow and others decline, he predicts.

Lester Graham Dies in Texas

Ft. Worth, Tex.—Regional Dir. Lester Graham of the AFL-CIO's Region 17 died here suddenly May 30 at his home. He was 64.

A native of Rogers, Tex., Graham joined the organizing staff of the former AFL in 1945 and was a regional director in Texas at the time of the AFL-CIO merger. He continued in that capacity until his death. His wife and three adult children survive.

Graham had been a member of the Office Employes since 1957.

Industrial Engineering Summer Institutes Set

The 1966 AFL-CIO Union Industrial Engineering Institutes for full-time union representatives and staff members will be held July 18-29 on the campus of the University of Wisconsin at Madison. Deadline for enrollment is June 20.

Three courses will be offered at this year's sessions.

- Establishing work standards, providing a working knowledge of the systems management uses to establish production and incentive standards including time study, standard data, predetermined motion time systems, work sampling and wage incentives.
- Job evaluation and related problems, giving instruction in different systems and relating bargaining problems to the use of wage curves, labor grades and rate ranges.
- Synthetic standards systems, designed for students with training in stop-watch time study and including work sampling, stop-watch standard data, standard data formulae, predetermined motion times, contract language and grievance handling and arbitration.

An arithmetic review session will be held from 2 to 4 p.m. on the opening day.

Enrollment is limited, depending on the nature of the course and the facilities available. Tuition is $75, including cost of instruction, textbooks and other materials. Housing and meals can be had at the university, with the student meeting the cost.

The institutes are sponsored by the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. The faculty will be made up of experts in industrial engineering from the university and labor unions.

Registrations may be sent before the June 20 deadline to Robert Ozanne, director, School for Workers, University Extension Division, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis. 53706.

To Spell Out Rights:

Labor Board Plans Fair Elections Code

Member Sam Zagoria of the National Labor Relations Board has reported that the board is working on a Fair Elections Code to make more clear the rights and responsibilities of management, labor and working men and women who take part in representation elections.

The code, Zagoria said, "would call upon employers and unions to take the attitude that working men and women are entitled to a free and informed choice in representation elections, and to avoid such unfair practices as threats of job loss, promises of promotion or pay raises, and threats of physical force and violence in order to encourage or discourage" those who vote in such elections.

Zagoria, appearing on As We See It, AFL-CIO public service program heard on the ABC radio network, expressed the view that NLRB information to unions and employers should be improved, "most importantly that working men and women who vote in representation elections know that the statute protects them in their right to self organization, to form, join or assist a labor organization."

He advocated more advance planning to meet the human problems that result from automation. If there were improved communications on this subject between management and employes, the transition would be easier, he said.

Zagoria, a former Washington Post reporter and Newspaper Guild local president, has been writing and making speeches on the subject of automation and finds wide interest in meeting its problems.

Reviewing NLRB activities in the 30 years the board has been in existence, he noted that "we have had elections that have given some 19 million people an opportunity to make this choice (between a union or no union, or between several unions). We are rather proud of this part of our work, because we have been able to get 90 percent participation on our elections, and we go to great lengths to make sure that people understand what they are voting on."

The ballots in a recent Brooklyn, N. Y., election were printed in six different languages, he said.

Zagoria noted that the NLRB, as another part of its work, handles 28,000 unfair labor practice cases a year. Only 5 percent of these come to a vote before the board, with the others settled within one of the 31 regional or 3 sub-regional offices.

N. Y. Musicians Form Senior Unit

New York—Pioneer members of Musicians Local 802, now retired holders of gold membership cards, have formed the Local 802 Senior Musicians Association to serve as a focal point for professional and social activities for the union's eldest membership.

Creation of the group was proposed in a resolution adopted by the local executive board and was approved at a meeting of the gold card members. The unpaid executive director is William Feinberg, Local 802 vice president from 1932 to 1934 and secretary from 1934 to 1936.

Equal Rights for Women Gaining at Rapid Pace

The pace of progress toward full equal rights for American women is accelerating, according to a government-citizen group report on the status of women.

In its second annual report, the Interdepartmental Committee and Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women declared that "full partnership" for American women was being achieved more swiftly than in 1965.

The report cited as most important the implementation of prohibitions against discrimination in employment on the basis of sex, as well as race, color, religion and national origin. It noted that the sex discrimination ban in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 became effective in mid-1965 and is operating under guidelines which encompass virtually all of the recommendations of the committee and council.

The Interdepartmental Committee is made up of representatives of eight federal agencies; the council has as members 21 leaders in business, labor, education and social organizations.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler is a member of the council as is Mrs. Mary E. Callahan, an executive board member of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Union.

The report noted that state commissions on the status of women have expanded from 33 to 45 and a record number of 1,200 men and women now serve on these commissions.

A second important development, the report noted, was the federal court decision in Alabama which found unconstitutional the state law which denied women the right to serve on juries.

The Alabama decision, the report added, will also establish a base for litigation attacking discrimination because of sex in public education, public employment and the personal and property rights of married women.

In addition to public accomplishments, the report noted greatly expanded gains in behalf of women through private organizations, including the labor movement.

Among those cited was the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries which, the report stated, "intensified and expanded their longstanding efforts to reach and help the disadvantaged." The Auxiliaries was also praised for its summer leadership training programs for women.

N. Y. State Collects $420,000 Back Pay

New York—More than $420,000 in unpaid wages was collected during the first quarter of 1966 for more than 7,600 workers by the State Dept. of Labor.

The department reported that minimum wage underpayment collections totaled $245,000 in 1,814 business establishments; $78,000 for underpayments on 93 public works projects; and $99,000 for unpaid wages other than minimum wages in 707 establishments.

Auto Workers of Four Continents Set Worldwide Bargaining Goals

Detroit—Representatives of auto workers from all parts of the free world, in a history-making four-day meeting here, resolved to foster international labor solidarity by forming three world auto councils and issuing a seven-page declaration of goals.

The 35 trade unionists represented 16 unions and 1.4 million organized auto workers in Europe, Australia and North and South America who work in the plants of the General Motors Corp., Ford, Chrysler and their affiliates. The global conference was sponsored by the Automotive Division of the Intl. Metalworkers Federation. UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, who presided at the sessions, is head of the division.

Delegates formed a World GM Council, a World Ford Council and a World Chrysler-Simca-Fiat-Rootes Council.

The groups spent a day and a half in separate sessions and the rest in joint meetings. At the end of the conference the delegates adopted a declaration which included these international collective bargaining goals:

- Full recognition of the right to organize, to bargain collectively on wages, working conditions and social benefits and to negotiate grievances.
- "Upward harmonization" of wages and social benefits to the maximum extent permitted by the technological development of the industry in each country.
- Humanizing the industrial process by the immediate establishment of adequate paid relief time and rest periods.
- An end to excessive overtime and the guarantee of adequate premium pay for such overtime as can be justified.
- Adequate implementation throughout the world of the vacation bonus principle already conceded by the Big Three in certain countries.
- Sufficient pensions to assure the dignity and security of retired workers.
- Guaranteed income for workers affected by production fluctuations or technological change.
- Reduction in working time through shorter workweeks, more paid holidays, longer vacations and early retirement.

A highlight of the conference came in meetings at the corporate headquarters of GM in Detroit and Ford in Dearborn with high-ranking corporation officials in charge of labor relations and international operations.

The delegates were treated courteously and hospitably by the management representatives. Many questions were asked concerning the degree of autonomy permitted Big Three plant managements in the various countries.

Although scheduled, no meeting was held with Chrysler officials when that company refused to furnish top-level executives.

Reuther told the opening session of the world auto councils that auto workers have to organize internationally so they can deal more effectively with companies that are no longer national but international in scope.

"GM is not in business to make cars, but to make profits," he declared. "It has no basic loyalty to any country, any people or any group of workers."

Shift in Output Cited

He cited statistics showing that production of cars and trucks outside the United States and Canada rose from 20 percent of the total production in 1950 to 53.3 percent in 1965.

"Fine slogans and occasional international meetings are not enough," Reuther declared. "We must give international labor solidarity the kind of practical application which will help an individual worker solve his Monday-morning grievance. I believe this conference is really the beginning of something meaningful in collective bargaining."

Other principal conference speakers included Adolphe Graedel of Switzerland, general secretary of the IMF; Victor Reuther, director of the UAW's Intl. Affairs Dept.; UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock and other members of the UAW executive board.

During the four-day meeting, delegates exchanged collective bargaining information, reported on economic conditions in their respective countries and on working conditions and management attitudes toward organized labor.

Observers Present

In addition to the regular delegates, the conference was attended by several observers from Japanese and Turkish trade unions. Countries directly represented included Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Mexico, the United States and Venezuela.

Prior to the Detroit conference, the foreign delegates had attended the UAW convention in Long Beach, Calif., and had spent 10 days on a fact-finding tour of the United States and Canada, visiting auto plants, local union halls and other points of interest.

3 New Leaflets Offered by COPE

Three new election-year leaflets are available for mass distribution from the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. All are keyed to labor's register-and-vote campaign.

"Keep Progress Coming," No. 167C, cites the "beginning" made in this Congress and the need to continue. "The Biggest Number of Them All," No. 168C, stresses the importance of one vote. "What Happens in Off-Year Elections," No. 170C, warns of the historic trend toward off-year losses of congressional seats by the party in the White House.

The leaflets should be ordered by publication number from COPE Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

Board Denies Complaint in Partner Firing

The Valley Forge Flag Co. did not violate the National Labor Relations Act when it fired a company partner as an employe and removed him from the board of directors, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

Disagreeing with an examiner's findings last December, the board dismissed a complaint by George Liberman that his brothers, Sidney and Abraham, of Reading, Pa., cut off his $10,000 yearly salary in 1964 because he testified in a previous NLRB proceeding. In that action the board found the firm had unlawfully closed another company plant for anti-union reasons.

Four board members agreed that George was fired only after starting a rival flag business and bidding in competition with the family—an action they found "inconsistent with his legitimate obligations as an employe" and company officer.

The Class of 1966

THE HIGH SCHOOL Class of 1966, the largest in the nation's history, is a generation almost come of age. It is the generation born in the years immediately following the end of World War II. The vast majority has grown and attended school in an era of unprecedented national prosperity and in the uneasy atmosphere of the "cold war" and the "hot" ones in Korea and Viet Nam.

This largest of all high school graduating classes is perhaps the best educated class of modern times. It has been to school during a time of a veritable explosion of knowledge. It is easily conversant with nuclear energy, space exploration and the rallying cries of the civil rights struggle.

The Class of 1966 will probably have a higher percentage of students going on to college than any preceding class as new programs and new opportunities open for the first time the path to higher education.

This class carries the great hope of the nation for it has been more richly endowed than any of its predecessors and is perhaps more qualified to cope with the struggles and problems that the nation and the world face.

One of the problems is those who started with the class but didn't make it—the dropouts, the disadvantaged who couldn't keep up, the impoverished who were forced to substitute meager wages for hours in the classroom.

There are those also who received something less than the best education the country had to offer—the victims of inadequate school budgets, poorly trained teachers using outmoded techniques, inferior school plants short of equipment, books and the other tools of education.

THE CLASS OF 1966, as it moves out into the world of work or higher education and takes its place in a few years among the voting citizenry of the nation, must ponder these problems and their solutions.

Equal opportunity for a decent education is basic to a democratic system. Where it falls short or does not exist the system itself is impaired. A great deal has been done in the past few years in the form of federal programs, but more is needed, especially more funds, to assure every youngster a chance to get the best education he is capable of absorbing.

Equal opportunity in education is part of the overall struggle to make equal rights for all a reality. This struggle the Class of 1966 must join if its years in the school systems are to be meaningful.

It must join also in the never-ending war to eliminate poverty in the greatest and wealthiest nation in the world, to make a reality available to all of their own years of learning and living in a prosperous and affluent society.

And finally, if the next generation—the Class of 1986—is to possess a good education in an atmosphere of freedom and liberty, this generation must protect that freedom and expand its horizons so that there will finally be a world at peace.

Ghetto Suffers a Double Evil: Racial Segregation and Poverty

The following is excerpted from the opening address to the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights" by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, honorary chairman of the conference.

THE RACIAL GHETTO suffers a double evil: it suffers from racial segregation and also from poverty. The people have no margin of security.

There is nothing the people can show as security for loans in times of unemployment, family sickness, accidents or other misfortunes. There is no wonder that life expectancy is short.

To the physical illnesses we have to note the ill effects on family life. The man of the family is supposed to be the protector and support of the family. But if he is denied education and employment, if he cannot play his role as a husband and a father, the family breaks down.

Thus, men plagued with forced idleness, women have to carry the burden of providing the income and at the same time caring for their children. Is it any wonder that alcohol and narcotics and gambling and various forms of anti-social patterns are found in the black ghettos? And is it any wonder that children and youth are damaged emotionally and mentally?

The destructive and devastating impact of the ghetto is frightfully continuous and total. There are families that have been on welfare rolls for two, three and four generations.

But despite the seemingly insurmountable obstacles and difficulties, most of the men and women of the black ghettos struggle to find work and maintain family life. And despite the adverse conditions, most youth remain in school and strive to better their conditions. They try to believe in the American promise and they try to obey the law and look forward to participation in the political, economic, and cultural life of the nation. But the youth that are damaged are incalculable.

First, are those who lose faith in their families, in themselves, in the larger community. They reject themselves and develop a sense of self-hate and despair. They accept any evaluation of themselves. Those who suffer from self-rejection tend to withdraw. They undergo an inner death.

Second, are those who react with bitterness and rage. They are ready to strike against others. Their respect for life and law is destroyed. They fill the jails and houses of detention and the prisons. Their hatred is against authority and especially the police whom they consider their enemy and oppressor.

Third, are those whose anger becomes a social force of mass proportions. This is the volcanic force which builds its explosive power to such a pitch that it breaks out into race riots and in a violence such as is symbolized by events in the summer of 1965 in Watts.

Let me warn this conference that the Negro ghettos in every city are now centers of tension and socio-racial dynamite, near the brink of similar racial explosions of violence.

What can be done to right the wrongs of the Negro people of this county? What can be done to bring about social and racial justice and fulfill the promises of American life for all of our people, both the black working poor and white working poor? Is there any hope we can solve the deep-rooted and complex problem which affects the life of every American and threatens the survival of this nation?

IT IS UNREALISTIC to depend on appeals to conscience and good-will alone. Because of the daily experience of segregation, it is unrealistic to think that education for racial equality and intergroup and intercultural programs can solve the problem.

If the Negro and the white Americans have to wait until their neighbors are educated out of their prejudices, they will be trapped in the ghettos of America for generations to come. If our people have to wait until everybody loves his neighbor, we may have to wait many a moon, or liberation may never come. Most Negroes are not asking white people to love them or like them or understand them. They want their neighbors to accept them.

Thus the purpose of this conference is to involve all Americans in the great social enterprise of respect for sacredness of the dignity of the personality of every human being which is reflected in recognizing the rights of every person to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

This conference "To Fulfill These Rights" will broaden the horizon for the Negro and white American and the entire world of color now in the revolutionary flames of discontent.

The implementation of the report of the Conference "To Fulfill These Rights" will constitute a major and powerful thrust in giving Negroes the ability to walk through the gate of opportunity and achieve first-class citizenship in America. To the men and women, black and white, Catholic, Jew and Protestant, participating in this conference, "Quit ye like men—Be strong! We shall overcome!"

American Dream a Nightmare For Victims of Discrimination

By Edward P. Morgan

JAMES MEREDITH and Leumas Sirrah and Frank Bell are victims of the American nightmare instead of beneficiaries of the American dream.

Their mortal sin is that they were all born black. They were not born free like Elsa the lion in the African jungle. They were born in a jungle of hatred and fear, imprisoned in an undergrowth of prejudice and their own country can never be free, can never legitimately claim to lead the cause of freedom, in Viet Nam or Vicksburg or Valparaiso, until they are liberated.

Morgan

How can the rest of us get that through our heads? How can the great white majority of the population be made to realize that unless and until the boring of the termites of hypocrisy into the Bill of Rights is checked, the American society has nothing solid to stand on?

We cannot, unless we can bring ourselves to understand that what is happening to Jay and Leumas and Frank is happening to all of us.

James Meredith, 32, an educated man holding the first degree the University of Mississippi ever bestowed on a member of his race, is recovering from shotgun wounds inflicted by a white man who, in his ghastly ignorance and pathetic rage, was really firing at the heart of dignity and security of his country.

Eighteen-year-old Leumas Sirrah is a poet and that is his pen name. He has an amorphous police record in Los Angeles and he is suffering wounds that are less visible but just as real as Meredith's.

Frank Bell is four years of age, going on five. Already he bears the hurt of poverty, prejudice and neglect. He is still terribly vulnerable but a thin bandage of care and love is being applied to him every morning. Frank has no father. His mother is on relief. She and her 10 children live in Watts, a flat, hot Negro ghetto studded with drooping, grimy palm trees, a neighborhood Los Angeles Mayor Yorty and his police treat as enemy country.

But samaritans have infiltrated Watts and some have set up five Head Start projects for children of the poor. At one of these, in an abandoned market, Frank and 119 other boys and girls are given juice and crackers and spread each weekday—the only breakfast most of them get.

When Frank started in March he couldn't talk. It took him five weeks to verbalize in sentences. He daydreamed and frequently ran away. He wouldn't mix with other children. Teachers had to hold his hand at play. But by late May these were the teachers' reports on Frank: "He enjoys school and seems to be free to wander in and out of activities. He plays freely and easily with all the members of the unit. He seems to want affection now."

I MET Leumas Sirrah, a slight, soft-voiced but outspoken dropout, at the Beverly Hills home of Budd Schulberg, the writer. Schulberg had just managed to bail him and three friends out of jail where they had been held for approximately 72 hours, not on any formal charge but on "suspicion of armed burglary."

They had been picked up in front of a coffee house called Watts Happening, a community center which Schulberg and other interested citizens help support. Since the Watts explosion Schulberg, shocked at the isolation of the neighborhood, opened a class there in creative writing. Leumas was one of his students. The police, edgy, have marked the coffee house as a den of trouble.

"I am a black nationalist," Leumas told me proudly, "An American black nationalist. I don't dig this Muslim stuff with the hate and all that."

A blonde woman asked, not unkindly, "what do you do that is constructive?"

We think it's constructive, he said, fighting for our rights.

Schulberg recalled he'd told another Negro, in Watts, he hoped there wouldn't be any more violence.

"Those men at the Boston tea party were patriots," the boy yelled back at him, "but we're hoodlums."

I asked Leumas how he happened to start writing poetry. "In jail," he said quietly, "the police presented me with an opportunity to put my thoughts in writing." They presented him another opportunity a couple of days later, arrested him again.

Mrs. Schulberg read some of his poems. She gave me one entitled "You and I." This is it:

"You and I know . . . You and I think . . .
"In between . . . You and I need . . .
"Past, present, future . . .
"You laugh . . . I laugh . . .
"You and I experience . . . You and I feel . . .
"Opportunity you and I seek . . .
"Simple, compound, complex . . .
"You cry I cry . . .
"You and I understand . . . You and I learn . . .
"Black with white . . . You and I lack . . .
"Birth, life, death.
"You fight I fight."

Can we not learn that this is freedom's fight?

Health Care Viewed As 'Jigsaw Puzzle'

The following is excerpted from "The Jigsaw Puzzle of Health Care," by Dr. Herbert K. Abrams, in the May 1966 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

OUR CURRENT HEALTH PICTURE is a jigsaw puzzle of fragments—voluntary health insurance, compulsory health insurance for the aged, a hodgepodge of governmental programs; and all the fragments are further split between occupational and non-occupational segments.

Not only do we have the task of putting the pieces together but of filling in the many gaps with connecting pieces not now in existence, so that when we've put it all together, we'll have a sensible, rational health service for everybody.

The problem is not simple. It is not only a matter of adequate health insurance. It is also organization of medical services—development of group practice of health personnel, regional organization of hospitals and other health facilities, efficient utilization and avoidance of duplication of existing resources, etc.

It is also a matter of adequate numbers of health personnel. We are critically short of physicians, nurses, dentists, technicians and therapists of all sorts. Though the U. S. is the most bountiful country on earth, and we have surpluses for export of most commodities, we are an importer of physicians and nurses. More than 25 percent of the physicians on the house staffs of our hospitals are from foreign countries.

A collective bargaining program for labor in the area of health care might include the following:

● Fill in the gaps in existing coverage. Medicare now makes this task easier because it will reduce costs of existing programs. Some of the gaps are these:

(a) Out-patient care, i.e., office and home, diagnosis and treatment. This is where the opportunities for preventive medicine are. (b) Dental care. (c) Psychiatric care. (d) Cost of drugs. (e) Care of long-term illness in the hospital, the home and the nursing home. (f) Long-term disability benefits. (g) Coverage of care by non-medical technicians when directed by physicians.

● Provide medical benefits for workers displaced by automation.

● Fill in the gaps in medicare by obtaining coverage for the deductible and 20 percent fractions of the coverage which now must be paid by the individual.

● Obtain dual choice options wherever a group practice plan is available.

● In the plant, obtain effective health and safety agreements.

● Improve workmen's compensation payments where present provisions are not adequate.

ALL HEALTH OBJECTIVES cannot be achieved through collective bargaining. On the broader community and national level, labor and other groups must collaborate in these areas:

1. Support health legislation such as assistance to medical, dental, nursing and other technical schools and to their students so that we can begin to get an adequate supply of these people.

2. Support scientific and medical research primarily through tax funds.

3. Support improvements in medicare.

4. Support existing group practice plans and development of new ones of the type which will provide high quality care and will be consumer-oriented.

5. Support continued improvement of health programs for the poor, not only because this is humanitarian but also out of self-interest, for health is indivisible and the industrial worker is never far removed from the ranks of the poor.

6. Support and stimulation of Public Health Departments and Labor Departments so that they have adequate personnel and resources to protect the environment in the community and in the plant.

7. Back measures to strengthen industrial health services at the national, state and local levels.

Congress Urged to Widen Ban On Bias in Selection of Juries

AN AFL-CIO SPOKESMAN has urged broadening of proposals now before Congress to bar discrimination in the selection of juries by making the law apply whenever members of certain groups are excluded rather than only when specific complaints are made.

"Experience in other fields, such as voting rights, indicates that case by case enforcement is very slow and puts an undue burden on the litigant," said Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO.

Harris urged authorization for the federal government to "move in automatically when the representation of certain groups on juries falls below some fixed level." Such an "automatic triggering" provision is a workable and legal exercise of federal authority, he said, pointing out that a similar section in the Voting Rights Act of 1965 has been upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. He gave his views during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, heard weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Harris charged that jury discrimination exists in both the federal and state court systems. So-called blue-ribbon juries, which are "quite prevalent in the federal courts," discriminate against workers and other lower income citizens, he said. "State courts, on the other hand, particularly in the South, have been more given to discriminating against women" by both law and custom, he added, noting that the proposed legislation would end all three types of discrimination.

REAFFIRMING the AFL-CIO's strong support of the new Civil Rights bill's fair housing provision, Harris declared:

"We would like to see just as broad a bill in this respect as Congress will enact. It can't be too broad to suit us." He said that "as a matter of principle" the federation opposes "any kind of exceptions" from its application.

Reporters questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were John Herbers of the New York Times and Lawrence A. Still of the Washington Evening Star.

PROPOSALS now before Congress to bar discrimination in jury selection should be broadened to apply whenever certain groups are excluded, not just when specific complaints are made, Thomas E. Harris (center), AFL-CIO associate general counsel, told Lawrence A. Still (left) of the Washington Evening Star and John Herbers of the New York Times on the AFL-CIO weekly public service program, Labor News Conference, on the Mutual radio network.

Unions Press Laws to Protect Against Firings for Garnishees

By Sidney Margolius

IN A HALF-DOZEN STATES unions are seeking laws to bar employers from firing workers because of garnishees. In several states, these bills have been blocked despite the fact that often debts for which workers are garnisheed were incurred through deception. In New Jersey, for example, such a bill has been introduced year after year without enactment by the legislature. In Ohio, too, unions have been seeking for years similar relief from garnishment firing.

In theory, the debtor has a chance to tell his side in court before his wages are garnisheed. But in actual fact the threat that a creditor will get a garnishee often is enough to make a debtor pay an unfair debt because of the fear of being fired. Some employers will allow two or three garnishees before firing. But some don't want to be involved, or be bothered by the bookkeeping, and so will fire at the first garnishee.

In New York State, after a long struggle, the unions have broken through the legislative barricade of the employer and business lobbies to win passage of the first such bill in the United States. The legislature in that state has passed a modified version which will at least bar employers from firing because of one garnishee in a 12-month period.

The unions had asked for protection for workers against firing for up to three garnishees in 12 months. Some state officials suggested protection for up to two garnishees. The one-garnishee rule finally enacted still is some protection because in this state only one garnishee can be filed at a time, and only 10 percent of the wages can be deducted for payment of it. Thus often it will take at least the first 12 months to pay off the first garnishee.

Firing because of garnishees is both harsh and useless. The creditor can't collect if a worker loses his job, Julia Algase of the New York Hotel Worker's Council, which led the fight for the anti-firing law there, points out.

"It's a long time since non-payment of debt resulted in throwing a debtor into a jail, but it is not a far cry from that vicious system to the present practice of depriving the debtor of his means of livelihood for non-payment of debt," Mrs. Algase says.

Since the discharged worker cannot collect unemployment insurance if he is fired for being garnisheed, such debtors often are then thrown upon the relief rolls, she reports. Frequently they also lose, through repossession, the merchandise they had bought on credit as well as their jobs.

THERE LITERALLY are millions of garnishees a year in the U. S. today. Various cities such as Chicago, Washington, Birmingham, Detroit, Akron, Portland, Ore., New York and others have reported anywhere from 12,000 to 100,000 garnishees a year apiece. Unions report that in some factories 10 to 50 percent of all the employes may have their wages garnisheed in one year.

In some cities certain installment dealers and finance companies are responsible for hundreds of garnishees. For example, a study reported by Dr. Milton Huber of the University of Wisconsin Dept. of Consumer Affairs found that in Milwaukee County, of 6,744 garnishees in one year, 805 were by one finance and loan company, 783 were by one credit clothing and jewelry store, 640 came from one furniture and appliance store.

When one installment store or loan company files 700 to 800 garnishees a year, it is hard to believe that store is just plain unlucky in attracting customers who don't pay their bills.

Often workers are trapped into garnishees through misrepresentation, and surprisingly often, because they co-signed notes for friends or relatives. In one small Brooklyn, N. Y., plant, with 290 employes, management was served with 130 garnishees in just one year. But even more revealingly, 55 per cent of those garnisheed had bought or borrowed nothing themselves, but were co-signers on other people's borrowings, the union there discovered.

Often debtors don't have a chance to tell their side in court because they are not even notified that the creditor is going to court.

'GOLDEN PASSPORT' to fee-charging federal recreation areas is this wallet-sized Federal Recreation Area Permit which will cover all passengers in a vehicle. It sells for $7, is good for a year, and provides entrance to some 7,000 federal areas where entrance fees are charged. More limited permits, ranging from a single day to 30 days, are available at lesser costs.

Summer Institutes To Draw 20,000

NEARLY 20,000 local union leaders will spend two weeks of their own time being educated this year.

The summer undertaking includes some 125 school programs, mostly on university campuses, where beginning students will learn such fundamentals as how to run a union meeting and how to process a grievance. There will be courses in labor history, public speaking, public relations and the like.

Lawrence Rogin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, noted that there are now many other labor education undertakings besides the summer institutes. Evening classes are available almost year-round at such institutes as Wayne State, Ohio State and Roosevelt University. Many such as Steelworkers, Auto Workers, Communications Workers and Machinists have set up training programs for staff members and seekers after staff posts.

Either on a national or local basis, retail clerks, government employes (federal, state and local), postal workers and others have formal educational programs, Rogin pointed out.

"This is not a subtraction from the summer institutes," he said. "On the contrary, it indicates a growing interest by trade union leaders in the proper preparation of local leadership and staff. This is all to the good."

Of the 125 or more summer schools, Rogin reported, 17 will be sponsored by state AFL-CIO organizations and will be open to students from any AFL-CIO unit in the area. Eighteen will be run by the Steelworkers, 16 by the Auto Workers, 11 by the Communications Workers and 10 by the Machinists.

In addition, he noted a number of unions—the Textile Workers Union of America, was the first—have week-long spring sessions in Washington which give students an opportunity to meet with legislators and observe the processes of government.

"There was a time when the number of summer schools and the number who attended them were a measure of the labor movement's educational effort," Rogin said. "This is no longer so.

"These schools are important—very important. But thanks in part to the general commitment to education by the federal government in recent years, and in even greater part to the recognition by the labor movement that experience is not always a substitute for knowledge, education is becoming to an increasing extent an inherent part of trade union operations."

The 125-odd summer schools will be conducted on college and university campuses in at least 25 states. Instructors will be drawn from college faculties, with union educators assisting.

There's More Than One Way To Get a Message to Posterity

By Jane Goodsell

FOR THE MODEST SUM of $2.50, a firm in California will guarantee to deliver in the year 2066 A.D. any messages you would like to communicate to your descendants. This service, which is called Operation Timetube, is an imaginative idea. But, like many imaginative ideas (world peace, topless swimsuits and the excess profits tax, to name a few) it does pose some problems. The problem in this situation is, as you have doubtless surmised, thinking up something suitably worthwhile to say.

When I consider the amount of head-scratching and lip-chewing I go through in penning a postcard from Yellowstone Park to the folks back home, I wonder if I'm equal to the challenge of writing an appropriate communique.

"Wish I were there" seems unsuitably glib, as does, "Sorry that conflicting schedules prevented our meeting face-to-face."

"Don't take any wooden nickels!" is risky because it pre-supposes that nickels will still be used as coin of the realm in 2066 which seems unlikely. No, one must search for more timeless profundities.

It would be tempting to exhort our great-great-great-great grandchildren to "Study hard and no monkey business!" and "Brush your teeth after every meal." True, our own children pay no attention to such counsel but perhaps if it were recorded on microfilm and resurrected after a full century in an atomic vault, it might be accorded a little respect—and even heeded.

Still, that's a lot to hope for when you consider the inapplicability of Hammurabi's code and Ben Franklin's maxims to 20th century life.

COSMIC TRUTHS, such as "Live and let live" and "Punctuality is the thief of time" are less apt to sink into obsolescence with the passage of decades. But, on the other hand, do I want to achieve immortality by sounding like a fortune cookie?

So what can I say that would merit a hundred years of preservation in a time capsule? Well, I have this really terrific recipe for burnt sugar cake, and I honestly think it's worth preserving. Oh, I don't delude myself that its discovery a hundred years hence would rock the world like the Dead Sea scrolls, but it is a sensational recipe and a family heirloom. But why kid myself? My kinfolk-to-be wouldn't be interested in that recipe. My own children recoil in horror at its length and complexity. And, to tell the truth, I seldom use it myself, now that cake mixes are so quick and easy.

So much for Operation Timetube. I want no part of it. Why should I fork out $2.50 to make myself an object of ridicule to my future relatives? If they're interested in what I have to say, let them get in touch with me. With a ouija board.

Skill Training Starts At New NMU Center

New York—Two hundred seamen from 32 U.S. ports have started training in varied shipboard skills at the National Maritime Union's new $5 million health, training and recreation center here.

New skills and knowledge required on automated vessels are covered in the curriculum, but the courses offer all types of training from basic seamanship and mechanics to specialized culinary arts, the NMU said.

Courses vary from five to 12 weeks in length. Seamen regularly employed on vessels under NMU contract are eligible.

The union said it expects to graduate about 2,000 trainees per year, but in emergencies the school could accommodate about twice that many.

As part of a continuing union-management safety program, the center also gives instruction in lifeboat handling, fire fighting, first aid and life-saving.

Trainees enrolled in formal classes live in the building for their training period. In addition to their room and board they get $40 weekly subsistence payments and transportation to their ships.

NMU Pres. Joseph Curran called the training program "an expression of our faith in the future of the U.S. merchant marine" and an outstanding example of a jointly-administered industrial training program.

The program is supervised by the union and U.S.-flag vessel owners and managers. Part of its financing comes from an automation fund to which employers contribute 25 cents per man per day under current union contracts.

The 11-story building where classes are held will be dedicated June 15 as the Joseph Curran Annex. It houses a medical clinic and recreation facilities which include a gymnasium and swimming pool, steam rooms and a 1,000-seat auditorium.

The medical unit provides annual physical examinations for NMU members, along with diagnostic services. The clinic will offer an eyesight conservation program for seamen and their families and hearing evaluation services for retirees, all as part of the jointly-administered welfare program.

The NMU has headquarters here in another building and offices in 31 other port cities. Its 50,000 members work on deep sea, Great Lakes, river and harbor vessels.

Medical Plan Signs Up 90% Of Eligibles

More than 17 million senior citizens, 90 percent of those eligible, signed up for extended medical benefits—Plan "B"—under medicare before the May 31 deadline, Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball announced.

Between 400,000 and 500,000 signed during the two-month extension of the deadline, which originally was set for March 31, Ball said.

Those who signed will pay $3 a month beginning in July, when both the additional medical benefits and the basic medicare hospitalization program go into effect.

Men and women who become 65 after March 1 have an enrollment period of seven months, beginning three months before the birth date. If a person does not enroll when he becomes eligible the insurance fee for the medical benefits go up 10 percent for each full year.

Sea Unions Join to Fight Foreign Ship Chartering

AFL-CIO unions of seamen, shipyard workers and longshoremen have served notice that they will "use all legal means" to prevent U.S. shipowners from chartering foreign vessels to replace American-flag ships diverted to military service in Viet Nam.

The four unions—the Boilermakers, Seafarers, National Maritime Union and Longshoremen — said they learned that the Dept. of Commerce has agreed to allow subsidized American shipping companies to charter foreign-flag vessels to carry U.S. commercial cargo. The 1936 Merchant Marine Act makes such action unlawful by subsidized companies unless the secretary of commerce makes an exception "under special circumstances and for good cause."

Presidents of the cooperating unions declared that their own survey indicates that "American-flag vessels are still available to carry these cargoes." They added:

"We urge that as a temporary measure the government immediately step up its program of reactivating American-flag vessels from the reserve fleets and that meanwhile it proceed immediately with the implementation of a long-range program to restore the American merchant marine to its proper position of strength and prestige."

The union leaders warned that companies "seizing upon the expedient of chartering foreign flags" are showing "extreme short-sightedness with respect to their own future welfare" as well as "providing a convenient escape hatch" for government officials whose "indifference" to the deterioration of the U.S. merchant marine brought on the problem.

Labor, Rights Coalition Spurred To Seek 'Full, Equal Opportunity'

Unity House, Pa.—The labor movement and civil rights groups must march united, "for equal opportunity and full opportunity must be achieved together if either is to be truly achieved at all," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message to the sixth biennial Civil Rights Conference of the National Trade Union Council for Human Rights.

Civil rights laws alone are not enough, Meany told the council, a division of the Jewish Labor Committee. What is needed, he continued, is "full opportunity in the total meaning of the word—in education, in housing, in health care and most important, in jobs at good wages for everyone."

The meeting examined the coalition of trade unionists, liberals and minority groups with speakers offering conflicting opinions.

Dir. Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights declared that "the civil rights movement has been aiding the organization of unorganized workers." Although national level action for the coalition's program should be stepped up, he said, the freedom movement "can be proud of its role" in strengthening labor's right to organize in the South.

On the other hand, Exec. Sec. Arnold Aronson of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights maintained "there is no effective coalition" on many issues, especially economic ones. Some elements of the alliance did not respond "meaningfully" in the minimum wage fight this year, he charged, leaving the labor movement to "carry the ball."

Deputy Dir. Walter Davis of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, in a discussion of racial friction, indicated that hatred of whites was restricted to a minority of Negroes. Vice Pres. Murray Gross of the Ladies' Garment Workers maintained that "the way to end race hate is to end poverty."

Action to make man's imagination "as revolutionary and creative as his technology" was called for by Michael Harrington, writer and chairman of the League for Industrial Democracy. The crucial question of the coming years, he declared, will be "whether the technology that can liberate our lives will be socially controlled or managed by private interests."

He urged labor to work to implement the AFL-CIO convention resolution calling for national economic planning and proposed a "massive" federal job-creating program.

Resolutions proposed closer cooperation and dialogue between labor and the student movement and passage of the 1966 Civil Rights bill.

Other speakers included Research Dir. Woodrow Ginsburg of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; ILGWU Vice Pres. Shelley Appleton; Pres. Al Bilik of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO, and Columnist Victor Riesel.

ILGWU Vice Pres. Charles S. Zimmerman was re-elected chairman of the council; Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes was renamed treasturer and Betty Kaye Taylor was re-elected executive secretary. Administrative Dir. Jacob S. Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Pres. Albert Shanker of the United Federation of Teachers, New York, were elected vice chairmen.

CIVIL RIGHTS movement can be proud of its role in strengthening labor's right to organize in the South, Dir. Don Slaiman (speaking) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights told the Civil Rights Conference of the National Trade Union Council for Human Rights at Unity House, Pa. Seated is Vice Pres. Murray Gross of the Ladies' Garment Workers, chairman of the council's administrative committee.

Supervisors Serve Notices On Railroads

Chicago—The Railway Supervisors have served Section Six notices under the Railway Labor Act seeking wage increases and improvements in working rules on major railroads with which the union has contracts.

ARSA Pres. James P. Tahney said general chairmen on each railroad have been instructed to supplement the notices with provisions for any special problems on their lines.

Bargaining objectives include an initial wage increase of 20 percent effective Jan. 1, 1967, with subsequent increases of 3.5 percent of the rate in effect on July 1, 1967, and July 1 of each year thereafter. The notices also seek cost of living adjustments, effective May 1, 1967, and each Nov. 1 and May 1 thereafter, based on increases in the Consumer Price Index.

Other improvements sought are overtime pay for work beyond eight hours a day or 40 hours a week, or on holidays, off-days or vacation days, at twice the regular rate, or three times the rate where agreements now call for double pay.

CORRECTION

Rep. John J. Rooney, a Democratic congressman from New York since 1943, was surprised to find himself listed as a Republican in the minimum wage rollcall published in the June 4 issue of the AFL-CIO News. So were the editors and proofreaders. It was an error that slipped through.

PRESIDENTIAL Scholar Regina Gamble of Arlington, Ore., who also won a Joseph Delaney scholarship offered by the Operating Engineers in memory of the union's late president, visited IUOE headquarters in Washington and was greeted by Pres. Hunter P. Wharton (left) and Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman. Miss Gamble is a daughter of Jay W. Gamble, an IUOE member.

Job Lie 'Tests' Banned By Maryland, Delaware

Add Delaware and Maryland to the list of states which have adopted labor-sponsored laws banning the use of polygraphs—so-called 'lie detectors'—by employers.

Delaware Gov. Charles L. Terry, Jr. (D) signed the anti-polygraph bill into law on June 2, after meeting with a labor delegation headed by State AFL-CIO Pres. Clement J. Lemon.

Some weeks earlier, Maryland Gov. J. Millard Tawes (D) signed a similar bill. The two states were the eighth and ninth to prohibit lie detector devices as a condition of employment.

The Delaware law, one of the strongest in the nation, was approved 33-2 by the House and 11-3 by the Senate. It prohibits a private employer, the state or a municipality from requiring or even requesting or suggesting that any employe or prospective employe take a polygraph test as a condition for employment.

A maximum penalty of a $500 fine and 90 days imprisonment is set for violation. The only exception is for lie detector tests administered by a "law enforcement agency in the performance of its official duties."

Maryland's new law, State AFL-CIO Pres. Charles A. Della noted, bars private employers from requiring workers or job applicants to take a polygraph test and imposes a maximum penalty of a $100 fine. It exempts federal, state, county and local governments.

The AFL-CIO and its state and local central bodies have pressed for legislation at all levels of government banning lie detector devices in employment.

Other states which have enacted such laws in recent years are Alaska, California, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Oregon, Rhode Island and Washington. In addition, several cities have passed local anti-polygraph ordinances.

House Passes World Study, Library Bills

Two labor-supported bills passed the House by big margins—a five-year, $700 million expansion of federal aid to libraries and a new program of grants to colleges and non-profit groups to develop courses in international studies.

Both programs had strong bipartisan support, even though the library aid bill exceeded the President's budget request.

Over the five-year period, $300 million would be earmarked for construction of library facilities, $275 million would go for books and equipment, $50 million to set up regional cooperative programs whereby libraries in nearby communities can draw on each other's resources, and funds to provide library services in state residential schools for the handicapped and for inmates of prisons and reformatories. The "talking book" service for the blind would also be expanded.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.), passed by voice vote after easy defeat of Republican motions to cut the funds and limit the program to two years.

The international education bill would authorize $140 million in grants over three years, starting with a first-year spending authority of $10 million. The courses and special programs would help train American experts in international problems. It passed on a 194-89 vote.

AFL-CIO Winner Named:

Presidential Scholar Awards Go to 12 from Union Families

By Gervase N. Love

Dissent and protest must be the recourse of men who, "challenging the existing order, reason their way to a better order," Pres. Johnson told 121 Presidential scholars at a White House ceremony at which he presented them with medallions attesting to their distinction.

The cream of this year's crop of high school graduates, they included an even dozen sons and daughters of AFL-CIO members.

One was Ivy Thomas of Flint, Mich., winner of an AFL-CIO scholarship whose mother, Mrs. Sadie Thomas, is a member of the Flint Federation of Teachers.

Another was Regina Gamble, Arlington, Ore., daughter of Jay W. Gamble, a member of the Operating Engineers and winner of a $6,000 Joseph Delaney Scholarship given by the IUOE in memory of the late president of the union.

Still another was John Franz Daniel of Washington, the son of two veteran trade unionists. His father is Franz Daniel, a Newspaper Guild member who has led or participated in organizing drives in behalf of many unions in all parts of the country and is currently on the staff of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. assigned to central Missouri. His mother, Mrs. Elizabeth H. Daniel, has a similar background of labor activity and is now an educational associate with the Machinists.

The White House ceremony was held on the South Lawn and included a dinner with the scholarship winners seated at tables under the trees. The President returned to his office after speaking, but Mrs. Johnson, their daughters Lynda and Luci, and the latter's fiance, Pat Nugent, presided at different tables.

In his talk to the winners, Johnson vigorously defended the right to dissent and declared that "no minority must ever be muzzled."

"Opinion and protest are the life breath of democracy—even when it blows heavy," he said. "But I urge you never to dissent merely because someone asks you to, or because someone else does. Know why you protest—know what it is you dissent from."

Miss Thomas, accompanied by her mother and her father, Ivory Thomas, had a visit with Pres. George Meany in AFL-CIO headquarters.

She and the other union-oriented scholarship winners were guests at a luncheon sponsored by the Teachers over which Carl J. Megel, AFT Washington representative and former international president of the union, presided.

In a brief talk, Megel reminded the guests that they had the brains and ability to become leaders and called on them to have courage—"courage to speak and fight for the AFL-CIO, for labor, when you get into the universities . . . courage to challenge."

Miss Thomas, whose teacher-mother has a master's degree, plans to attend Wellesley College and hopes to become a child psychologist. She has been a teacher aide for Operation Head Start and recently was chosen queen of the Flint branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Miss Gamble, who will attend the Oregon College of Education and plans to teach high school mathematics and chemistry, has an amateur radio operator's license, does italic writing and oil painting and belongs to the National Honor Society.

Young Daniel, whose teachers described him as "always eager for new intellectual involvements and challenges," was an end on the Hawthorne School (Washington) football team. He intends to take a liberal arts course at Reed College, Portland, Ore.

The other winners whose parents are union members are:

Carlyn Toly, Seattle, Wash., daughter of Michael T. Toly, of the Sheet Metal Workers, who will go to the University of Chicago.

Paul F. McAloon, Hartford, Conn., son of Francis R. McAloon of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who will study fine arts at Trinity College, Hartford.

Michael P. Roca, Phoenix, Ariz., whose father, Paul M. Roca, has retained membership in the Carpenters while practicing law. He plans to attend Yale University, then study law.

Robert J. Osten, Jr., Middletown, N. J., son of a member of the Sheet Metal Workers, who will major in physics at Harvard University.

Anne C. Bittner, Brattleboro, Vt., daughter of John P. Bittner of the Carpenters, who will study psychology at Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Kenneth T. Fong, Portland, Ore., whose father, Choy Wan Fong, belongs to the Hotel & Restaurant Employes and who will study electrical engineering at the California Institute of Technology.

John P. Kearns, Culpeper, Va., son of Philip P. Kearns of the Communications Workers, who will study chemical engineering at the University of Virginia.

Deborah Ann Gibson, Cedar Rapids, Ia., whose father, Edward T. Smith, belongs to Packinghouse Workers Local 3. She plans to study the French language and civilization at Mt. Holyoke College.

Benjamin Willis, Cleveland, O., son of Benjamin Willis, Sr., of the Allied Industrial Union, who will major in mathematics and English at Amherst College.

Road to College Easing For Unionists' Children

New York—The children of unionized workers have more opportunity today than ever before to obtain a college education, speakers agreed at a conference on "How to Get a College Education at Little or No Cost" sponsored by the New York City AFL-CIO.

The same is true of union members themselves, it was brought out in discussion of the fact that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates allocate more than $1 million a year to scholarships. A wide assortment of literature was available regarding available scholarships and grants.

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) told the conference that no young man or woman with the desire and ability should be denied a higher education for lack of facilities or because of personal financial difficulties.

"The rapid advance of science and technology is eliminating skilled and semi-skilled jobs at an unprecedented rate," the council said in a keynote statement. "If the children of wage-earner families are to get tomorrow's jobs, they must qualify with a background of higher education. There are many programs of assistance available to help your children through college, but you must know about them."

Other speakers included Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the city AFL-CIO; Vice Pres. Michael Sampson, chairman of its Community Services Committee; Alan Kistler, AFL-CIO assistant organization director; Dr. Walter Gale of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare; Harold Zuckerman, coordinator of college guidance and scholarship for the New York City Board of Education; Dr. Arnold Gorin, admissions director at New York University, and Dr. James Spence, director of admissions of the State University of New York.

PRIZE-WINNING ENTRIES in the annual union-theme poster contest sponsored by Steelworkers District 9 are shown with winners and USWA Legislative Rep. John Proto of Newark, N. J. The winners, all junior high school pupils and children of union members, received gifts, visited the White House and dined at a downtown hotel. Left to right, Peter Krawiec, Trenton, N. J.; Laura Leschynski, Garfield, N. J.; Proto; Garry Dauley, Roebling, N. J.; Brenda Shepard, Elizabeth; Patricia Rawcliffe, Clifton; Bernadette Weidaw, Phillipsburg, N. J.

'Piecemeal' Changes Opposed:

Full Review Urged Of Job Training Act

The AFL-CIO suggested that Congress undertake "a thoroughgoing review" of the Manpower Development & Training Act as an alternative to "piecemeal amendment" of the government's training program.

The proposal was made by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in testimony before a House Labor subcommittee on eight bills to amend the existing law.

Biemiller endorsed several of the proposed amendments, opposed others, and recommended rewording of a third group. He stressed in his testimony that the AFL-CIO was "among the early and original supporters" of the manpower training program and has consistently supported "efforts to expand its scope and operations."

Both Biemiller and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz opposed a bill before the subcommittee which would authorize the government to pay the wages of on-the-job trainees.

Wirtz criticized the plan as "a wage subsidy" and Biemiller told the subcommittee:

Abuses Seen

"We have always opposed government subsidy of wages for any production which enters into the stream of commerce. In this case, the proposal is to pay the full wage cost which would provide opportunities for even more flagrant abuses. Our position here is quite simple: when a worker produces for a employer, he ought to be paid by that employer."

On another amendment, Biemiller strongly opposed dropping a requirement that there be "reasonable expectation" of employment for a worker who successfully completes a training program.

"In our view," the AFL-CIO spokeman said, "training activities have to be related to job opportunities in order for the training programs to be successful." He said the change in language would stretch the original concept of the law "far out of shape."

Both Biemiller and Wirtz endorsed proposals to give added emphasis to manpower services for workers over the age of 45, to provide medical services for needy trainees, liberalize some of the qualifications for admittance to training programs and authorize training embracing improvement of communications skills, work habits and personal appearance.

Payment of allowance for employed persons taking part-time training was opposed by the AFL-CIO as likely to result in "training just for the sake of training." Wirtz expressed the view that such part-time allowances should be limited to training in "skill shortage occupations."

In urging an overall review of the Manpower Development & Training Act, Biemiller noted that questions have arisen as to the effectiveness of the "anti-pirating provision" of the law.

"Moreover," he added, "we think that there is a need to review the relationship of the MDTA to other statutes, such as the Vocational Education Act and the Economic Opportunity Act. The MDTA is too important a program to be handled by means of a series of piecemeal amendments which must, inevitably, leave gaps in the program."

NEWSLETTER EDITORS for AFL-CIO Community Service Activities receive special awards from the Intl. Labor Press Association in competition for CSA newsletters. From the left, CSA Dir. Leo Perlis; award winners Thomas F. Burns, Ft. Wayne, Ind.; Oscar Wade and Nolan Owen, Lansing, Mich.; Charles Clark, Louisville, Ky., and ILPA Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester.

Rail Grievance Speed-Up Bill Sent to Johnson by Congress

A labor-sponsored bill to speed grievance procedures on railroads and end a double-standard on court review was cleared for the President's signature after winning unanimious approval from Congress.

On the same day the Senate sent the Railway Labor Act amendments to the White House, it also passed another major bill of special interest to rail labor. This would end the special exemption from the Bank Holding Company Act which permits the Alfred I. duPont Estate to control the strike-bound Florida East Coast Railway, a vast industrial empire and a network of 31 Florida banks.

The Railway Labor Act amendments would make decisions of adjustment boards on wages, hours and work rule grievences final and binding, except in case of fraud.

Under present procedures, an employe who losses a grievance involving money has no further appeal. But if the worker wins a money award, management can appeal the decision to the courts.

The new legislation also requires the appointment of a special adjustment board at the request of either party to a grievance. At present consent of both parties is required and the result has been long delays in overburdened adjustment boards.

The AFL-CIO had pointed out, in support of the legislation, that railroad workers sometimes have to wait more than 10 years for decisions on claims.

The Railway Labor Executives Association, which led the fight for the legislation, noted that the adjustment board procedure was set up in 1934 to arbitrate "minor disputes" but that the system has "failed miserably" to function because of the delays.

In acting on the Bank Holding Co. bill, the Senate dropped a labor-opposed amendment tacked on in the House in an apparent effort to kill the bill.

The House provision would have eliminated an exemption for labor and agricultural organizations from the law's prohibition against banks and non-banking enterprises coming under the same ownership. A few unions provide banking services, but no allegations were made in either the House or Senate committees that this presented any problem.

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) told the Senate that the duPont exemption from the 1956 Bank Holding Co. Act was given under the mistaken assumption that the estate's income was wholly devoted to charity. In fact, he said, since Alfred I. duPont died in 1935, his widow has received $119.3 million in income and the Nemours Foundation, a charitable institution, only $14.8 million.

The Senate bill gives the estate five years to divest itself of either its banking or non-banking interests. Amendments to extend the time limit for divestiture were defeated and the Senate then passed the bill by voice vote.

In a letter to senators on the eve of the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared that control of the combined banking and industrial empire in Florida by the duPont Estate "is responsible for the lengthy labor dispute" on the Florida East Coast Railway.

The strikers, Biemiller noted, "have sought nothing other than the same pay and conditions that have long since been provided for other railroad employes."

The House now has a choice of accepting the Senate amendments to its bill or insisting on a conference to reconcile the two measures.

Jobless Level in May Climbs Back to 4%

olds accounted for 542,000 and experienced a jobless rate of 17.2 percent, up from 15.6 percent.

About the teenager in school who is looking in May for a job he cannot take until vacation begins, Ross commented:

"It doesn't make sense to call him unemployed, but, by definition, he is."

This, Ross added, is one of the problems the Labor Dept. is dealing with in its studies to refine the system of measuring unemployment.

While the jobless rate for all teenagers rose from 12 percent in April to 13.4 per cent in May, the jobless rate for adult women also moved up, from 3.6 percent to 4 percent.

Adult males, on the other hand, continued in a strong position. Men 20 years and over had their jobless rate of 2.4 percent remain unchanged in May.

While the rate for 20-24-year-old men moved up from 4.3 percent to 4.9 percent, the rate for men 25 and over held steady at 2.1 percent, the lowest level since August 1953, the report said.

The jobless rate for married men —a key breadwinner group—was unchanged at 1.8 percent, holding below 2 percent for the sixth straight month.

In the important manufacturing sector, the Labor Dept. reported a job gain of about 120,000 to 18.8 million in May. The over-the-month rise was 60,000 greater than expected, the report said, with most of the advance centered in hard goods, particularly electrical equipment and machinery.

The factory workweek averaged 41.5 hours in May, up 18 minutes from April but down very slightly after seasonal adjustment. Included were 4 hours of overtime, highest for the month since the series began in 1956.

Average hourly earnings of factory workers were unchanged at $2.70; the longer workweek, however, pushed weekly earnings to a new high of $112.05. Weekly earnings were up 4.2 percent over the year.

Summing up the May job picture, Ross said it "does indicate a continuation of the upward sweep in production and, therefore, a further decline in unemployment as the year goes on."

Mrs. Burgoon Fills Labor Dept. Post

Mrs. Beatrice M. Burgoon has been appointed director of the Office of Employe-Management Relations, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced.

A Phi Beta Kappa graduate of the University of Pennsylvania who took a master's degree in political science there, Mrs. Burgoon served with the Regional War Labor Board in Philadelphia during World War II, with the National Wage Stabilization Board during the Korean conflict and with the Presidential Railroad Commission in 1961-62. She has since been engaged in studies of the longshore industry.

SENATE confirmed Pres. Johnson's nomination of Manpower Administrator Stanley H. Ruttenberg as assistant secretary of labor. Ruttenberg is a former director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Women Make Up Fifth Of All Union Members

Nearly a fifth of all union members in the nation are women, according to a Labor Dept. report in preparation of the forthcoming Directory of National and International Labor Unions in the United States, 1965.

From 1958 through 1964, the number of women unionists rose from 3.2 million to 3.4 million, or from 18.2 percent of all union members to 19 percent, the department said in a Monthly Labor Review article summarizing a study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The same study showed that union efforts to organize white collar workers were more successful in the two-year period ending in 1964 than in any like interval since 1956. The 1964 total was put at 2.6 million, or 14.4 percent of total union membership.

The bureau's Harry P. Cohany noted also that 189 national and international unions headquartered in the U.S. had 17.9 million members in 1964, up from 17.6 million in two years. Of the total, 15.1 million were in unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

While union membership was rising, the proportion of members in the labor force slipped from 24.8 percent to 21.9. But in manufacturing, union membership rose from 45.8 to 46.6 percent and in government from 7 to 8.1 per cent of all trade unionists.

Women made up at least half the membership of 26 unions while 47 unions, with a total of nearly 2 million members, reported no women among them, according to Cohany's summary.

The highest ratios of women to total membership were reported by the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing Workers. Others with many women workers were listed as the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Retail Clerks, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, the Communications Workers, Auto Workers and the Building Service Employes.

BLS said that in the two-year period covered by the study three unions passed the 100,000 mark in total members — the Teachers, Packinghouse Workers and the unaffiliated Mine Workers' District Fifty. The Government Employes moved up in the ranks of unions —from 43rd to 34th place, the survey showed.

Leadership Group Paces Drive:

White House Parley Spurs Stronger Civil Rights Laws

A broad-based drive for passage of strengthened civil rights legislation and for "vigorous and effective enforcement" of existing laws emerged as the unifying theme of the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights."

The spearhead will be the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of religious, civil rights and labor organizations. It was this coalition which mobilized public and congressional support for the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

A resolution drafted by the leadership organization was approved by nearly all of the working committees of the White House conference—and its priority was emphasized in the summary speech at the concluding dinner session.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP and chairman of the leadership conference, told the 2,500 White House delegates that the civil rights bill "offers a chance for immediate action this summer . . . a task that can be undertaken in the next 24 hours."

The drive for new legislation was given even greater impetus a few days after the conference ended when James Meredith was shot down in Mississippi.

The assault on Meredith brought strong bipartisan demands on Congress for quick action on the rights bill.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) had this comment on the effect of the Meredith shooting:

"There are times when the civil rights movement has no greater friend than its enemy. It is the enemy of civil rights who again and again produces the evidence to convince this nation that we cannot afford to stand still."

Wilkins, in his summary speech, noted that the pending bill encompasses many of the conference goals, including:

- Broadening the authority of the attorney general to initiate school desegregation action, without subjecting parents to threats and intimidation by requiring them to initiate complaints.
- Closing loopholes which permit racial discrimination in selection of state and federal juries.
- Providing federal court jurisdiction over cases involving attacks on civil rights workers.
- Banning discrimination in the sale and rental of housing.

Amendments Sought

The conference also called for extending equal employment guarantees to jobs in state and local governments. It urged indemnity for those who suffer injury in the cause of civil rights and it asked strengthening of the Administration bill's language on jury selection and fair housing.

The resolution called for more vigorous enforcement of present laws and asked the Senate to restore $927,000 which the House recently cut from the civil rights enforcement budget of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Wilkins struck out sharply at fringe elements of the civil rights movement who, he said, "have begun to classify believers by the color of their skins."

He noted that "Negroes have had white allies since the first white southerner violated the law by teaching slaves to read and write."

Wilkins praised the "unafraid" students of both races, the "dedicated men and women of all three great religious faiths who have brought a new fervor and fresh courage to the whole freedom movement," and the "friends in organized labor who were a tower of financial strength and legislative skill."

"We need them and they need us," Wilkins declared.

The conference overwhelmingly rejected attempts to link the civil rights movement to opposition to America's role in Viet Nam. In all workshop sessions where the issue was raised, Viet Nam "pullout" resolutions were beaten by big margins.

The most frequently passed resolution at the 12 working committees called for home rule for the District of Columbia.

Resolutions adopted by one or more committees called for more vigorous federal, state and local action in the area of civil rights, job opportunity, quality education and housing, urged improved minimum wage legislation, called for repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, and expressed concern at the attitude of many police officials to the Negro community.

A group of 37 Catholic leaders attending the conference issued a statement calling on their co-religionists "to recommit the church to the new call for racial justice."

The signers included Lawrence Cardinal Shehan of Baltimore, Archbishop Paul C. Hallinan of Atlanta, three bishops, presidents and deans of several Catholic colleges and prominent clergy and laymen.

"Yesterday's standards of tolerance do not match today's needs," they declared. "Racial justice today calls for more than tolerance. Racial justice today is a moral issue that demands a Christ-like concern for all fellow men and a personal responsibility for their health, education, housing and jobs."

JOURNALISM EXCELLENCE award of the Capital Press Club of Washington, D. C., for 1965 is presented to Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO, for his "excellent reporting, his solid news judgment, his practice of fair and honest reporting." Samuel F. Yette (left) presented a plaque as a member of the club's citation committee at its 23rd annual awards banquet. Yette is a special assistant to Office of Economic Opportunity Dir. Sargent Shriver.

California Vote Foreshadows Sharp Battle

Republican. Waldie is also the Democratic nominee for the November race.

All other 14 California representatives—10 Democrats and four Republicans—who had primary opposition won, defeating a number of so-called "peace" candidates.

Reagan, one of Goldwater's most effective campaigners in 1964, has soft-pedaled his right-wing conservatism in the current campaign.

In Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland (D) and conservative Democratic congressional candidates won renomination. New Negro voters turned out in meaningful numbers in only a few areas.

In South Dakota, Sen. Karl Mundt (R) won renomination over his first primary opponent in 18 years by a 4 to 1 margin.

the consumer. This would gouge the consumer." The amendment was beaten, 51-29.

Prospects for the administration-supported bill in the House, once regarded as dubious, brightened considerably when a companion measure to the Hart-Magnuson bill was introduced June 2 by Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.), chairman of the House Commerce Committee.

The Senate legislation is somewhat milder than the original Hart bill. In a compromise necessary to bring the measure out of committee, authority to regulate the shape of packages was deleted. Nevertheless the bill, as the AFL-CIO said in a letter to senators, "will make a significant contribution to the interest of the consumer."

Its two main sections:

- Set standards for labeling so that a consumer won't need a magnifying glass and lots of perserverance to find out how much a package weighs and an agile skill at comparing a "jumbo half pint" with a nine-ounce size.

Size Restrictions

- Give authority to the government—where manufacturers are unable to agree on voluntary standards—to regulate the variety of weights and measures in which a product may be packaged. These would be imposed only when the multiplicity of sizes makes it difficult for the shopper to compare prices.

Regulatory authority would be divided between the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare which would have jurisdiction over foods, drugs and cosmetics and the Federal Trade Commission, which would regulate other consumer products.

The two agencies would also be empowered to prohibit "cents-off" markings where there is no assurance that the retailer will pass on the savings and to draw up uniform definitions of "servings" when packages have claims such as "serves four."

Pres. Johnson gave a strong boost to the truth-in-packaging bill in a message to Congress earlier this year and his special assistant for consumer affairs, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, has been a one-woman lobby for the bill. She has spoken to union conventions, women's organizations and consumer groups throughout the nation — often carrying shopping bags loaded with groceries to demonstrate her points.

Communities Seen as Key In Health Care

A new community pattern of health services—ranging from preventive care to rehabilitation—has been proposed in a report addressed "to the people of the United States."

The report presents years of study by the National Commission on Community Health Services, set up in 1962 by the American Public Health Association and the National Health Council. Marion B. Folsom, former secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, was chairman. Its members, mostly physicians, included Nelson B. Cruikshank, AFL-CIO social security director during most of the period of the studies.

Key recommendations, turned over to Pres. Johnson at a White House ceremony, included a proposal that communities "by deliberate planning" make available "health services of high quality to all people in each community."

The goal, the commission said, should include preventive measures, early detection of disease, prompt treatment and rehabilitation.

Central Body Adds BNA to 'Unfair' List

The Greater Washington Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO, has voted to put all publications of the struck Bureau of National Affairs on its "unfair" list, the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild announced.

The council, in a resolution adopted by unanimous vote of its delegates, also urged all local unions to sign refusal-to-release report forms supplied by the Guild, and to send them to the American Arbitration Association.

Also it recommended that unions protest the refusal of government agencies to cancel BNA services.

The union, which struck BNA on May 9 in a dispute over union security and other contract issues, repeated an earlier appeal to unions to remove BNA address plates from their mailing lists now.

Manufacturing Report:

Sales, Profits Leap In First Quarter

Manufacturing sales and profits shot skyward in the first quarter of 1966, with profits leading the way, according to the latest government figures.

Both sales and profits were "significantly higher" in the January-March period than for the same quarter of 1965, according to a quarterly report issued by the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Sales of U.S. manufacturers totaled $129.9 billion in the first quarter, 13 percent above the same period for last year. After-tax profits rose even more—by 16 percent to $7.2 billion.

With the profits rise outgaining the sales rise, the figures reflected a greater profit margin. And the figures are even more impressive when it is remembered the comparison is being made with the booming first quarter of last year.

The government report recalled that last year's first quarter was "a period characterized by post-strike operations in the motor vehicle industry and strike-hedge buying of primary metals" and added:

"Profits after taxes per dollar of sales in the first quarter amounted to 5.6 cents compared to 5.4 cents in the corresponding period of 1965. Durable and non-durable goods industries shared the increase in profit margins about equally."

While the after-tax earnings of durable goods firms averaged a healthy rise of 17 percent for the first quarter of 1966 as compared to a year earlier, most firms scored more sensational gains.

Gains in excess of 33 percent were recorded for these industry groups: machinery, furniture, stone, clay and glass, instruments, and miscellaneous manufacturing and ordnance.

Unions Hit GE-UE Bid For 'Deal'

Eight AFL-CIO unions charged General Elecric Co. with trying to make a "collusive deal" with the expelled United Electrical union so as to avoid "responsible bargaining" with unions representing the bulk of GE workers.

The AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining, the eight-union coalition, represents 120,000 GE employes. The UE, kicked out of the CIO in 1949 on findings of Communist domination, bargains for fewer than 14,000 GE workers.

General Electric management has refused to deal with the eight-union AFL-CIO committee and walked out of a preliminary meeting with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) because representatives of other AFL-CIO unions had been named to the IUE bargaining committee.

GE later announced it would move into negotiations with the UE on pensions, insurance and vacations.

Meanwhile charges and countercharges of unfair labor practices have been brought before the National Labor Relations Board.

The IUE has charged GE with

Merger Plan Urged For 3 Rail Unions

Top officers of three of the five railroad operating brotherhoods, after nearly a year of discussion, have agreed to recommend merger to their membership.

Announcement of the decision to urge creation of a new union which would "represent men engaged in engine and train service on railroads of the North American continent," was made simultaneously by the presidents of the three unions at their respective headquarters —Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen in Cleveland; Pres. Neil P. Speirs of the Switchmen in Buffalo, N.Y., and Pres. George H. Harris of the Conductors & Brakemen in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

The BLFE and the Switchmen are AFL-CIO affiliates, the ORCB is unaffiliated. All three are among the country's oldest unions. The new organization, if approved, will have about 92,000 members.

"The plan will now be presented to the authoritative bodies of the three organizations for consideration and implementation," the presidents said in their statement. "Adoption will be recommended."

The ORCB, which has a convention scheduled to open June 20 in Cedar Rapids, will be the first to act. Dates have not been set by the other brotherhoods.

Members of the three unions work as locomotive engineers, locomotive helpers or firemen, hostlers and hostler helpers, conductors, brakemen, switchmen and switch tenders.

Spokesmen for the unions emphasized that a merger would not af-

Endorses U.S. Labor Walkout

By Saul Miller

Full support and endorsement of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's position and the protest walkout of U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl from the Intl. Labor Organization conference was voted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at a meeting in Washington.

The council adopted a resolution pointing out that the protest against the election of a Communist nation's delegate as chairman of the annual conference was not a "withdrawal from the ILO."

The protest was "the most effective means available," the council declared, "to indicate the reaction of the free workers of America to the election as president of the conference of a representative of a totalitarian regime whose record and practices are a standing denial of everything that the ILO stands for and was created to achieve."

The council's action, by a vote of 18 to 6, came at a special one-day meeting called by Meany after AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther had protested the walkout of the worker delegation at the Geneva conference in reaction to the election of Leon Chajn of Poland.

Meany told a press conference after the meeting that he had received a call from Faupl from Geneva in which Faupl had said he could not "in good conscience sit in a conference presided over by a representative of a totalitarian country" and that he was withdraw-

Primaries Set Stage For Senate Battles

One of the country's major Senate races was set up in Illinois primary elections when veteran liberal Democratic incumbent Paul H. Douglas won renomination and Republicans chose Charles H. Percy, the party's nominee for governor two years ago, as his opponent.

In South Carolina, at the same time, one Senate change was assured when former Gov. Ernest F. Hollings defeated incumbent Sen. Donald Russell in a Democratic primary battle.

Hollings was badly beaten four years ago when he challenged the late Sen. Olin Johnston for nomination. He capitalized successfully this year on a campaign charge that Russell had virtually named himself to the Senate when Johnston died two years later, resigning as governor and accepting appointment from his automatic successor, Lt. Gov. Robert McNair.

High Court Upholds Law On Puerto Rican Voters

The Supreme Court laid down a solid rule upholding the power of Congress to override state eligibility standards for voting and grant the franchise to citizens able to read and write in Spanish but not in English.

The 7-2 decision affects primarily about three-quarters of a million Puerto Ricans living in New York City, an estimated 300,000 of whom meet the state's literacy standards generally but still speak and read Spanish.

The majority opinion, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., upheld a special section of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, designed specifically to override New York State law restricting eligibility for voting to citizens literate in English.

Brennan confined the decision to the narrow ground that the Puerto Rican section was "appropriate legislation" under which Congress sought to enforce the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment.

He said that because of this "appropriate" congressional action, the court was not confronted with the necessity of deciding whether the New York English-eligibility statute violated on its face the equal protection clause.

Leather Goods Union Approves Bargaining Standards, Dues Hike

Atlantic City, N. J.—The Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers shaped a new collective bargaining program, strengthened the union's dues and per capita structure and re-elected its top leadership at the 30th anniversary convention here.

The 400 delegates unanimously re-elected Pres. Norman Zukowsky, Sec.-Treas. Jack Wieselberg and Executive Vice Pres. Philip Lubliner to their fourth successive three-year terms.

The officers, together with Vice Pres. Raymond A. Dooley, manager of the four joint boards, and Vice Pres. Charles Feinstein, director of the welfare and pension funds, were designated as an international policy committee which will implement a wide-ranging program on contract uniformity, organizing, union label, legislative activity and research which was adopted by the convention.

Other vice-presidents re-elected, in addition to Dooley and Feinstein, were Morris Fuchs, Ben Feldman and Paul DiPaola. Also elected were 23 members of the general executive board.

The establishment of an international policy committee was one of a number of constitutional changes approved at the convention. Others included an increase in per capita payments of 13 cents per month and in the minimum dues of each local union of 65 cents per month as

Extensive debate was evoked by the proposal that collective bargaining proposals on the part of each affiliate must adhere to stipulated minimum standards and that no contract can be approved unless it meets these standards or receives the sanction of the international policy committee. The guidelines were finally adopted unanimously.

Schnitzler Speaks

Alluding to a convention resolution calling for a stepped-up drive to achieve a membership mark of 60,000 by the union's next convention, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler noted that the recent organizational success of affiliates had upped the federation's membership by 1.2 million during the past two years. This demonstration of effectiveness, he said, belies those critics who have "written off the labor movement in this country as tired and complacent." Schnitzler also scored those who predicted that "labor will sit out this election", citing the COPE efforts of the Leather Goods Workers as typical of "our determination to elevate liberal strength in the 90th Congress."

Similar views were voiced by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers, who pledged his union's "full cooperation" in the organizational drive. He also installed the newly-elected officers.

Sen. Clifford P. Case (R- N. J.), introduced by Zukowsky "as a great friend of labor," received bursts of applause when he pledged his support for enactment of "minimum wage legislation that is meaningful" and he predicted that liberal strength in Congress next year will assure "repeal of Section 14(b)."

With regard to minimum wage legislation the convention called not only for an increase to $2 an hour and added coverage but also for "the same kind of adjustment without qualifications" in Puerto Rico, where a low wage structure has contributed to making the island a growing center of the personal leather goods' industry.

Among 53 other resolutions was one calling for revision of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 which is scheduled for review by Congress next year. The resolution declared that "escalation imports from low-wage countries" had "frozen" American products out of the domestic market in some categories of leather and plastic goods and making "serious inroads" in the handbag industry.

A union label program was formulated with Lubliner designated to direct the union label department when it becomes operative next month. He urged the establishment of a $500,000 promotional fund, to be financed by employer contributions, "to protect our members in the handbag industry."

Ship Unions Slate 'SOS' Conference

The fate of the American merchant marine will be put up to Congress and Pres. Johnson at an "SOS" conference June 28-29 in Washington arranged by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee.

The union groups have established the American Committee to Save Our Shipping and have scheduled the "SOS" session to coincide with the 30th anniversary of enactment of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

That law, still in force, set 50 percent of the country's shipping as the merchant marine goal. At present, the committee pointed out, the U.S.-flag fleet carries less than 9 percent of our foreign commerce and is "physically and economically obsolete." Pres. Johnson has been invited to address the conference.

Co-chairmen of the committee are the presidents of four AFL-CIO affiliates concerned with shipping—Pres. Russell Berg of the Boilermakers; Pres. Joseph N. Curran of the National Maritime Union; Pres. Thomas Gleason of the Longshoremen and Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers.

Laborers Name Head Of Public Employe Unit

Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi of the Laborers has announced the appointment of Henry T. Wilson as director of the union's Federal-Public Service Employes' District Council.

Wilson, an attorney with many years experience in public employe organizing, has been on the staff of the Laborers for the past two years.

The council is expanding its organizing activities in the federal employe field and serves as a clearing house for relations with federal agencies at the Washington level.

At Masters, Mates Convention:

Campaign Pressed For U.S.-Flag Ships

Portland—Government and labor in Oregon have voiced all-out support for the drive to have American export cargo hauled in ships built and repaired in American yards and operated under the American flag by American seamen.

That support developed here during the closing sessions last week of the Masters, Mates & Pilots convention. It was voiced by Gov. Mark O. Hatfield (R) and Edward J. Whelan, executive secretary of the Oregon AFL-CIO.

"The national security of this nation," Hatfield said, "demands that the United States have the best possible merchant fleet for commerce and defense needs, owned and operated and manned by Americans, built in the United States shipyards to the highest possible safety for crews and passengers.

"To do this we must have a subsidy of about 50 percent for construction costs and varying portions of the costs for wages and repairs.

"The need for a modern merchant fleet has become even more apparent today. Ninety-eight percent of all supplies delivered to South Viet Nam depend on merchant shipping. Also eight out of every 10 service men arriving in Viet Nam do so by sea."

Whelan said the Oregon AFL-CIO joined fully in the fight of the MM&P and other maritime unions for American construction of American ships.

"We want to see more American cargo moved in American ships," he declared. "Our commitments to our allies are at stake."

For its part the MM&P instructed its president, Captain Lloyd W. Sheldon of New York, to contact Pres. Johnson in an effort to obtain implementation of the "American ship" program proposed by Rep. William S. Mailliard (D-Calif.).

In a letter to the President, Mailliard urged a ship replacement program that would double the number of vessels in the U. S. merchant fleet.

British Strike Backed

The MM&P also voted support of the British seamen's strike and cabled the text of the resolution to the British National Union of Seamen.

Burt E. Lanpher of New York, secretary-treasurer of the Staff Officers Association of America, told MM&P delegates how the SOA had provided funds to help finance the pharmacist mate training school for pursers.

The school will be at the Marine Hospital on Staten Island, N. Y., a joint project with the New York State Board of Education and the federal government.

He detailed the long fight waged by the union to remedy a situation where, he said, two-thirds of American ships are without trained medical men aboard.

joined in dissent by Justice Potter Stewart, argued that action by Congress amounted to no more than a "legislative announcement" and that the court itself should have met its "traditional" obligation of deciding whether the state statute was "arbitrary or irrational" and thus unconstitutional.

The scope of Brennan's majority opinion strongly suggested that the court would be inclined to uphold other congressional action, invalidating restrictive voting laws, if the federal statute is tied to the power of Congress to enforce the equal-protection clause through "appropriate legislation."

In another decision the court split 5-4 in ruling that prosecutors cannot use in a later trial a "confession" obtained by the police against a crime suspect during an interrogation in which the suspect is not warned of his constitutional right to remain silent and have legal counsel present.

The 5th Amendment privilege against self-incrimination comes into play from the moment a suspect is taken into police custody, Chief Justice Earl Warren said in the majority opinion. If he lacks the means to engage a lawyer, interrogation to obtain a confession must be delayed until a court-appointed lawyer is present.

Justices John Marshall Harlan, Byron R. White, Tom C. Clark and Potter Stewart dissented with passionate remarks that the court was granting a "balance of power" to accused criminals.

Warren in his majority opinion said that law enforcement had not suffered in England and Scotland from a requirement that police inform a suspect of his rights and that the Federal Bureau of Investigation for years has informed all suspects of their right to counsel and to remain silent.

ing the delegation.

Meany said he told Faupl, "You are the delegate, you are in a position to weigh the situation. If I were in your position I would do the same thing, but don't do anything that would commit the AFL-CIO to withdrawing from the organization—which is a decision that neither you nor I can make but only the Executive Council."

The AFL-CIO president told reporters he then called Pres. Johnson and gave him a full report and that the President asked him to discuss the situation further with Sec. of State Dean Rusk. Meany said Rusk urged that Faupl stand for re-election to the ILO Governing Body. Faupl did and was re-elected.

Meany emphasized that it was "absolutely untrue" that the President or Rusk exerted any pressure to change the AFL-CIO position and that if they had, despite his own feelings, he would have called Faupl and told him to respect the request.

Long-Standing Policy

Meany strongly reaffirmed for reporters the AFL-CIO position of many years, adopted again at the 1965 convention, that the federation will not support in any fashion exchanges of trade union delegations with Communist nations because they do not have free trade unions but government, state-directed agencies posing as unions. If this differs from the so-called "bridge-building" policies sometimes expressed by the Administration, Meany said, that is nevertheless the AFL-CIO position.

As for himself, Meany emphasized, "I stick to the AFL-CIO policy" on these matters.

ILO Role Stressed

Meany said Reuther had at no time contacted him about the Geneva situation and that Reuther's letter appeared first in the press before he received it.

He emphasized also that the real problem was the Communist plan to take over the ILO and make it another governmental agency rather than a tripartite group representing workers, management and governments. The free nations have the votes in the ILO to stop this, he stressed, and the AFL-CIO is not making any determinations about pulling out of the ILO but at the moment is protesting—a tactical decision—the election of a Communist chairman.

The resolution supporting Meany and Faupl came after long and thorough discussion and the presentation of a report by Faupl to the council on the background and development of the controversy.

Coalition Named

Chajn was elected, Faupl pointed out, by a coalition of Communist-bloc countries, "Fascist Spain and Portugal, the Arab delegations and the new developing countries of Africa." The character of this coalition, he told the council, reinforced the U.S. worker delegation's decision to protest.

He noted that the election of the Polish delegate came on the 10th anniversary of the "brutal suppression" of the uprising in Poznan and the 10th anniversary also of the Hungarian revolt. As for Poland, Faupl pointed out that for four successive years Poland "has been asked to bring its trade union act of 1949 into conformity with the ILO's minimum standards of freedom. For just as many years the Polish government has blandly replied that the ILO must adapt itself to the realities of the Communist system."

Thirdly, said Faupl, the candidacy of a Communist-bloc nation for the chairmanship of the conference "was the next significant step in an active campaign to change fundamentally the character and the structure of the ILO begun in 1954 when Communist-bloc nations returned to the ILO."

The U.S. worker delegate traced for the council a series of discussions going back to April 1965 on the "deterioration of the tripartite structure of the ILO and the increasing Communist pressure within that organization."

Warning Cited

He noted that Meany had told Rusk last year that if further deterioration of the ILO took place by allowing it to drift into "a largely inter-governmental institution and straying from its original purpose and structure, there would be no more place within it for the American labor movement."

Faupl cited the words of Sec.-Gen. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions to the Geneva conference on June 10:

"If the ILO ever attempted to adjust its structure and activities to conditions as they exist in certain member countries ruled by totalitarian regimes . . . this oldest organization of the family of the United Nations would fail to live up to its objectives and purposes, for the achievement of which it was created."

Faupl concluded, "It is difficult for me to understand why members of our own family have censured me in the public press over a protest carried out with dignity and within the constitutional procedures and the traditional practice of workers' representatives in the ILO."

Reuther issued a statement before the meeting declaring that the controversy was a "matter of policy and democratic procedure" and that the Auto Workers executive board believes that the action at Geneva was "unwise, undemocratic and unfortunate."

Vice Presidents A. Philip Randolph, I. W. Abel, Herman D. Kenin, Paul L. Phillips and David Sullivan were unable to attend the session.

Pension Plan Reneging Laid To Railroads

Rail unions have accused the industry's management of reneging on a commitment to negotiate a supplemental pension plan.

Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association leveled the charge in a letter to a conference of railroad presidents. He warned them that their attitude is a provocation to "strife in labor relations" in the industry and could lead to strikes.

Leighty's blast was touched off by the breakup of negotiations between the RLEA and the veteran management negotiator, Chairman J. E. Wolfe of the National Railway Labor Conference.

As Leighty recounted it, Wolfe told the unions in March that "he had specific authority" to commit the railroads "to spend $30 million a year for supplemental pensions over a five-year period."

Negotiations proceeded within this framework until early this month, when Wolfe told the union committee that his authority to reach an agreement on this basis had been revoked.

Dubinsky Leaves Top ILGWU Post, Installs Louis Stulberg as Successor

New York—David Dubinsky officially stepped out as president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and installed his successor, Louis Stulberg, before a "family" gathering of some 1,200 garment unionists joined by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey.

This is a "most peculiar event in ILGWU history, with one president stepping down and another assuming his responsibilities," Dubinsky told the assemblage of executive board members, area and local officials of the union and veterans of its past struggles.

"I hope that the spirit in which this is being done will continue to animate our organization," he declared.

The audience saluted Dubinsky for 34 years of leadership that spanned the union's progress from a broken shell to a powerful and influential force. And it cheered Stulberg's pledge that the ILGWU would continue to move forward, breaking new ground in wages and working standards, welfare benefits, and the organization of workers still outside its ranks.

Humphrey proudly recalled that the ILGWU had given him an honorary membership at its 1947 convention when he had hailed the union as being "in the forefront of American liberalism—honest, true, fair American liberalism."

The Vice President paid tribute to Dubinsky as "a practical man who dared to dream . . . a dreamer who dared to be practical." The final years of his leadership, Humphrey said, "were vintage years for the nation and for the causes for which he has fought."

"Yesterday's dreams have been fulfilled. Today, Louis Stulberg stands for new dreams and their fulfillment."

Not Retired

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to Dubinsky, said his friends in the federation "do not really believe in those words, 'David Dubinsky, retired.' "

"Retired as president of the ILGWU, yes; retired from active support of the many good causes to which he has devoted a lifetime—never," said Meany.

In that sense, he observed, labor and the country have actually gained.

"We will have Pres. Stulberg carrying on your great work as leader of the ILGWU, and we will still have you, free of day-to-day responsibilities, and able to apply the full force of your talents to the cause of all mankind."

Gen. Sec. Omer Becu cabled the best wishes of the Intl. Confederation of Trade Unions to Dubinsky, declaring that the ILGWU's early fight under his leadership for union recognition and for immigrant labor "will continue to inspire the successive generations throughout the world in their striving for greater progress and prosperity."

Stulberg presented a surprise gift to the outgoing president, a book containing pictorial and other mementos prepared by Dubinsky's longtime secretary, Hannah Haskel Kreindler, who retired several years ago. She then presented a similar volume to Stulberg.

In his last formal address as president before an ILGWU assemblage, Dubinsky recalled that he had spent 37 years as an officer of the union, having been elected secretary-treasurer in 1929 and president in 1932.

"These 37 years have been rich years of my life," he declared. "Nothing could have meant as much to me. There has been lots of satisfaction, much excitement—and plenty of troubles, too."

Summing up his basic beliefs and approach, he asserted, "I am read to give my life in the fight against racketeers, chiseling anti-union employers, or Communists. I am proud of what I did to keep the union free of all such elements."

Dubinsky said he was turning over the union's top post "to the best man we have in our ranks."

"The problems of today are different from what they were when I first became president, but they are still plentiful. . . . Stulberg needs your unstinted support in working to solve them.

"Let the past be the best lesson that we are most successful when our ranks are united."

Brewery Workers Win Long Soft Drink Strike

Montreal, Que.—Some 850 newly-organized members of two locals of the Brewery Workers have returned to work after a seven-month strike that won first contracts at four Coca-Cola Co. plants.

The victory was regarded as one of the most important breakthroughs in the soft drink industry in the Province of Quebec, as the plants—three in Montreal and one in Quebec City—all are owned by the traditionally anti-union parent company.

The local's fight for contracts started in 1961, when the workers joined the union. They remained loyal despite a series of legal roadblocks that barred a representation election until 1964, stayed grimly with the union through disheartening and unsuccessful negotiations, and manned picket lines through a bitter Canadian winter.

The settlement gives members of Locals 238 and 327 back pay of $337.50 each, nearly triple the original company offer; a wage increase of 29 cents an hour immediately and 12 cents in the second year of a two-year contract, with the Quebec members getting an additional 10 cents to adjust inequities.

The 40-hour Monday-through-Friday week was established with time and a half for Saturday work and double time on Sunday. The union shop and checkoff were won, as were a comprehensive health-medical-insurance program, a grievance procedure, 10 paid holidays and vacation of two weeks after one year of service, three weeks after 10 years and four weeks after 20 years.

Workers Hailed

The international executive board hailed the locals and their members for their long fight, declaring that "the strike wrote an illustrious chapter of labor history because of the valiant courage and steadfast loyalty" of the workers. The board also lauded Subregional Dir. Roland Goedike for his leadership. Goedike in turn gave the strikers full credit for the victory.

BW Intl. Dir. of Organization Thomas M. Rusch assisted in the terminal negotiations. The strike had solid support from the Canadian Labor Congress, Quebec Federation of Labor, the union's Quebec Joint Board and many locals in both Canada and the United States.

Justice for the Consumer

AFTER FOUR YEARS of hard, tedious work the American consumer has won a major victory—Senate passage of a "truth-in-packaging" bill.

The decisive margin by which the Senate beat back weakening and crippling amendments and moves to further delay action holds the promise of similar action by the House.

The AFL-CIO, in its role as the "people's lobby," took a leading part in the fight to win protection for the consumer from those who would cut into the purchasing power earned in the plant or shop by misleading labeling and deceptive containers.

The victory in the Senate is a tribute to the determination and leadership of men such as Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.).

It is evidence also that when millions of consumers translate their grumblings and complaints into the channels of legislative and political action there can and will be results.

Now it's up to the House to give the long-abused American consumer a final measure of justice by acting quickly on the Senate-passed bill.

A Job Well Done

PRESENTATION of an AFL-CIO charter to the New York City Taxi Drivers Union was an important milestone in the history of the trade union movement, for it represented the answer to the old line, "they said it couldn't be done."

For more than 30 years various unions launched campaigns to organize the taxi drivers. They all petered out in a few months or so. A few independent unions tried and failed. The outlook for eventual success even in a "union town" such as New York City was on the black side.

But then a new formula was put to work. Instead of individual unions working on their own, the entire New York City labor movement, working through the city central body and its president, Harry Van Arsdale, and the regional AFL-CIO office, headed by Michael Mann, went to work on the problem. The full resources of all AFL-CIO unions in the area were mobilized. The result: a successful organizing drive and a solid contract complete with pay increases and union security.

The "they said it couldn't be done" line only stands up when a difficult problem is approached in a bits and pieces style. When a fully mobilized and coordinated drive is put together, the toughest obstacles can fall.

Congratulations to the New York City labor movement for a job well done.

The Reagan Image

CHALK ONE UP for the image makers in California. They took the man who probably raised more money single-handed for Goldwater in 1964—Ronald Reagan—and turned him into an engaging conservative something or other.

But image or not, the original is still there. Reagan is clearly and precisely on record as opposed to civil rights legislation, medicare and just about everything else that is progressive and forward-looking.

The issue in California is the real Reagan versus his stand-in who won the primary.

Vast Productivity Gains Seen In Faster, Cheaper Computers

The following is excerpted from "The Computer and Society," a special supplement to the New York Times produced by the American Federation of Information Processing Societies.

THE COMMON CONCEPT of the computer as a lightning-fast calculator is very incomplete. The computer is basically a device for processing information, whether it be in the form of numbers, words, pictures, sounds, symbols, or whatever.

Computers as an information processing tool enable man to record information in condensed form and facilitate the retrieval and processing of what has been recorded. Not only is the retrieval and processing speeded up and made less expensive, but many new and complex information processing tasks become feasible for the first time. The results are greater productivity from our nation's resources of capital and labor.

Let us first consider several general important trends related to computers and information processing.

First, computers have become significantly faster, smaller and less expensive. Compared with the computers of a decade ago, today's machines are about 100 times faster, their electronic portions 10 times smaller, and most important, the cost of carrying out a given information-processing task is as much as 1,000 times less expensive. These advances will probably be matched in the next decade.

Second, computing power is becoming available much the same as electricity and telephone service are today. Sometimes called information utilities, or computer utilities, such systems consist of a number of terminals, or input-output devices connected over communication links to a computer, which devotes a small amount of its time to each terminal in turn. Because the computer is so fast, it appears to each user that he has the machine's complete attention.

Third, the amount of computing power available in the United States has been doubling each year and should continue to do so. We have 1,000 times as much computing power available today as we did a decade ago and will probably have 1,000 times more ten years from now.

Nearly 30,000 computers worth about $8 billion are now operating in the U. S. They are processing information for banks, insurance companies, retail stores, airlines, industrial firms, universities and, of course the defense and space agencies and other branches of the government.

The computer is just beginning to make important contributions in the field of medical care. Hospital information systems are being installed to reduce the clerical load on doctors and nurses and to speed the flow of information. Since our nation is making a larger commitment to medical care at a time when the number of professionally trained medical personnel per thousand population is declining, we can obviously benefit from the increases in productivity that such computer systems can provide.

In preventive medicine programs of the 1970s, the computer should be able to digest facts about the medical status of individual patients (most of whom are healthy) and separate out those cases warranting the further attention of a doctor. Another important way in which computers will one day contribute to medical care will be through computer-based medical-record systems containing the medical history of each individual in a geographical region.

Education has most of the management and administrative problems of industry, and while education lags behind most of industry in computer utilization, it has begun to adopt computers in a major way. This will bring about better utilization of capital and personnel, including students.

IN THE NEAR FUTURE, teaching methods employing computers should make it possible to give students much more individual attention than is possible in the traditional classroom. Each student will work at his own pace and will not proceed to new material until he has mastered the old. This will not only help the slow learners but also develop the real potential of the gifted.

One of the fears that people have about computers is that they will depersonalize life by treating everyone in the same cold, calculating manner. Computers can, in fact, make personalized services more widely available.

Computers are accelerating the pace of technological change. People who find it difficult to adapt to change will find life less easy. As the tempo of change increases, men must adopt the view that education is a continuing process throughout life. Computers are likely to make the educational system much more efficient and tailored to the individual. If this does occur, it may well be the greatest achievement of the Twentieth Century.

The Beautification Bug Begins To Bite Even the Businessman

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

TO THE POLLEN COUNT, the hurricane warnings and the humidity level of the beginning summer season, add this interesting note: Lady Bird Johnson's beautification bug is really beginning to bite. Most of the penetration is little more than skin deep so far but some welts of responsibility are being raised, itching for action.

Morgan

Take, for example, the community of McLean, Va., just across the Potomac from the national capital, which is sometimes described as Washington's VIP bedroom suburb. John F. Kennedy used to live there in a big, unpretentious house, with a beautiful rolling pasture behind it. His brother, New York Sen. Robert Kennedy, now owns and lives in the same house, with his wife, Ethel, nine children and enough miscellaneous livestock to populate a zoo. Down the river a mile or so is a place where the late President's widow, Jacqueline, spent part of her girlhood, an estate called Merrywood which was barely saved from destruction in an ugly real estate promotion scandal which rocked the area three years ago. Nearby lives Interior Sec. Udall who played a key role in saving Merrywood by incorporating its wooded palisade landscape in a federal project to preserve the beauty—what's left of it—of the Potomac, Up the river a piece is the new home of Bill Moyers, Pres. Johnson's news secretary and adviser. Other VIPs abound.

With such a cluster of distinguished citizens you might think that McLean would be a show place. It is. It looks, as one of Washington's leading young architects, Avery Faulkner, put it, like something that had fallen out of the back end of a truck. His description drew bitter laughs and grim applause from several score residents who had gathered to spend two and a half sweltering hours in the non-air conditioned assembly room of a public school to see what might be done to stop the ruthless, shameful, extravagant uglification of McLean.

The shattering fact is that McLean—with a population of 35,000—is typical of all too many communities which are becoming scabrous "slurban" growth across the once-lovely face of this land. It isn't even officially a town. It just grew, as a convenience to that metal tyrant which holds most of the nation in thrall, the automobile. There are no sidewalks in downtown McLean but in a stretch of less than four blocks there are nine gas stations. The beautification group didn't quite know whether to laugh or cry when one aggressive young businessman proudly announced that he was about to make the ninth "the most beautiful service station in America," which McLean needs about as urgently as the Taj Mahal needs a neon sign and a hamburger stand in front of its minarets.

There was applause when spokesmen for supermarkets and drug chains promised that the asphalt desert around their sterile structures would be punctured here and there—at the sacrifice of some parking space—to nurture tiny oases of trees and shrubs. But there is a dangerous and painful contradiction here. These merchants are really trying, belatedly, to be civic-minded. But as was noted by Mrs. Johnson's consultant on beautification, a comely ex-mountain climber from Washington state, Mrs. Sharon Francis, planting petunias around a gas pump is not enough. And the First Lady's mail indicates people aren't going to settle for that, either.

FURTHERMORE, as Architect Faulkner warned, merchants' individual landscaping plans are not only woefully inadequate but defeat a coordinated concept. Here we approach the crux of the matter which was boldly handled by several participants in a planning-for-progress conference called by Washington Gov. Dan Evans in Seattle recently. There Rhode Island Gov. John Chafee suggested statewide zoning for land use may have to come. Robert F. Steadman, a government planning and management expert from the influential Committee for Economic Development, noted in Seattle that there are 80,000 local units of government in the U.S. to which half a million officials are elected. These he said must be drastically reduced for economy and efficiency.

Here McLean has an advantage. With no officials of its own, it turns to Fairfax County for its services. The trouble is the county is growing so fast, there is so much money to be made in greedy exploitation of growth that when McLean residents draw up a plan for orderly and graceful civic development, as they will, county officials themselves may not have developed a civilized, harmonius plan into which it will fit.

There is an encouraging sleeper in the bedroom of McLean: people are slowly discovering that planning is not creeping socialism, that business and beauty are not incompatible. Faulkner cited the fact that two huge oil companies were splitting business evenly in two competing gas stations at a crossroads in Ohio until one planted a big tree. Almost overnight its business quadrupled while the other's trade fell almost as much. Then the latter planted a bigger tree and soon its sales were topping its rival's by 20 percent. If when you get home tonight you find a tree missing, search out your friendly petrol dealer—and congratulate him for his enterprise. You might leave him a couple of acorns to boot.

Real Opportunity for Minorities Stressed as Final Rights Goal

ELIMINATION of discrimination is only a start toward the fulfillment of human rights for all Americans, an AFL-CIO spokesman said during a nationwide radio interview.

There must be real opportunities for Negroes, Puerto Ricans and other minority-group citizens to exercise those rights, Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights said on Labor News Conference.

Slaiman listed more jobs, better schools, improved wages and "union organization for millions of workers" as among the essentials. The objective should be to obtain "the result of equal opportunity, not merely the right of equal opportunity," he asserted.

He said that during the last several months both unions and government have become "more efficient" and have gained "know-how" in processing and settling discrimination complaints filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission pursuant to the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

"Local union cooperation and satisfaction in knowing how to get these things resolved, instead of causing trouble about them, points the way to not merely settlement of individual complaints, but toward the development of broader affirmative work that will head-off complaints," Slaiman suggested.

HE WARNED that "complacency is what we can least afford, especially in regard to the last days of this Congress and civil rights legislation."

The shooting of James Meredith, he said, has aroused pressure for passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1966. He added that "very often, in order to make progress, we have to depend upon the mistakes and the wrongdoings of our opponents."

Reporters questioning him on the weekly public service program, aired over the Mutual Broadcasting System, were James Millstone of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Roy McGhee, congressional reporter for United Press. Intl.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

MORE THAN A YEAR was spent in prettying up Ronald Reagan, dulling his 1964 image as an ardent, insistent right-wing exponent of Sen. Goldwater for the presidency and rehabilitating him as a merchandisable candidate for governor of California.

The results, as revealed in the Republican primary, must be conceded as impressive. He overwhelmed former Mayor George Christopher of San Francisco and promptly took off for the Altantic Seaboard, the Eisenhower farm at Gettysburg for smiling pictures with the former President, for meetings with Republican congressional leaders and GOP National Committee Chairman Ray E. Bliss.

The standard Reagan speech, when he began making the rounds of Republican luncheons and dinners last year, was an incredible tirade of assault about the sufferings of the people under the wicked federal government—a stream-of-consciousness mixture of irrelevant facts, half-facts, non-facts and anti-facts that Goldwater himself, the former Arizona senator, could scarcely have been guilty of.

But he is a TV actor, a former movie actor, a practiced entertainer at home on the platform or in the studio. The merchandisers won a California Senate race in 1964 by picking up a movie man, George Murphy, and persuading him that during the campaign he must play down his right-wing pro-Goldwater sentiments.

Reagan has more counts against him but the merchandisers were able to get him to throw in a few denunciations of extremist "kooks" during the campaign, and that and other factors won him the nomination to challenge incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown in November.

EXPERIENCED POLITICAL students believed a good many months ago that only one thing could check a Reagan nomination—a willingness by Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, who represents the established moderate-liberal tradition in California Republican politics, to sacrifice his Washington career and run for governor himself. This Kuchel was unwilling to do, although he supported Christopher and has been for years the party's greatest vote-winner.

So the right-wingers have a major California Republican candidate at last. No matter how much Reagan is refurbished by the soapsellers, it is perfectly obvious that he is totally different from GOP representatives such as Chief Justice Earl Warren, elected governor three times, and former Gov. Goodwin Knight as well as Kuchel.

The American Conservative Union is delighted by Reagan's nomination and there can be little misunderstanding of him among the "little old ladies in tennis shoes" who canvassed Los Angeles for Goldwater in 1964 and assured his presidential primary victory.

Brown, seeking election to a third term, knows very well that he is facing a hard battle.

FROM EVERY standpoint of public service—a successful program of expanding school and college systems, enlarging water supplies, building highways, improving social programs—Brown is conceded to be an outstanding governor.

Honest, unpretentious, he has administered the state's affairs creatively during a time when the population expanded enormously and the problems might otherwise have become overwhelming.

Brown's major election puzzle may not really be Reagan but the maverick mayor of Los Angeles, Samuel W. Yorty, nominally a Democrat who in the cauldron of his city's politics sometimes plays a perverse role. He supported Richard M. Nixon against John F. Kennedy in 1960, for example.

Yorty ran up a surprisingly large vote against Brown in the Democratic primary and promptly began laying down terms and conditions for the governor to meet.

Kuchel was absent when Reagan came to Washington and has not endorsed him for election. But neither has Yorty endorsed Brown.

The Brown-Reagan race must be rated as certain to be hard-fought, certain to be significant among the contests for governor in 35 states.

THERE MUST BE real opportunities for minority-group citizens before there is fulfillment of human rights for all Americans, Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights (center) told Roy McGhee of United Press. Intl. (left) and James Millstone of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on the AFL-CIO produced public service interview, Labor News Conference, aired nationwide each week over the Mutual radio network.

Labor Dept. Study Finds Evidence Poor Have to Pay More for Food

The suspicion of the poor that the food on their tables has cost them more than their wealthier neighbors would have had to pay has been found sound by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The companion suspicion that the quality and service they get are not up to the standards of stores in higher-income neighborhoods is equally sound, the BLS said on the basis of a study undertaken for the National Commission on Food Marketing.

Stores in low-income areas do not necessarily charge more for commodities of comparable quality and quantity, the BLS found. The principal reason the poor pay more is that they tend to buy many items in smaller lots, boosting the cost per unit, and thus cannot save by purchasing in larger amounts.

A secondary reason is that the large chain stores and big independents, with huge purchasing power that can be translated into lower retail prices, tend to bypass low-income sections in favor of areas where buying power is higher. This virtually leaves the field to the small independent store where, the BLS found, "prices are usually higher."

The study covered stores in high and low income areas of Washington, D.C.; New York City; Atlanta, Ga.; Chicago, Houston, Tex., and Los Angeles. Eighteen commodities were priced—flour, bread, steak, ground beef, pork chops, bacon, chicken, fresh and evaporated milk, margarine, eggs, grapefruit, lettuce, potatoes, canned peas, sugar, coffee and colas.

The BLS analyzed the prices and sizes it had dug up on flour, milk and sugar. It found that in higher-income neighborhoods the 5-pound sack of flour was bought most often while in lower-income sections the 2-pound sack was the most popular buy.

Costs Per Unit Analyzed

"The price per pound ranged from 14 percent higher in New York City to 35 percent higher in Chicago when purchased in 2-pound sacks rather than 5-pound sacks," the report said.

"Milk in half-gallon containers is priced for the Consumer Price Index; sales in quart containers were more frequent in a number of outlets in the low-income areas. When converted to a standard unit, consumers paid a premium ranging from less than 1 percent in Atlanta to 23 percent in Washington for purchasing in the quart sizes.

"Sugar was frequently sold in 2-pound packages rather than in 5-pound; the price per pound ranged from 13 percent higher in Atlanta to 39 percent higher than in Chicago when purchased in the smaller container."

The report noted that "stores located in low income areas tend to be somewhat less orderly and clean than those located in higher-income areas, and meats and produce do not appear as fresh." Selling prices are marked on most items in both neighborhoods, the BLS observed, with meat at a counter attended by a butcher the major exception.

Nearly all stores cash checks, but in low-income sections this may be restricted to payroll or government checks, it was learned.

Hours when stores were open varied more between cities than between areas in the same cities, the probers said, with independent stores—especially those in low-income neighborhoods — generally open more days a week and more hours each day.

Dr. George L. Brandow, executive director of the commission, said that "when the poor congregate in slums the market is higher." He said he saw no reason why the commission should propose legislation forcing chain stores to open up in low-income communities, but remarked that they "might tailor stores to fit the needs" of an area.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's special assistant for consumer affairs, said proposals for government action to move supermarkets into low-income neighborhoods merit consideration.

Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D-N.Y.), a commission member, said he was considering legislation which would offer a tax or other subsidy to chains opening stores in low-income neighborhoods.

The commission, which includes members of the House and Senate and is headed by Phil S. Gibson, has spent two years studying all phases of food marketing and is due to report to Congress by July 1.

40 Staffers Sharpen Skills On Bargaining

Madison, Wis.—Forty full-time union representatives returned to school for a week to sharpen their skills at the bargaining table and in arbitration proceedings.

The 1966 AFL-CIO Collective Bargaining Institute, held on the University of Wisconsin campus, drew its faculty from both university and trade union ranks. It was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Departments of Education and Research and by the School for Workers.

Students, with years of union experience to draw on in the classes and workshops, put in an average 12-hour day. A typical day would begin with a session on "the collective bargaining agreement" conducted by Otto Pragan, AFL-CIO assistant director of education, continue with a "labor and government" program led by one of six guest experts, break for lunch and return for a session on "preparing for collective bargaining," chaired by Rudolph Oswald, an AFL-CIO economist.

Participants would then have a choice of workshops on negotiations, ranging from calculating fringe costs to mediation procedures, or on arbitration, including preparing and presenting a mock arbitration case. Five dinner or evening programs were on the schedule.

Students for this year's program came from the Communications Workers, American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, Operating Engineers, Papermakers & Paperworkers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Laborers, Flint Glass Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Meat Cutters, Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, Brewery Workers, Atomic Projects Metal Trades Council and Milwaukee Central Labor Council.

Unity Plan Urged For 3 Rail Unions

fect contracts with the railroads and would leave traditional craft lines undisturbed.

Unification discussions got under way last July 1, with one officer from each union assigned to develop the basic unity proposal. Details of the consolidation, it is planned, will be worked out after ratification.

The unity plan was called by the three presidents "a significant step forward in preparing the existing organizations for the demands of the future."

"We believe a new organization can offer a high level of representation for men in the railroad operating crafts while achieving important economies," they added.

Other railroad operating brotherhoods are the Railroad Trainmen, an AFL-CIO affiliate, and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Federationist Article Reports:

Union Contracts Show Gain In Severance Pay Clauses

An increasing number of union contracts call for severance pay when a worker's job is abolished, and an article in the June issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist analyzes this trend.

Loss of a job, the article points out, involves much more than the change of an employer—even if the worker is fortunate enough to find another job without weeks or months of delay.

It means the loss of seniority and rights based on length of service towards a better pension, a longer vacation and protection against frequent layoffs.

"The purpose of severance pay is to compensate at least in part for this loss," observes the author of the article, Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. He describes severance pay, sometimes referred to as termination pay or dismissal allowance, as "an earned equity accruing to the employe over his years of productive service."

There are other union protections against loss of job, Oswald notes, and severance pay is not a substitute for these. Advance notice of job cuts, vested pensions, early retirement, retraining rights, transfer and moving rights and provisions for job reduction through attrition are examples.

A major reason for the increased interest in severance plans, the articles notes, is "the threatened or actual impact of technological change."

Mergers and plant shutdowns are also among the conditions which can cause the loss of large numbers of jobs. A severance pay provision was included in the 1936 "Washington Agreement" accepted by railroad unions in 1936 as one of a group of protections for mergers.

Severance pay has been a standard provision in the contracts of some unions for many years. The Newspaper Guild, for example, has such clauses in 222 of its 225 agreements.

The growth in severance plans is reflected in the Labor Dept.'s periodic studies of major collective bargaining agreements—those covering 1,000 or more workers.

A 1944 study showed only five percent of such agreements containing severance pay provisions.

The percentage had climbed only to 8 percent in 1950, but jumped to 16 percent by 1955—and the 16 percent covered about 25 percent of all workers under major contracts.

In 1963, the Labor Dept. found severance pay provisions in 30 percent of all major contracts, covering 40 percent of the workers under such agreements.

Five unions were parties to almost half the plans in the Labor Dept. study — the Steelworkers, Auto Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Communications Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Severance pay plans vary greatly, although a common formula is one or two weeks of pay for each year of service. Most plans specify that a severance allowance will be paid in the event of plant closing, transfer of operations and similar conditions of job loss. Others specify lack of work, retirement without eligibility for pension, dismissal for any reason "beyond the worker's control" or simply for "discharge." In a number of cases, employes are offered severance pay as an alternative to transfer to a lesser-paying job, moving to another locality, or accepting a layoff with recall rights.

Benefits tend to increase with length of service—a plan might provide one week's severance for each of the first five years of service, going to two weeks a year for an intermediate period and three weeks for long service.

The Federationist article also discusses "problem areas" including taxation of lump sum benefits and eligibility for unemployment compensation, which varies from state to state.

And it concludes that each union bargaining committee must judge whether money is better spent on severance pay or on other kinds of assistance to displaced employes.

Striking Professors Picket Commencement

Jamaica, N. Y.—Striking St. John's University faculty members, most of them in academic robes, picketed the university's commencement exercises in one of the largest demonstrations since the walkout began Jan. 3 over the firing of 31 teachers.

About 150 pickets, including other members of the United Federation of College Teachers, Local 1460 of the AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers, marched at the main gate. About 60 men and women were at two side gates.

2-Year-Old-Picket

Among the pickets was two-year-old Evelyn McVeigh, whose father, Frank McVeigh, was among those dismissed. She carried a sign reading "St. John's Fired My Daddy." Other signs bore messages such as "Good Teachers Should Be Rehired and Not Fired."

The faculty members lost their posts after pressing for a greater voice for professors and instructors in the university's academic affairs. The university, giving "unprofessional conduct" as the reason for the oustings, has rejected all efforts to conciliate or arbitrate the dispute, although the unon has had a standing offer since the first day of the walkout.

The American Association of University Professors, which investigated the dispute, did not censure the university, but it said that in its history "perhaps no violations of academic freedom and tenure have more profoundly shocked the academic community" than those found in its St. John's probe.

St. John's, largest Catholic university in the country, will cut its incoming freshman class from 2,400 to 1,800 students, according to the Rev. Joseph T. Tinnelly, special counsel to the trustees. He said the decision was made when it was feared the school might not be able to staff its faculty, and that when no difficulty was encountered, the cut was retained "to raise the standards" of the university. Dr. Israel Kugler, UFCT president, said the cut was made because of inability to hire faculty members.

In a separate action the local filed suit in the New York County State Supreme Court to compel the university to withdraw and cease circulating its catalogue for the coming academic year because it lists as faculty members 24 strikers who also are asking $100,000 in damages each.

The listing, the complaint claimed, "greatly injured" each striker "in his or her reputation," and "irreparably injured" his or her professional standing.

ACWA Member Is Worker-Father

New York—Ralph M. DeGirolomo, for 27 years a member of Clothing Workers Local 710 in Tyrone, Pa., was named Worker Father of the Year and presented with the George Washington Medal of the National Father's Day Committee at a ceremony in City Hall.

DeGirolomo, 53, is a pattern marker on "Big Yank" work clothes for the Reliance Manufacturing Co. division of the Puritan Fashions Corp. and has been active in union and civic affairs.

Factory Sales, Profits Leap in 1st Quarter

firms showed little change from the high level of earnings in the year earlier quarter, while primary iron and steel companies reported a 16 percent decline," the report said,

"If the latter two groups are excluded, after-tax profits of the remaining durable goods industries show a gain of 32 percent from the first quarter of 1965 to the same period this year."

Non-durable goods industries reported an overall rise of 15 percent in after-tax earnings. The largest gains—31 percent—were scored by producers of dairy and paper products. Rises of over 20 percent were listed by the apparel, printing, leather and alcoholic beverage industries. Tobacco and textile firms showed the smallest increases—5 percent and 7 per cent, respectively.

Compared to the final quarter of 1965, the report said, the first quarter 1966 figures were slightly lower because of seasonal influences. However, after adjustment for seasonal patterns, sales and profits for the January-March period were "up substantially from the final quarter of 1965," it noted.

The government reported that manufacturing corporations paid out $3 billion in dividends in the first quarter of 1966 compared with $2.7 billion in the same period last year.

Internal funds—earnings retained for use in the business and depreciation charges—totaled $8.3 billion in the quarter, a rise of 13 percent over the first quarter of 1965. Retained earnings were $600 million higher and depreciation $400 million more than for the same period a year earlier, the report added.

Brown Re-Elected President of ITU

Colorado Springs—Pres. Elmer Brown of the Typographical Union was re-elected for a fifth term in a nationwide election, the ITU announced.

N.J. Convention Rallies Support for Labor Bills

Newark, N. J.—Union members in New Jersey were urged by delegates to the sixth State AFL-CIO convention to "deluge" their representatives in the Legislature with telegrams and letters urging enactment of labor-sponsored bills which are in danger of being sidetracked.

Speakers chided the trade unionists for not demonstrating their backing for pending measures such as a new minimum wage setup, an unemployment compensation bill containing a labor disputes section, and another giving collective bargaining rights to public employes.

Pres. Vincent J. Murphy's report to the 1,500 delegates warned that the liberal cause in the state may be "very seriously injured" by "crafty gerrymandering" in congressional redistricting.

Rep. Paul J. Krebs (D) of the 12th District, which includes part of Newark and some suburban areas, was regarded as in particular danger. Krebs, a member of the Auto Workers, spoke to the convention. The delegates then adopted a resolution calling on Gov. Richard J. Hughes and the Legislature to leave the district, with a population of 362,000, as it is and to change smaller districts instead.

"To do otherwise," the resolution said, "would be to constitute a disservice to the labor movement in New Jersey and to the working people who have not, until very recently, been properly represented in the halls of Congress . . . by members of their own movement."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany supported Krebs in messages to Murphy and Hughes.

Vote Drive Stressed

Federation Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, declaring that "we're not ready to turn Congress over to our enemies," urged the delegates to help "change historic trends through registration and getting out the vote" in the coming off-year elections.

Schnitzler described the growth of the AFL-CIO since merger and promised state AFL-CIO officers his cooperation in achieving full affiliation of local unions in the state.

Failure of many locals to affiliate led to the adoption of two constitutional amendments. One requires that delegates from local or area central bodies belong to affiliated local unions in order to qualify as delegates to state conventions. The other restricts membership on the state executive board to representatives of unions which have two-thirds of their New Jersey locals, or 50 percent of their membership, affiliated to the state body.

Murphy and State Sec.-Treas. Charles H. Marciante attacked the recently-adopted state sales tax, which Hughes defended in a speech at the convention banquet as the only course open to him.

Other resolutions supported the dues checkoff for public employes, the situs picketing bill, consumer legislation, equal job opportunity, the 35-hour week, outlawing of ex parte injunctions and increased civil rights action by state, county and local labor groups.

Following the showing of a film on the Kingsport (Tenn.) Press strike, the delegates contributed $607 to a fund for the strikers which was boosted to $1,000 by an additional donation from the state body.

Unions Charge GE Seeking 'Deal' With UE

refusal to bargain, declaring that the union has the right to choose its own negotiating team and the company can't interfere in the choice of negotiators.

GE retaliated with a charge that the eight unions are illegally trying to force national bargaining, even though seven of the unions have only local contracts covering various GE plants.

The eight-union group said in a statement:

"It was a collusive deal between GE and UE in 1963 that brought about the substandard pension, insurance and vacation provisions with which its workers are now saddled, and the miserly wage increase which has already been wiped out by rising living costs. That GE-UE agreement was signed on the company's terms a week after it was proposed and at least a month before the contract expired."

The cooperating unions, in addition to IUE, are the Auto Workers, Machinists, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Technical Engineers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers and Flint Glass Workers.

Senate Action Urged:

Cut in Rights Funds Assailed as 'Tragic'

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to restore a deep cut made by the House in the civil rights enforcement budget of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the $927,000 budget cut—a reduction of more than 20 percent—would be "a tragic mistake."

He told members of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee handling the bill that the cut would greatly hamper enforcement of non-discrimination policies in schools, hospitals and other federally-aided programs. There is already, he warned, "too much paper compliance" based on "a perfunctory examination of forms and too little on-the-spot checking."

Biemiller stressed that "full and honest compliance" with non-discrimination in federally-assisted programs "is essential to avoid outbreaks of frustration and anger by those who continue to suffer the burden of discrimination. "It should have the support of Congress," he added.

The House cut was a prime target of resolutions passed at the recent White House Conference on civil rights. Delegates described it as "a particularly disquieting example of the tendency to weaken enforcement" of civil rights laws "by failing to provide enough funds." The conference resolution

Biemiller noted that the $927,000 cut would mean eliminating 70 full-time civil rights compliance positions in the department and would greatly curtail studies of the "complex and difficult" problems of school segregation in the North.

On another legislative front, a House Judiciary subcommittee approved four of the five sections of the administration's civil rights bill, but left it up to the full committee to decide on the issue of housing discrimination.

Sections approved are aimed at barring discrimination in selection of juries, speeding desegregation of schools and public facilities, and strengthening federal laws against racial violence.

The proposed ban on housing discrimination has run into heavy Republican opposition and has been attacked by Senate GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill).

Civil rights groups are pressing for early action by the House committee to overcome two obstacles ahead—a likely House Rules Committee bottleneck which would require use of the "21-day rule" to get the bill to the House floor in August, and the threat of a filibuster when the bill reaches the Senate.

LABOR'S GOALS are spelled out for the 14th annual seminar on Government in Action of Hunter College High School, New York, at a meeting in AFL-CIO headquarters. Speaking is John D. Connors, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health. On either side, waiting to speak, are Assistant COPE Dir. Joseph Rourke (left) and Assistant Civil Rights Dir. William E. Pollard.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On 'Truth-in-Packaging'

The major attempt to gut the "truth-in-packaging" bill recently passed by the Senate came in an amendment by Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.) which would have eliminated all authority to limit the number of sizes and weights in which a commodity can be packaged. There would have been nothing left of the bill except a clear labeling requirement.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the Cotton amendment. Fifty-three senators supported labor's position and voted to keep the truth-in-packaging bill intact. Thirty-two senators voted against truth-in-packaging by supporting the amendment.

Hollings Wins South Carolina Primary Fight

turned back two sharp challenges to incumbent Democratic House members and in addition won a more than 2-1 victory for a $195 million bond issue that had been beaten in 1962.

In the 2nd Congressional District Rep. Barratt O'Hara, at 84 the oldest member of the House, won renomination by 2,600 votes out of 65,000 against State Rep. Abner J. Mikva, an independent liberal with strong appeal among Jewish, Negro and University of Chicago voters.

Rep. William L. Dawson, veteran Negro chairman of the House Government Operations Committee, won more easily in the 1st District against two younger Negro challengers, rolling up a 42,000 votes to 25,000 for Fred D. Hubbard.

Percy is recognized as a formidable Republican candidate in Illinois, but Douglas has substantial personal strength with outstate voters as well as the traditional Democratic power of the Chicago organization.

South Carolina primaries, despite generally light voter participation, confirmed the emergence of a Republican effort to combat traditional one-party Democratic control.

Incumbent Sen. Strom Thurmond, who switched parties in 1964, will seek a second full term against Democrat Bradley Morrah, a Greenville state senator who defeated John Bolt Culbertson for nomination.

The GOP fielded another former Democrat, Marshall J. Parker, to challenge Hollings for the Senate in November.

Republicans also named a candidate for governor, Joseph O. Rodgers, to run against McNair, who was nominated for a full term to succeed himself.

Refugee Aid Group Elects 7 Unionists

New York—The Intl. Rescue Committee, Inc., has named seven labor representatives to its board of directors. They are:

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers; Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes; Vice Pres. Charles S. Zimmerman of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Vice Pres. B. F. McLaurin, Sleeping Car Porters; Jacob Sheinkman, Clothing Workers' legal counsel; and Irving J. Brown, AFL-CIO international affairs representative.

IAM Hits Proposals For Airline Contracts

A Machinists wage policy committee, representing 35,000 airline mechanics and ground crews, served notice on five airlines that the recommendations of a presidential emergency board "give no sound basis" for a contract settlement.

The policy committee is made up of the IAM's general chairmen on United, TVA, Eastern, Northwest and National airlines.

After reviewing the board's recommendations for a 42-month contract, the union leaders said they were "more than disappointed" with proposals dealing with wages, contract duration, denial of the union request for a cost-of-living escalator clause and other issues in dispute. They charged that some of the board's conclusions were "based on 19th century concepts."

Union and management negotiators met for two days at the Labor Dept., with much of the time devoted to obtaining clarifications of emergency board proposals from the board members—Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), Harvard Prof. Richard Neustadt and David Ginsburg, Washington attorney.

National talks were then recessed to permit separate negotiations with each airline on local issues.

Under the Railway Labor Act, the union is barred from striking until July 5, 30 days after the report of the emergency board.

The presidential board had recommended increases totaling 48 cents an hour for top-skilled mechanics over the 42-month contract period, and 34 cents for other IAM members. It proposed some vacation and holiday improvements and a reduction of the number of steps between the starting and top rates for each job.

As a substitute for the union's request for an escalator clause, the board proposed that the union be given the right to re-open the wage provisions "if, by December 1967, the cost of living since December 1966 has increased more than 1 percent over the average annual increase in the consumer price index during the five-year period, 1962 through 1966."

The board also recommended against a union request that four airlines assume the full cost of pension plans. National Airlines already has a non-contributory pension system.

IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller and Vice Pres. Joseph Ramsey voiced the union's dissatisfaction with the proposals and urged management to join in active negotiations in an effort to work out an agreement "before time runs out."

Textile Workers Move Washington Office

The legislative office of the Textile Workers Union of America has been moved to the Philip Murray Building at 1126 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington D.C., 20036, Legislative Dir. William M. DuChessi announced. The telephone number is 202 (area code) 233-4877.

Curran, Wall Lead Balloting In NMU Vote

New York—Joseph Curran was re-elected to his 13th term as president of the National Maritime Union and Shannon J. Wall won a contest for secretary-treasurer.

The voting took place between Apr. 1 and May 31 in 32 NMU port headquarters in the United States and overseas, supervised by the Honest Ballot Association.

Curran, who was unopposed on the ballot, received 16,537 votes. A write-in candidate polled only 20 votes.

Wall, who has been a vice president of the NMU since 1958, defeated James M. Morrissey, 11,205 to 5,875. David M. Ramos, incumbent secretary-treasurer, did not run for re-election.

In a contest for three vice presidential posts, Mel Barisic and Rick Miller were re-elected and James J. Martin won the third spot. The winners outpolled Joseph Padilla by a margin of nearly 2-1.

Three national representatives were elected without opposition—Robert Nesbitt and Peter Bocker, incumbents, and Leo Strassman, former NMU agent in the port of Baltimore.

Medicare Set to Start On July 1

By Gervase N. Love

Nineteen million Americans who have reached 65 will be eligible to have most of their hospital bills paid beginning July 1 as the long-sought medicare program becomes effective.

About 17.2 million of them who have signed up for the voluntary supplemental plan will have a large part of their medical bills paid, also beginning July 1.

Medicare, the fruit of a decade-long fight by organized labor and liberals, was one of the forward-looking pieces of legislation that built the reputation of the 89th Congress as a socially-aware body.

Enacted last year, as an amendment to the Social Security Act, it is a program to make "golden" indeed the declining years of men and women 65 and older by removing the threat of crushing hospital and medical bills at a time when they usually pile their highest.

The benefits are divided into two sections—the basic plan, which covers hospitalization and related costs and for which practically all persons 65 and over are eligible; and the voluntary supplemental plan, for which persons 65 must apply and which helps pay for certain physicians' and dentists' services, home health services and additional medical services.

The basic program covers nearly all men and women who are now 65 or who reach that age before 1968. For those not covered by social security, protection will be financed by general revenues. Excepted are most federal employes and some aliens. After 1968, coverage will be limited to beneficiaries under the Social Security Act's pension provisions or the Railroad Retirement Act.

The plan is financed by payment of 35 one-hundredths of 1 percent of a worker's annual earnings up to a maximum of $6,600 a year, added to the regular Social Security levy. Collections began last Jan. 1, with the employer paying a similar amount; the rate is due to rise gradually to a maximum

House Passes Modest Bill:

Realistic Jobless Aid Goal of Senate Fight

A modest—but inadequate—unemployment compensation bill passed the House, 374-10, under a "no amendment" rule, and the AFL-CIO looked to the Senate to add on "realistic, meaningful federal standards."

The House bill's chief provision is an expansion of coverage to an additional 3.5 million workers by including establishments with fewer than four employes and nonprofit organizations. It also provides an additional 13 weeks coverage for workers who exhaust their state benefits without finding a job—but only when unemployment, either in the state or nationally, reaches recession levels.

Missing are the key provisions sought by the AFL-CIO and the Administration, including:

- Jobless benefits of at least 50 percent of a worker's previous wage, up to a ceiling of half the statewide average wage, rising to two-thirds of the state average in 1971.
- An additional 26 weeks of federal benefits for persons with a steady work history who have exhausted state benefits.
- Extension of coverage to 5 million additional workers, including farm workers.

The labor-backed bill also would have raised the taxable wage base to finance unemployment benefits from the present minimum of $3,000 to $6,600 in steps. The House bill would raise the base to $3,900, to $4,200 in 1972.

The Administration bill would have limited disqualification penalties states could impose—a major issue with labor, since the tendency in recent years has been for states to accompany modest increases in the ceiling on bene-

$1.60 Wage Floor Date Moved Up

A Senate Labor subcommittee has voted to move up the timetable for a $1.60 minimum wage, rejecting a stretchout amendment adopted by the House last month.

Subcommittee Chairman Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) won 8-3 approval of his motion to bring 30 million workers up to a $1.60 minimum wage on Feb. 1, 1968, the date originally in the House bill. The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the delay to 1969 which resulted from a "compromise" amendment suggested by Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.).

Before adopting the Yarborough motion, the subcommittee beat down an attempt by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) to postpone the $1.60 wage step even further—to Feb. 1, 1970.

As the subcommittee continued its section-by-section consideration of the House bill, it:

- Approved a labor-supported amendment extending overtime protection to some 65,000 operating employes of local transit companies. The House version would have given them minimum wage coverage only—without a ceiling on hours of straight-time work.
- Adopted a labor-opposed amendment which would have the effect of limiting overtime coverage for seasonal agricultural processing workers. The Senate version would be an improvement over present law, but a backward step from the House-passed bill.

It would permit seasonal agricultural processing employers to extend the basic workweek during a 20-week "season" as compared with 10 weeks in the House bill. During this period employes could be worked up to 10 hours a day and 52 hours a week at straight-time pay.

'Milestone' Pact Signed By Schenley

Los Angeles—A milestone labor agreement providing a minimum pay scale of $1.75 hourly for farm workers, a union hiring hall, dues checkoff and a union shop was signed here June 21.

The one-year pact, between Schenley Industries, Inc., and the independent National Farm Workers Association, covers some 500 Schenley employes at their vineyards in the Delano area.

It is expected to pave the way for a sweeping revolution on the farm labor front in California and elsewhere in farming centers across the nation.

Grape Strike Impact

Its immediate impact will hit hardest in the Delano area where several hundred grape workers have touched the conscience of the nation in a nine-month strike against deplorable wages and working conditions.

William L. Kircher, national organizing director of the AFL-CIO, who played a key role in negotiating the pact, hailed the agreement as a "significant breakthrough and the first contract of its kind anywhere in the farm industry."

"The Schenley-NFWA contract does many things," Kircher said. "It gives farm workers a firm collective bargaining base and it dramatically demonstrates real union accomplishment.

"It sets a model upon which other farm workers can look with understanding that 'it can be done.'

"And it provides the opportunity for the structure of an actual ongoing union operation within the agricultural industry.

Meany Warning Stresses Medicare Rights Proviso

A warning that medicare patients will not be reimbursed for expenses incurred in hospitals not in compliance with the desegregation requirements of the Civil Rights Act has been sent by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the officers of about 200 state and local central labor bodies in 14 southern and border states.

Included with his letter was a list of hospitals in each area which have qualified.

Meany pointed out that the ineligibility of some hospitals for reimbursement "has important implications for trade union members, their elder relatives, retirees or any citizen of the community requiring hospitalization, as well as for industry-trade union welfare funds and collective bargaining agreements."

"Unless a hospital has been certified," he reiterated, "any patient using it is in danger of not being reimbursed under medicare. I suggest that citizens in your community, especially your own members, would be well served if they knew which hospitals were safe for them to use.

"It would also be in your interest if responsible community leaders like yourself would check with the non-certified hospitals as to whether they are doing what is necessary to become certified, and if you urged them to take the necessary steps to insure compliance."

The proportion of hospitals certified to receive payments when medicare goes into effect July 1 is substantially higher in the North than in most parts of the South. All of Maine's 64 hospitals, for example, are eligible for reimbursement, while only 19 of Mississippi's 132 institutions had qualified as of June 17.

AFGE Wins Unit of 15,000 At Air Base

The Government Employes have won exclusive bargaining rights for 15,000 civilian employes of the Robins Air Force Base in Georgia.

AFGE Lodge 987 swept the vote by a margin of nearly 9-1 in one of the biggest union representation elections ever held among federal workers. The count was 7,144 to 803 "no union" votes.

National Pres. John F. Griner termed the election victory "the greatest in the history of the AFGE."

The election followed a massive organizing drive by the AFGE local, which had only 318 members early in 1965. It built its dues-paying membership to 5,200 by election day,

Training Plan Breaks Dead-End Job Barrier

New York—Ninety-one hotel workers who had nothing to look forward to but dead-end jobs for the rest of their lives have been given new hope and new opportunity by their union and their employers.

They have completed eight months of combined on-the-job and classroom training that has qualified them to step up from the industry's lowest-paying jobs—such as maids, kitchen helpers, elevator operators and housemen—into better-paying white collar classifications such as food checker and cashier, front office cashier, room clerk, night auditor, telephone operator and floor housekeeper.

And most of them have already been slotted into employment suited to their new capabilities.

The training project was sponsored by the New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council, made up of AFL-CIO unions, and the Hotel Association of New York as part of a joint program to equalize employment opportunities. It was financed under the Federal Manpower Development & Training Act.

The upgrading course consisted of six classes—one for each of the higher job classifications—which began last October and were completed early this month with the presentation of graduation certificates at a ceremony in the Americana Hotel. About two-thirds of the graduates were Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

1963 Survey the Start

The idea goes back to a survey the union made in 1963 which showed that while Negroes and Puerto Ricans held more than 40 percent of the jobs in the industry here, only a handful were in white collar categories.

When negotiations opened up the following year, the union and the employers agreed at once on equal job opportunities for all employes, including the opportunity to qualify for advancement, with first consideration in filling better-paying jobs given workers already employed in hotels.

The first batch of trainees was selected by a union-industry committee on the basis of interviews and tests conducted by the State Labor Dept. A by-product of the search was establishment of special classes, still continuing, for those who had qualified in all respects except adequate English and arithmetic.

The classroom instruction was given evenings in union headquarters. Prof. Salvator Calanese of New York Community College was in charge.

Opportunity Welcomed

The chance for advancement was particularly welcomed by Mrs. Helen Heyward, the mother of four children, who literally watched her future disappear when the New Weston Hotel, where she ran an elevator, was torn down. She is now a telephone operator at the Americana.

"I'm very glad I had the opportunity to take that training," she said. "Time seemed to be running out for me. Now I feel secure and I enjoy the work."

Typical was the reaction of Juan Hernandez, who jumped from houseman to front office cashier at the Taft Hotel after taking the union-management training.

"The future," he said, "looks better than ever before."

Longshoremen Win 80 Cents in Canada

Montreal, Que.—A wage increase of 80 cents an hour over two years ended a strike of 4,200 members of the Longshoremen that had tied up shipping in the Quebec ports of Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers.

The settlement, which included a promise by the Shipping Federation of Canada that it will not press a demand for a cut in the size of work gangs, provides for 40 cents an hour retroactive to last Jan. 1; 15 cents on Jan. 1, 1967, and 25 cents on May 1, 1967.

Mrs. Vorse Dies; Labor Reporter

Provincetown, Mass. — Mary Heaton Vorse, veteran labor reporter and author who wrote a definitive history of the beginnings of the CIO, died here at 84.

Beginning in 1912, Mrs. Vorse was involved in and covered the major labor struggles of the century including strikes at Lawrence, Mass., Paterson, N.J., the Mesabe, Minn., Iron Range, the steel struggle of 1919, Passaic, N.J., Gastonia, N.C., the 1931 Kentucky miners' battles and the rise of the CIO—rubber, auto, steel, etc.

From a conservative New England upbringing, she traveled the world and served as a war correspondent in Europe in World War I. She wrote 14 books, including the story of the rise of the CIO, "Labor's New Millions."

End Waste In Manpower, LBJ Urges

The Administration is moving on three separate fronts to stem "a very serious waste of manpower" so that the nation's full human resources can be put to work, Pres. Johnson announced.

His views on manpower policy came at the swearing-in ceremony at the White House of Stanley H. Ruttenberg as assistant secretary of labor for manpower. The President called him "the best possible man to do this very important job."

Briefly reviewing the current economic situation and the unemployment picture, the President said "I don't believe there is really a manpower shortage in this country today. There is a very serious waste of manpower," and the job is to "stop the waste of the human potential."

Management and labor must recognize, he said, that the "public interest in manpower policy is as important now as price policy and wage policy. I cannot direct this, but I am going to try to encourage it. I am very hopeful that business and labor will respond."

The three areas of concern, the President said, are:

- Improved research to show why people are out of work, not just how many are unemployed. He asked Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to make changes in the unemployment reports to reflect this factor as well as where remaining unemployment exists and the extent of under-employment and "involuntary non-participation in the work force."
- A wider manpower inventory in the 5,000 census tract areas with the greatest unemployment.
- A report by Commerce Sec. John Connor on manpower in the construction industry. This industry, the President said, has reports of the most serious manpower shortages and also the second highest reported annual unemployment rate.

Johnson noted that Ruttenberg has been "an architect of America's manpower policy. Now, as assistant secretary of labor for manpower, he will be one of its master builders."

Abel Joins Labor Unit On U.S. Savings Bonds

Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers has been confirmed by Sec. of the Treasury Henry H. Fowler as a member of the National Labor Committee for U.S. Savings Bonds.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is chairman of the committee.

Bell Contracts Up:

CWA Scores Gains In Members, Funds

By John M. Barry

St. Louis—The Communications Workers will enter major negotiations with the Bell telephone system this year strengthened by a surge in membership that has added 30,000 to the union's rolls in the past year—a gain of 10 percent.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, in his keynote address to the union's 28th annual convention here, said the sharp membership increase was a direct result of a new determination to expand organizing. He recalled that the 1965 convention had set a goal of 750,000 CWA members by 1970 and predicted that the goal would be reached "because so many in this convention have already committed themselves."

Adopting the theme, "change and growth," Beirne declared that CWA and the labor movement are "a force for constructive change" whose record of achievements "gives the lie" to attacks from "the anti-labor crowd, the right-to-work crowd, and the Birchers."

Beirne, current president of the United Community Funds & Councils of America, cited labor's strong support of local Community Chest and United Fund drives, for the Red Cross, and for such community service projects as CWA's own "Hi Mom" program of family telephone calls to servicemen overseas.

"Are we working for selfish purposes?" he asked.

New Support Cited

In another area of change, he noted that forward-looking programs long advocated by organized labor for the benefit of all citizens are now beginning to draw support from a broad cross-section of national leaders. He gave as an example the report of the National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress which advocated among other things:

- A nationwide system of free public education for two years past high school and assurance that "no qualified student should be deprived of education at any level because of his family's lack of financial resources."
- Congressional action to examine "wholly new approaches to the problem of income maintenance" for persons of inadequate means, to assure a minimum reservoir of buying power.
- Establishment of a national planning body made up of distinguished leaders with diverse backgrounds and "devoted to a continuing discussion of national goals."

Beirne, who along with A. J. Hayes and Walter P. Reuther represented labor on the 14-member automation commission, called its report "a blueprint for how America could, and should, adjust to the problems of automation, a blueprint for change and growth."

Turning to the forthcoming Bell System negotiations, the CWA president charged that management "has made clear it would like to strangle CWA with a 3.2 guideline," a reference to the 3.2 percent limit on wage increases recommended by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

A roar of applause from the 2,000 delegates, visitors and guests greated Beirne's declaration that "we shall not be bound by that 3 decimal point 2. We want more. We need more. We deserve more."

'Easy' Settlement Wanted

He voiced the hope of "an easy, fair, peaceful settlement" and said it could be achieved "if management will recognize the justice of our proposals."

A 96-page report of the CWA executive board, delivered by vice Pres. Glen E. Watts, pointed out that the union's three-year contracts with the Bell System will be up for renegotiation on all points. It noted that major goals set forth by the CWA national collective bargaining policy committee are topped by a substantial wage increase and a reduction in pay differentials among towns and areas to no more than six nationwide "wage bands," with a difference between bands of no more than $4.

Among non-wage objectives are fully-paid life and health insurance, improved pensions, a 7-hour day for operators and elimination of oppressive overtime practices.

The executive board report said that most of the gain in membership since 1965 had occurred through the emphasis on internal organizing in existing units. The growth also led to the addition of 66 new bargaining units during the year, the report said.

Bargaining for 1966 contracts will begin in a few days, with CWA seeking new agreements covering Western Electric telephone installers.

Sec. Treas. William A. Smallwood told the delegates that the CWA is in the best financial condition in its history, with net assets of $13.6 million and a defense fund totaling more than $6.5 million.

House Vote Assures duPont Estate Breakup

The duPont Estate, a Florida octopus that controls the struck Florida East Coast Railway, a vast industrial empire and a network of 30 banks will have to cut off some of its tentacles under a bill passed by Congress.

The House accepted unanimously the Senate version of an amendment to the Bank Holding Company Act which strips out a special exemption given the duPont Estate in 1956 on the ground that it was a charitable trust.

Closing of the loophole means that the estate will have to divest itself either of its banking or non-banking enterprises.

The original House bill would also have ended a long-standing exemption from the Holding Company Act for labor and agricultural organizations—a provision put into the bill on the House floor last year in an evident effort to kill the measure. But the Senate dropped that provision and the House—on the motion of Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.)—agreed unanimously to accept the Senate changes without going to conference.

The duPont Estate, one of two enterprises affected by the legislation, will have five years to meet the conditions of the law.

The Railway Labor Executives' Association and the AFL-CIO strongly supported the legislation.

In Two Areas:

TWUA Sets Drive To Close Wage Gaps

Montreal, Que. — The Textile Workers Union of America, strengthened by organizing breakthroughs in the past two years, set as a major target the closing of one wage gap, and the narrowing of another.

Delegates to the union's 14th biennial convention voted unanimously to make abolition of the U.S.-Canadian wage differential in the textile industry a major bargaining goal of the TWUA. The resolution was adopted as one of the convention's first orders of business after a welcoming speech by Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Claude Jodoin.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock also called for the closing of another wage differential in his keynote speech—the gap between textile wages and pay scales of other manufacturing industries.

The textile industry is no longer "depressed," Pollock said, citing the excuse long used for lagging wages. It is now "a thoroughly modern, highly efficient and impressively profitable industry" which can afford to provide wages and fringes comparable to other enterprises, he held.

"Instead of burdening us with wage guideposts," he said, "this is the time to start narrowing the wage differential."

Pollock called on industry management to match its modernization of equipment "by modernizing its labor relations, as well."

The TWUA "is on the move," Pollock told the delegates.

'Best' Two Years of Growth

The period since the last convention, he said, has been "the best two years of growth TWUA has experienced in the last 10 years." As of March, when the convention report went to press, 150 new plants had been organized, with 14,100 workers—with an additional 39 plants and 6,700 workers brought into TWUA as the result of last year's merger with the Hosiery Workers.

Since then, Pollock said, TWUA has won bargaining rights in 23 more plants with 4,500 workers including three "particularly notable" victories:

- At Montgomery Mills in Pennsylvania, with 1,275 workers.
- At Fieldale Mills in Virginia, with 1,150 workers.
- At two Canadian plants of the Bruck Mills chain, with 1,100 workers.

Progress has been made in "the anti-union fortress" of the South, Pollock said, with prospects of more to come. But he stressed that "the firing of pro-union workers and the blacklist are still standard tools in the massive anti-union conspiracy which is part and parcel of the industrial way of life in that region."

Pollock urged the convention to call on Pres. Johnson "in the strongest possible terms" to ban the award of government contracts to firms which have repeatedly shown their contempt for federal labor law.

It adds "outrageous insult to injury," Pollock declared, when the J. P. Stevens Co. is given a $21.5 million defense contract after a proven record of "brazen and deliberate . . . union busting."

Social Gains Upheld

He also warned in his keynote address against those who would use the excuse of the nation's "costly resistance to Communist aggression in Viet Nam" to seek to "halt social progress at home."

He termed social progress the "most potent weapon" America can use both at home and abroad and "the key to a lasting peace in Viet Nam."

Pollock made clear, however, that "the great majority" of U.S. delegates to the convention "recognize the necessity of seeing this crisis through and supporting the Johnson Administration's efforts to secure a just peace in Viet Nam."

The convention, early in its sessions, approved the doubling of strike benefits. As the AFL-CIO News went to press, it was preparing to consider recommendations for a dues increase from $4 to $5 a month, and an increase in the per capita tax from $2 to $2.50, with 50 cents earmarked for the defense fund.

Also before the delegates was an overhaul of the union's constitution, based on a two-year study.

WORKER FATHER of the Year, Ralph DeGirolomo (right center), received congratulations from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler when he visited AFL-CIO headquarters with his wife, Flora, and 17-year-old daughter, Mary. DeGirolomo is a member of Clothing Workers Local 170, Tyrone, Pa., and for 27 years has been a pattern marker for the Reliance Mfg. Co.

Landmark Decision Gives Union Right to Make Own Time Study

New York—A union's right to send its representative into a plant to make its own time study of a job for which the rate is disputed was upheld in a landmark decision by the 2d Circuit Court of Appeals here.

The unanimous verdict was the first to give a union the clear right to make its own time study to check an employer's determination of a disputed production standard. It rejected arguments that such a right was an invasion of the employer's privacy, violated his property rights and would disrupt normal operations.

The decision upheld the action of the National Labor Relations Board in a case brought by Auto Workers Local 133 against the Fafnir Bearing Co. of New Britain, Conn.

The union had charged the company with refusal to bargain when it was denied the right to make its own time study to determine if the prevailing piecework for four jobs violated the contract proviso that they be set "so the average qualified operator working under normal job conditions and applying normal incentive effort shall be able . . . to earn 5 percent above the standard earning rate of his labor grade."

The company had furnished the union, upon its request, with its own time studies and had answered questions posed by Kermit Mead, UAW time study and industrial engineering director. Mead testified at the NLRB hearing that he was unable to determine, without making his own study, if he should advise the union to take the grievances to arbitration or to abandon them.

The decision was written by Judge Irving R. Kaufman, with Judges J. Joseph Smith and Wilfred Feinberg concurring.

Judge Kaufman refuted the company's argument that its Otis Elevator Co. ruling, in which it denied the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers the right to make independent time studies, governed the Fafnir case.

'Skimpy' Record Cited

He cited the "relatively skimpy record" in the Otis case; the company's refusal to give the union its data and the consequent lack of determination as to whether that data would have been sufficient for an informed judgment, and, "even more significantly," the court's conviction that in Otis the union could have obtained the additional information it wanted by consulting its own members.

In the Fafnir case, Judge Kaufman continued, "there was ample evidence before the trial examiner and the board to justify the rejection" of the company's contention that the union "had alternative sources for the information it sought and therefore did not really require independent time studies."

By preventing the union from conducting its studies, he wrote, "the company was, in essence, requiring it to play a game of blind man's bluff."

"Only by guess-work could the union determine," he went on, "which piece rates to protest and which to accept . . .

"The distinction urged by the company between affording employes access to the production areas of the plant while limiting non-employes to the non-production areas . . . has little merit in a case such as this. . . . It is apparent that these studies must be made in the production areas of the plant; they are designed, after all, to measure productivity under normal and usual circumstances. Thus, adopting the company's suggested distinction would foreclose all union-conducted time studies, a step which . . . we believe contrary to the purposes Congress intended the act to serve."

Dir. Charles Kerrigan of UAW Region 9-A hailed the decision as "tremendously important" and said it "upholds an indispensable right of a union."

"This decision rules that an employer no longer can rely on a claim of naked property rights to prevent a union from making time studies it must have in representing its members," he said. "The decision upholds human rights as against the sheer assertion of property rights."

Vermont Marble Strike Goes Into Ninth Week

Proctor, Vt.—Nearly 700 workers began the ninth week of a strike against the Vermont Marble Co., determined to outlast a company notorious for low wages and antagonism to unions.

The firm is the nation's largest producer of marble products. Its workers are members of five locals of the Stone Workers, employed in quarries, machine shops and mills.

Goals of the strike are union security and an upgrading of wages which were described as "the lowest in the area" by Pres. Ralph E. Williams of the Vermont State AFL-CIO, an international representative of the Stone Workers.

The company's pay scales, he said, range from $1.56 for quarry workers to $2.19 for sculptors, the highest-paid skill. A licensed master plumber employed by the company, Williams declared, earns $1.84 an hour.

In response to the union's demands for substantial pay hikes, the company offered a three-year contract with a first year increase of 10 cents an hour, 5 cents the second year, and 5 cents in the third year.

Thirty years ago, the company broke the union in a bitter strike. The Stone Workers came back to reorganize the company in 1945.

Management's attitude in the post-war period, Williams said, was "bare tolerance" of the union and discouragement of membership.

Six months before this year's negotiations, the Stone Worker locals put on an intensive membership drive—boosting their ranks from about 50 percent of the workforce to 90 percent and making union security a major contract goal.

Only 35 of the 700 workers have crossed the picket lines, the union reports, and the company has been unable to recruit replacements in the area, Vermont Marble is one of the oldest firms in the state and some of the strikers are the third generation of their families to work for the company.

Michigan Fire Fighter Cited in Hotel Blaze Role

Lansing, Mich.—Simon Chapple, legislative representative of the Michigan State Fire Fighters Association and of the State AFL-CIO, was hailed as a hero in a resolution adopted unanimously by the state legislature.

Chapple is a highly-regarded lobbyist in the corridors of the state capitol, but it was his bravery in the smoke-filled corridors of a Lansing hotel which won the accolade of the legislators.

Sixteen members of the legislature were among the 118 guests at the Hotel Roosevelt who were routed by a fire in the early morning hours of May 27. And Chapple, returning to his room with a couple of hamburgers and a container of coffee, called on his 22 years of experience as a Highland Park fire fighter to lead many of them to safety—including a blind state representative.

The resolution adopted by the legislature describes how Chapple took the hotel elevator to the fifth floor, where the blaze had started and was concentrated, and continues:

"In the midst of smoke so thick that you could not see, he spread the alarm, shouting: 'If there is anyone up here, follow the sound of my voice.' "

The resolution added that "in heat so intense that the plaster was falling from the ceiling, he led and assisted the occupants."

He put several loads on the elevator, the tribute continued, "but he himself remained in the scorching murk to assure that every door on the fifth floor had been knocked on and all to whom he could render assistance had been assisted."

Lansing fire fighters, who responded to the alarm, were also praised for their "heroic, efficient and extreme competence" in bringing the fire under control.

Only Casualty Indirect

The only victim was an indirect casualty—State Sen. William Romano (D), who died of a heart attack after leaving the burning building.

A Detroit newspaper quoted the blind legislator, Rep. Robert D. Mahoney (D) of Detroit, as saying of Chapple's rescue mission: "It was like an angel of mercy coming out of the smoke . . . He put his arm around me and said I'd be OK."

In a telephone interview with the editor of the Fire Fighters publication, Chapple said disaster was averted because "no one panicked" and "everyone was helping everyone else."

As for his own role, he said, "I just happened to be there."

Medicare—At Last

THE BEGINNING of the medicare program on July 1 is a major milestone in the growth and development of an effective social insurance program for the nation.

It fills a tragic void of at least 30 years' duration that denied to those most in need of medical care and least able to pay for it the protection that society owes to its elderly.

The new program, while filling this gap in the system of social insurance, holds vast new possibilities for the nature and quality of medical care across the country.

For the first time hospitals and nursing homes have to face up to basic questions that many of them have long ignored. They include the question of what is a "reasonable" charge or fee for medical and hospital service; whether hospitals operate efficiently enough to meet the new load of treating and caring for the elderly; whether they serve all the ill equally without regard to race.

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare for the first time has created guidelines for hospitals, physicians and nursing homes to help them achieve the standards set up by the medicare program.

The result, after experimentation and innovation, is certain to improve the quality and cost of medical care for all.

Housing Gap

A SERIOUS HOUSING GAP is developing in the nation with the sharp drop in new starts last month, reflecting a downward trend that has spanned more than two years.

Against a minimum need of 2.5 million new housing units a year, the country produced 1,543,000 in 1965, according to the Census Bureau, a drop of 3 percent from the 1964 total and 6 percent below the 1963 level.

In May new starts dropped 13 percent from the preceding month to the lowest level in 3.5 years.

The million-unit gap between the nation's housing needs and actual new units put in place has been building up for the past seven years with an average of 1,497,000 annual starts from 1959 through 1965.

New and improved housing at prices low and middle-income Americans can afford is a pressing necessity. The continuing gap is strong evidence that the nation is not meeting its obligations in this area and that government programs as designed to date are not producing the desired results.

Council's ILO Statement

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council fully supports and endorses the position of the president of the AFL-CIO and the recent action of the United States workers' delegate to the Intl. Labor Conference and his advisers.

Through their demonstration of protest—which was not a withdrawal from the ILO—they used the most effective means available to indicate the reaction of the free workers of America to the election as president of the conference of a representative of a totalitarian regime whose record and practices are a standing denial of everything that the Intl. Labor Organization stands for and was created to achieve.

'When the Chips Were Down,' Labor Battled to Aid the Poor

The following is excerpted from the Eugene V. Debs lecture before the Midwest Labor Press Association at the University of Iowa by Michael Harrington.

THE OTHER DAY in Congress there was a legislative struggle, it's still going on, but there was a struggle, which is going to fundamentally affect the future of the American poor in the degree to which we abolish poverty in the United States. It was the fight over minimum wage.

At issue was: whether or not we shall extend the minimum wage to the poorest of the poor. The working poor. Now as Vera Swesson said, "Now that we've covered everybody who makes $26 a day, we've got to cover the people who make $26 a week."

Are we going to cover agricultural workers? Are we going to cover hospital workers? Because by the way, our charitable institutions have a habit of making charity cases out of people who work for them. Are we going to cover the laundry worker? And the people who do the crummy work in cafeterias and hotels?

Are we going to cover domestics? Because if you want the Negro to catch up in the society, you better start thinking about maids, for that's where an extraordinary number of Negro women are. We've got them under social security; are we going to extend coverage under minimum wage for domestics?

These momentous issues were being debated before the House. Lots of institutions have the right position in the resolution form. The civil rights movement has got the right position. It understands the relationship of minimum wage to civil rights. The socially conscious religious people, they too have the right position. Many "cause" organizations, the kind of organizations I get elected to, these organizations, they have the right position.

But when you got down to the actual lobbying in the Congress of the United States there was only one serious political force fighting for minimum wage, and that one single serious force fighting for minimum wage was the American trade union movement.

But in talking about this let me describe a little more the working poor. Because the extraordinary thing is, that when the labor movement went to bat with its political power, when it traded some of its accumulated political capital for the working poor, it was not by far and large defending dues payers; because the working poor are precisely those people who don't have the advantage of belonging to a union; people who belong to unions are by far and large not poor people in the United States of America. That's an interesting act of a kind of idealism in our society.

NOW THESE ARE THE PEOPLE for whom the labor movement went to bat, and I repeat, not one penny of dues was coming from these people. That's an accomplishment. It's a real accomplishment. But why is it that this society doesn't really understand that accomplishment?

Why is it that in many ways the best, the most militant and active of the college young either don't care about the labor movement or are hostile to the labor movement? You can show that the college students, for all the talk, didn't show up on minimum wage when the chips were down—the labor movement did.

And yet, why are these students hostile? The labor movement says: "Here, we went to bat for these non-dues-paying poor people, on our own, nobody asked us, nobody forced us. We spent our capital."

What I'm saying is, the fact that these young people don't understand, and don't know about the labor movement, should be cause for alarm. And it cannot be responded to simply by saying: "A-aa-ak! College kids!" They're more than college kids now.

The trade union movement has to maintain its excellent positions on minimum wage; on medicare; on spending for housing, on planning —all of these things, yes! But it has to learn from the young college students and the civil rights activists the sense of solidarity and movement.

Crises, Some Big, Some Little, Change Life's Impersonal Tone

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

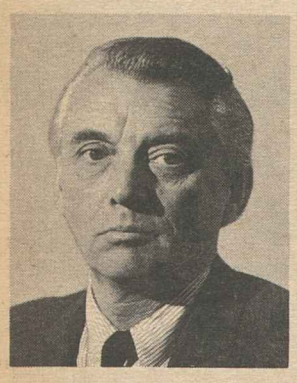
IT'S BEEN an odd week in this gentle month, the perennial prelude to the rough restlessness of summer.

"And," James Russell Lowell wrote, "what is so rare as a day in June?/Then, if ever, come perfect days;/Then heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,/And over it softly her warm ear lays."



Morgan

Perfect days there have not been and if heaven's warm ear was listening it would have been jarred by the dissonance of crises revolving around the unhappy globe like so many too readily identifiable flying objects.

Yet there was a simplicity to some happenings, however sad, which the heart could clutch, like a ladder rung, and hold with poignant understanding for a moment before the mind fell back into the brambles of Big Events.

A nudist colony in Southern New Jersey known as Sunshine Park was put under a cloud by the accusation that after inviting a lady from Brooklyn to share its "rich rewards" it wouldn't let her in when she arrived because she was a Negro. Beauty may be only skin deep but naked prejudice is deeper and not very pretty either.

A homely tragedy touched the country's first family, demonstrating that nobody is immune to grief and that it can be encountered at home. Pres. Johnson's beagle, Him, was run over and killed while he was chasing a squirrel across a driveway within the White House grounds.

Such is the stuff of which the lives of most of us are filled—a cut finger, a social disappointment, a pet lost, strayed, stolen or destroyed—and whereas the public cannot begin to weigh or sense the burden of command decisions on a President, when his daughter bursts into a meeting he is having with congressional leaders and sobs that the family dog is dead, this everybody can instantly understand.

It is well that this is so. It is a useful reminder that people share the vital commonplaces of little tragedies and triumphs. Sometimes we forget this in the cold and calloused attitudes of impersonal aloofness into which our lives are pinched. Sometimes it seems as if the very juices of human feeling are squeezed away by the complexities of "modern" living and then something happens to remind us that they have not been dried up after all.

A congressman named Cornelius Gallagher from New Jersey—this seems to be the Garden State's week—uttered the doleful warning a couple of days ago that the federal government was about to reach out and punch holes in everybody's individuality and force us all into a computerized society. He was frightened by reports that the Budget Bureau was studying the possibility of setting up a kind of master dossier bank into which records on citizens from the Internal Revenue Service, the Census Bureau and other agencies, presumably including the FBI, would be pooled.

This is indeed a ghastly prospect which would dwarf the Big Brother operations of the most arrogant Marxist state. But if the experience of private industry is any guide, it won't come to pass. Some iconoclast will mash the wrong button and wreck the machine.

For decades the advertising business has been spending billions annually trying to make America not monogamous but monotonous. We are supposed to buy the same brand names in Natchez as in Nome, build the same suburbs in San Diego as Sag Harbor, drive the same cars, flash the same decavitied smiles in the same deodorized mouths and come alive with the same standardized looks, clothed in the same drip-dry wash 'n' wear.

ADMITTEDLY it has been hard at times to separate the sheep from the goats but something has got into this generation that is more rebelliously refreshing than the bubbles of a soft drink. Nor is it necessary to burn a draft card to start a protest movement. All you have to do is to break into the wild gyrations of the jerk, the watusi, the monkey or the frug.

My shallow research had led me to conclude prematurely that these frantic dances represented a kind of mass suicide rite, like lemmings tumbling into the sea. They are on the contrary the epitome of defiant self-expression. Washington is at the height of the debutante season and with the aid of a leg-man from Haverford College, Scottie Lanahan writes more history than social notes in her column in the Washington Post as she chronicles the radical change in these rituals.

Today's deb, though evening-gowned, dances barefoot. The art of cutting in is fading out. As a Princeton man who apparently is not an English major puts it, "How can you cut in when you don't know for sure who a girl is dancing with?"

Wallflowers are vanishing and the stag line is wearing thin. Girls who find themselves alone and unattached males simply edge into the melee on the dance floor where the independent action is.

As I was saying, it's been an odd week. But if heaven finds the earth out of tune so do the younger earthlings and if they insist on calling their own, it's all right with me. The foxtrot we mature citizens have been doing isn't so hot.

Effective And Economical:

Federal Rent Payments Seen Boon to Low-Income Families

AN AFL-CIO spokesman has predicted early implementation of the federal rent assistance program for low-income families approved by Congress last year.

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO's Housing Committee, said that although the program became law nearly a year ago, only limited funds have been appropriated for it, largely because of "traditional opposition from those who don't want to move forward on any program of this kind."

But "full enactment and funding is now at hand," he said, as he was interviewed on the AFL-CIO produced weekly public service program, Labor News Conference, on the Mutual radio network.

Shishkin pointed out that rent supplements are an effective and economical approach to meeting the housing needs of low-income families since they involve privately-initiated and privately-owned non-profit housing, helping tenants pay rents to private landlords rather than to government agencies.

SHISHKIN also renewed the AFL-CIO's call for passage of the Demonstration Cities bill, pending in Congress since January. The measure is a "strategic step" toward attacking mounting urban problems of slums, blighted areas and ghettos, as well as improving and expanding opportunities in education, training and employment.

"To clear slums—to eliminate them—is important, but that alone doesn't do the job," he said. "Unless you provide opportunities for people living in these areas to help themselves . . . you will have new slums."

Reporters questioning Shishkin were Robert B. Semple, Jr., of the New York Times' Washington Bureau, and Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ALL ACROSS THE SOUTHERN states the winds of political change are blowing as the long-established Democratic organizations lose membership both to resurgent Republicans and to newly-created Conservative Parties.

Virginia is a fine example. It may seem odd to non-Virginians, who probably have considered the 79-year-old Sen. A. Willis Robertson conservative enough for anybody's tastes, but Robertson is entangled in a serious Democratic primary fight and, if he emerges from that successfully, will have to face both Republican and Conservative Party challengers in November.

He may not even win the July 12 primary. State Sen. William B. Spong, who is endorsed by the State AFL-CIO, has put together convincing evidence that both state banks and some major New York banks are raising funds for Robertson, who as chairman of the Senate Banking & Currency Committee has managed public policies so as to please them.

It is perfectly legal for any person to make individual campaign contributions to any candidate he pleases, but the Virginia banks, at least, are pushing pretty blatantly at the promotion of contributions from people connected with banking enterprises. Robertson says he would be "disappointed" if bankers did not help him but Spong thinks that the mutual-help operation is exceeding the "tolerable limits."

Young Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., also has primary opposition from former State Sen. Armistead L. Boothe, who tried years ago to save his state from the folly of "massive resistance" to school desegregation. (They are seeking election for the four years remaining of the unexpired term of the elder Sen. Harry F. Byrd.) And even if Byrd makes it through the primary, he will have Conservative Party opposition in the November election.

THE POWERFUL CHAIRMAN of the House Rules Committee, "Judge" Howard W. Smith, who at 83 is even older than Robertson, is facing his first serious primary challenge in years from a young and personable state representative. Smith is campaigning through the district with the vigor of an active colt—but the point is that redistricting took away some of his rural-area voters and added some from the populous suburbs.

Another point is that Smith is talking about the federal funds funneled into the district for programs and services of the type he has fought all his congressional life.

In Alabama, to take another state, the announcement has finally been made by John Grenier, a Birmingham lawyer, that he will run on the Republican ticket in November against the veteran Democratic incumbent, Sen. John J. Sparkman.

Grenier was the organizing genius who worked through district GOP conventions and state conventions to assure a solid pro-Goldwater delegation from 11 southern states in 1964. Whether he can organize for his own candidacy as effectively as he organized for Goldwater is not yet known. It is clear, however, that Republicans are trying to file full tickets of candidates in many states and that they think the GOP is a new force that has come to stay in southern states.

REP. JAMES D. MARTIN, one of five Republicans elected in Alabama congressional districts two years ago, is running against Mrs. Lurleen Wallace for governor. In Georgia, Rep. Howard H. Callaway, another Republican victor of 1964, will run for governor against the winner of the Democratic primary.

Sen. James O. Eastland of Mississippi, a sixth-ranking member in Senate seniority, got through his primary contest without trouble, but he, too, faces a Republican opponent in November, Rep. Prentiss Walker. Walker is another of the 1964 brand of Republicans.

Considering the mood of the voters in Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi—all of which went for Goldwater against Pres. Johnson—some Republican victories are conceivable. As for Virginia, that's another matter. Virginia is in the process of trying to liberalize.

PREDICTING EARLY implementation of the federal rent assistance program for low-income families, Sec. Boris Shishkin (center), of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, told Robert B. Semple, Jr., left, of the New York Times, and Neil Gilbride of Associated Press that "full enactment and funding are now at hand," as he was interviewed on the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program, Labor News Conference, broadcast by Mutual Radio Network.

19 Million Elderly Americans Set for Start of Medicare July 1

of 85 one-hundredths of 1 percent in 1987.

The supplementary plan costs $3 per month, with payments beginning July 1. The federal government pays a similar amount. For social security and railroad retirement beneficiaries and eligible federal employes, the sum will be deducted from monthly checks. For others, quarterly payments are due. Persons who become 65 can enroll during a period starting three months before their birthday and ending seven months later.

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has contracted with Blue Cross, Blue Shield and private insurance companies to act as intermediaries in making actual payments under both the basic and voluntary programs.

Rates Set

The amount due hospitals for each service has been worked out on the basis of a complex formula, with amounts varying not only from community to community but also from hospital to hospital.

Doctors will be entitled to "reasonable" fees, with an intermediary for the area determining the customary and prevailing charge for the service in each community.

However, to qualify for federal funds, hospitals must meet standards set by the Social Security Administration and also the nonsegregation requirements laid down in the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The SSA has found more than 6,300 hospitals that meet quality standards, with the total rising daily.

Eighty-one percent of all hospitals, or 6,137 out of the nation's 7,548, have been found to meet Civil Rights Act standards. The status of the others—most of them in the South—is being reviewed. HEW Sec. John W. Gardner predicted that only a handful would fail to qualify by July 1.

Pres. Johnson, in a recent speech to about 300 representatives of medical and hospital groups planning for the start of medicare, warned the hospitals to avoid racial discrimination or take the responsibility for depriving senior citizens of benefits under the new law.

"To those who still stand outside the gates of compliance," the President said, "I want to say this: 'Please comply. If you discriminate against some older citizens in your community, you make it difficult for the whole program.'

"The federal government is not going to retreat from its clear responsibility and what the members of Congress have written into the law. I hope you will not retreat, either."

Johnson in addition asked the medical-hospital profession to "stand firm against abuses" when "unreasonable demands arise," and urged it to "take the lead to prevent unreasonable costs for health services."

Social Security Commissioner Robert Ball told the same meeting that the Public Health Service anticipated an overall increase of about 5 percent in hospital utilization as a result of medicare. Some hospital administrators expect a substantially larger increase. The net result, it was agreed, may lead to a shortage of some facilities in some areas, but not on a national basis.

Basic Benefits

The basic or hospitalization program provides:

- Inpatient hospital services for up to 90 days for each spell of illness, including hospital services usually given patients in a semi-private room. These would include, for example, regular nursing service, but not private nursing; use of operating and recovery rooms; services of resident physicians and interns in training under approved programs; services of technicians and specialists; medicines, and crutches, wheelchairs or prosthetic devices. Not included are the hospital services of private physicians.

For this care the beneficiary will pay the first $40 plus $10 additional for each day beginning with the 61st day. Each spell of illness will be considered to begin when the insured enters the hospital and to end when he has not been an inpatient of a hospital or extended care facility for 60 consecutive days.

- Outpatient diagnostic services comparable to those usually given inpatients. The patient pays $20 for each 20-day period.
- Post-hospital home health services for up to 100 visits, following discharge from a hospital after a stay of at least three days, or from an extended care facility, and before the start of a new illness. Such services would include intermittent care, therapy and the part-time assistance of a home health aide.

Included in the benefits, but not effective until Jan. 1, 1967, is post-hospital "extended care." This gives the beneficiary, after a three-day hospital stay, up to 100 days of care in a nursing or convalescent home which has an arrangement with a hospital for the transfer of patients and for furnishing medical information about patients.

After the first 20 days of care, the patient will pay $5 a day for the remaining 80 days in each spell of illness. A patient must be admitted to an extended care facility within 14 days of discharge by the hospital.

The voluntary supplementary medical plan provides payment for:

- Physicians' and surgeons' services in a hospital, home, office, clinic or elsewhere.
- Up to 100 home health service visits each calendar year with no requirement of prior hospitalization.
- Specific dental surgery.
- Diagnostic, X-ray and laboratory tests, and other diagnostic tests.
- X-ray, radium and radioactive isotope therapy.
- Surgical dressings and splints, casts and other aids used in the reduction of fractures and dislocations; rental of certain durable medical equipment for use in the home (iron lungs, hospital beds, oxygen tents and wheel chairs, for example), and non-dental prosthetic devices.
- Ambulance services.

For these benefits the insured pays, in addition to the monthly premium, the first $50 and 20 percent of the rest of the cost each year, with the plan paying the remaining 80 percent.

The basic hospitalization plan does not cover the doctor's bill, medicines outside the hospital or extended care facility, household operation while a patient is recuperating at home, or the use of an extended care facility primarily for tuberculosis or mental diseases.

The voluntary supplemental plan does not cover the services of a chiropractor or podiatrist, or of an examination to determine the need for glasses; the glasses themselves, hearing aids or orthopedic shoes; injuries where workmen's compensation is provided; drugs and biologicals; private duty nurses, and payment for services obtained in countries other than the U.S., Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa.

Rail Board Names Medicare Agent

Chicago—The Railroad Retirement Board designated the Travelers Insurance Co., to process all claims of railroad employes, their families and retirees under the medical services section (Part B) of the federal medicare program.

Travelers will receive all claims for doctor bill benefits by enrolled railroaders, and administer them at designated offices. The firm will be responsible to the board under standards established by the Health, Education & Welfare Dept., the board announced.

Mrs. Ethel Rogin, Labor Librarian

Mrs. Ethel Lurie Rogin, librarian who specialized in trade union materials and wife of AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence M. Rogin, died in George Washington Hospital of cancer. She was 58.

A native of New York and a graduate of Hunter College, she attended the library school at the University of Michigan and worked as a librarian at the Brookwood Labor School, Katonah, N.Y., before her marriage. She also worked in the New York City and Washington public library systems.

In addition to her husband, she is survived by two sons, a daughter, a brother and a sister.

Investments Abroad Pose New Problems

There's been a big boom in American investments abroad—and in the volume of business done by overseas affiliates of U.S. companies.

By contrast, American exports have shown only a moderate increase in recent years—much less than the gain for other free world nations.

An article in the June issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist explores the maze of U.S. overseas investments and finds it leads to "more questions and problems than answers."

There is the question of the impact of American investment abroad on jobs at home and on the balance of payments.

Are U.S. investments in other countries substituting for exports of American-built products? Or are they penetrating markets which, for various reasons, would be closed to goods made in the United States? How does one classify the fact that one-fourth of all U.S. exports in 1964 went to foreign affiliates of U.S. corporations—including parts for assembly and capital equipment?

The Federationist analysis, written by Elizabeth Jager of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, notes evidence that foreign-based manufacturing operations have to some degree displaced U.S. exports. The case of transportation equipment is cited as "a dramatic example."

Sharp Contrast

Between 1957 and 1964, U.S. exports of transport equipment—ranging from autos and trucks to railroad equipment—inched ahead from $1.6 billion to $1.7 billion.

During the same period, sales in the same field by overseas affiliates of U.S. companies more than doubled, from $4.2 billion to $9.5 billion.

The article also raises the question: "Are U.S. corporate holdings really 'United States' investments, or do international corporate giants, the new multi-national corporations, hold power which makes them private governments?"

A corporation may own mines and factories in one country and production facilities in another, making the impact of its operations hard to trace and governmental controls difficult to apply.

So vast are some of these multinational enterprises that two companies, Standard Oil of New Jersey and General Motors, had combined worldwide sales in 1964 that were higher than total U.S. exports.

The Federationist article suggests that the time has come for the U.S. government to regulate and control the outflow of American capital "in the national interest." And it concludes:

"It is certainly time for Congress to investigate the outflow of American capital and the impact of American investment in foreign countries on U.S. employment, prices, exports, imports and the balance of payments, as well as the increasing importance of multi-national corporations, and to place the facts clearly before the American people."

AFGE Wins Unit of 15,000 At Air Base

and expects a big influx as a result of winning exclusive bargaining rights. This gives it authority to negotiate a contract covering all workers on the base, including the adjacent Warner Robins Air Materiel Area.

Despite heavy rain on the election day and lines at the ballot boxes, the votes cast exceeded the 60 percent participation required by the government for certification of federal employe unions. An unaffiliated union, the National Federation of Federal Employes, backed away from competing on the ballot and instead called for a boycott of the election in an effort to block an AFGE certification.

Stanley Receives Honorary Degree

Montgomery, W. Va.—A century of stagnation has ended in all the backwaters of America, Miles C. Stanley, president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO and assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, told the graduating class of the West Virginia Institute of Technology here.

The federal funds and talent attacking poverty in West Virginia and other underdeveloped areas, plus "the private investment and the genius of American industry," mean that the graduate who makes his career at home, he said, "will be getting in on the ground floor of what is sure to be a growing proposition."

Stanley, who received an honorary doctor of humanities degree, called on the graduates to exercise the leadership in which they have been trained in their home state so that the federal money which is being made available to banish poverty can be utilized as "an opportunity for us to help ourselves."

UAW Wins Jobless Pay In 1957 Strike

Lansing, Mich.—The Michigan Supreme Court reversed a 1965 decision and awarded unemployment compensation to 4,798 Auto Workers at Michigan General Motors plant who had been laid off in 1957 because of a strike at a GM plant in Ohio.

The original decision had been 3-2 against the UAW claim, with three judges having disqualified themselves — two because they owned GM stock.

Union attorneys, arguing for a rehearing, said the small amount of GM stock owned by the two judges should not be considered a conflict of interest in this case. The court agreed, and the outcome was a 4-3 decision upholding the workers' claim.

The decision was based on the state's pre-1963 unemployment compensation law and was in line with previous court rulings in similar cases. A Republican-sponsored law in 1963 toughened eligibility for jobless benefits in strike-related situations.

Still pending in the courts and before the Michigan Employment Security Commission are a number of other claims based on unemployment of workers not themselves on strike both before and after the 1963 law.

Automat Chain Store Rights Won by RCIA

New York—Retail Clerks Local 150 has won representation rights for some 400 clerks in Horn & Hardart retail stores in New York and New Jersey and immediately opened negotiations for a first contract.

The local over the past six months conducted a vigorous organizing drive which reached its climax when agents of the American Arbitration Association, under an agreement with the company, checked signed membership applications and ruled that the union represented a substantial majority of employes in its jurisdiction.

The union had substantial aid in its membership campaign from Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO and from locals of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 302 in January won recognition for 3,000 automat, cafeteria and restaurant workers in Horn & Hardart operations in Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx. The firm had long been regarded as a stronghold of anti-unionism.

Strike Activity Shows April Rise

Estimated working time lost due to labor disputes reached the highest level since 1959 although strike idleness during the first four months of 1966 was less than for the same period of last year, the Labor Dept. reported on the basis of preliminary estimates.

The April time lost was two one-hundredths of 1 percent of total working time, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said, compared with 11 one-hundredths of 1 percent last year and 25 one-hundredths of 1 percent seven years ago.

For the first four months, strike idleness accounted for 13 one-hundredths of 1 percent of estimated total working time, compared with 16 one-hundredths of 1 percent in 1965. Lost time amounted to 5.7 million mandays, compared with 6.8 million during the same period in 1965.

OVERALL VIEW SHOWS the social service center built with AFL-CIO aid in Carpina, Brazil, to serve agricultural workers.

A FEIJOADA, made of boiled black beans and jerked beef from U.S. surplus foods, is enjoyed by this farm worker at the dedication of a new social service center for rural workers built in Carpina, Brazil, by the American Institute for Free Labor Development in cooperation with the Alliance for Progress and the Brazilian Confederation of Agricultural Workers. Junior, at right, has already gobbled down his feijoada.

SPEAKING in behalf of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the dedication of the rural social service center at Carpina, in Brazil's impoverished Northeast, was Marvin C. Myrtue, Brazilian representative of the Postal, Telephone & Telegraph Intl. The AFL-CIO is concerned about the plight of the Brazilian worker, he said, and is ready to help in his quest for social and economic justice. About 7,000 persons attended the ceremony.

U.S. Labor Aids Brazil's Farm Workers

Carpina, Brazil—A beachhead in Brazilian labor's war on poverty was firmly established here with the dedication of a new social service center for agricultural workers in this economically depressed section of Northeast Brazil.

The center is a cooperative effort by the AFL-CIO through the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the Brazilian Confederation of Agricultural Workers and the Alliance for Progress. It is believed the first of its kind in Latin America, although others are being constructed in the nearby towns of Garanhuns and Ribeirao.

The center will serve rural workers as headquarters for union activities and will provide educational, legal and medical services, credit union facilities, quarters for land purchase and improvement cooperatives and will serve as a pivotal point for programs seeking to improve the lot of the farm worker and his family.

The actual operations will be in the hands of the rural workers themselves, with the aid of a small professional staff.

7,000 Attend

About 7,000 farm workers feasted on feijoadas—boiled black beans and jerked beef from U.S. surplus foods—and heard speeches by labor leaders and diplomats at the dedication.

Former AFL-CIO Vice Pres. William C. Doherty, Sr., onetime president of the Letter Carriers and U.S. ambassador to Jamaica, was scheduled to represent AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the ceremony but was unable to make plane connections. His place was taken by Marvin C. Myrtue of San Rafael, Calif., Brazilian representative of the Postal, Telephone & Telegraph Intl.

Myrtue told the Brazilians that "poverty and neglect" will remain their enemies "until you have a strong, independent and united labor movement."

"When you are organized in free unions," he said, "then progress follows without violence. Violence comes when people are so full of despair and hate and without hope of helping themselves that they succumb to senseless acts.

"When workers organize and campaign for just and rational goals, they pretty well remove the chance for violence and bloodshed. With this kind of sound progress, we can hope to attain the peaceful revolution our late Pres. Kennedy had in mind when he launched the Alliance for Progress."

The AFL-CIO is "concerned" about the situation of the Brazilian worker, Myrtue said, and "is ready to help in your struggle for improved welfare, greater equality, fundamental justice and a more decent life."

Workers United

"Built by the joint efforts of the Confederation of Agricultural Workers and the AFL-CIO under the Alliance," he added, "this building serves notice that the brotherhood of workers in Brazil and the U.S. is united in its opposition to the enemies of labor."

He stressed the educational facilities the center will offer, calling them major weapons in the fight against "rural poverty, illness, inequality, ignorance and injustice."

"The teaching of functional literacy is to be provided in this center and then brought to nearby communities," Myrtue said. "This is the beginning of modernization for labor in the Northeast. The ability to read, write and figure is the takeoff point for collective bargaining for higher wages, better working conditions and other basic labor rights."

Speakers in addition to Brazilian labor leaders included Mayor Jose Pereira Cardoza of Carpina; Padre Pauol Crespo of the (State of) Pernambuco Service of Rural Orientation; Herbert W. Baker, labor attache at the U.S. embassy in Rio de Janeiro; Donor M. Lion, USAID director in Northeast Brazil; Minister Counselor Edward J. Rowell of the U.S. consulate at Recife and Arthur Lopez of Albuquerque, N.M., AIFLD area chief.

Better Jobless Aid Bill To Be Sought in Senate

fits with tougher qualifications which keep many jobless workers from receiving them.

The AFL-CIO convention last December had termed the Administration bill "imperative" in view of the "crazy quilt variations" in the 50 state laws.

The real House battle was in the Ways & Means Committee, where a conservative coalition dumped the Administration bill and even voted down the attempt of Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) to preserve some meaningful federal standards.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's comment at the time was that the committee has passed up "an opportunity to provide realistic legislative safeguards against future recessions," and "instead provided only minimal improvements and no federal benefit standard whatsoever."

Meany urged that the bill be used by the Senate as "a vehicle . . . to improve unemployment insurance" through "realistic, meaningful federal standards." He added:

"Certainly those persons unemployed through no fault of their own should not be used as pawns by the several states in their campaign to pirate industry from socially enlightened to socially backward areas."

Seven Republican members of the Ways & Means Committee, in a report accompanying the bill to the House, gloated over the measure as "a great victory."

They said the Administration bill "was designed to federalize and straitjacket state unemployment insurance programs. It would have established federal benefit standards, both with respect to amount and duration."

Not only did the committee reject all these, the GOP members said, but it also added a provision for court review if the Secretary of Labor should rule that a state's program does not meet even the mild federal standards now in effect.

CPI Barely Moves Up:

Rise in Cost of Living Slowed By Sharp Drop in Food Prices

By Robert B. Cooney

This year's strong upsurge in consumer prices slowed down in May as the Consumer Price Index edged upward by only one-tenth of 1 percent, the Labor Dept. has reported.

A sharp cut in food prices, led by a big drop in meat prices, tended to offset gains in other areas. The food price decline was the first in eight months, dropping six-tenths of 1 percent between April and May.

The sudden slowdown in the rising cost of living seemed further to diminish the pressures for counter-inflationary tax increases. The CPI had jumped six-tenths of 1 percent in February, four-tenths of 1 percent in March and one-half of 1 percent in April. Pres. Johnson had warned he might seek a tax increase if prices continued to soar, but the pace of economic activity has slackened somewhat.

Cost Change

The April-to-May rise brought the CPI from 112.5 to 112.6. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $11.26.

While the over-the-month rise was slight, the CPI, at 112.6, stands 2.7 percent higher than a year ago. The rise is about double the increase of recent years.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said the average weekly net spendable earnings of factory production workers moved upward in May due to a seasonal rise in the workweek. Hourly earnings were unchanged.

Spendable earnings or take-home pay for the worker with three dependents averaged $99.22; for the single worker, earnings averaged $91.35. The increase was 60 cents for both groups.

Spendable earnings were up by 2.5 percent or $2.35 compared to May 1965, the report said. The rise over the year was attributed to a longer workweek and a 9-cent an hour hike in earnings. The over-the-year increase was cut by $1.35, however, due to the higher social security tax deduction of last January.

"Real" spendable earnings—or purchasing power—rose by six-tenths of 1 percent, or 50 cents, over the month. Compared to a year ago, worker purchasing power was reduced by two-tenths of 1 percent because of the price rise.

The Labor Dept. said higher food prices and increased charges for consumer services have been responsible for most of the rise in living costs over the past year. While meat prices went down in May, they still averaged 15 percent higher than a year ago and poultry prices were up by 10 percent. Eggs were up 13 percent and dairy products 5 percent. But fresh fruit and vegetable prices were down by 5.5 percent.

Consumer service price levels have risen about 3.5 percent over the year. The largest jump in this group was nearly 4.5 percent for medical care services.

On the April-to-May changes, the charges for consumer services rose by three-tenths of 1 percent. The largest increases were for mortgage interest rates as the tighter money policy took effect, and for doctors' and dentists' fees, hospital service charges, domestic service, house repairs and barber and beauty shop services.

The May CPI will bring cost-of-living wage hikes to some 206,000 workers under escalator clauses in their union contracts. About 95,000 aerospace workers will get a 3-cent increase on the basis of a quarterly review. Another 75,000 meatpackers will get 5 cents an hour more on a semi-annual adjustment. The raises for other workers range from a half-cent to 6 cents an hour.

COLLECTION of 285 English and German classics was presented by Pres. Karl Feller (left) of the Brewery Workers to the Public Library of Cincinnati & Hamilton County. Started by Julius Zorn, secretary-treasurer of the union from the turn of the century until 1919, the collection was continued, Feller said, by other union officers "who believed deeply that the best fruits of culture should be shared with the working people." Feller and Librarian Ernest I. Miller (right) are examining an 1890 volume of Schopenhauer.

Grape Workers Win $1.75 Pay, Union Shop

"The AFL-CIO is extremely proud to have been able to play a role in bringing this about," Kircher said.

Cesar Chavez, director of NFWA, said it was "a milestone agreement" that would have far-reaching effect on the lives of poverty-stricken farm workers.

And Sidney Korshak, attorney for Schenley who negotiated the agreement for the company, said the firm now "looks forward to a continued productive relationship with the union."

Korshak also spiked reports that the immediate 35-cent hourly boost in all wage classifications, as called for in the agreement, would hit the housewife in the pocketbook.

"I don't think this will mean an increase to the consumer.

"The company will absorb the higher production costs out of profits," he said.

The historic pact came as a climax to another precedent-shattering move by Schenley last April.

Recognition Pact

That's when Schenley agreed to recognize and bargain with NFWA after Kircher and W. J. Bassett, executive secretary of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, brought the union and company officials together around a bargaining table for the first time.

Here's what the farm contract does for the Schenley vineyard workers:

- It provides an across-the board 35-cent hourly hike, effective June 21 for all wage classifications.

When the strike began last September, Delano area workers were getting as little at $1.10 an hour. Since then the pressure of the strike and the ban on foreign imported labor has forced up the wage scale to from $1.40 to $1.60 which Schenley employes are currently receiving.

- All piece work rates will be adjusted to reflect a similar 35-cent increase.
- In cases where inequities exist with respect to insurance, medical and hospitalization and vacations, the union and company will eliminate them.
- It sets up a union hiring hall procedure that makes the NFWA the prime source of labor for the company. Under the contract terms the union has 72 hours to furnish requested labor. If the union can't meet the deadline the company then can seek other labor sources.
- Along with a full union shop and dues checkoff, the pact also provides that credit union charges may be collected by the company specifically when authorized.

At a press conference in the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor headquarters, where the agreement was negotiated, Kircher held out the hope that the Schenley pact would open the eyes of the Di Giorgio Corp. to "its responsibility to its employes."

Di Giorgio is the largest employer in the strike-torn Delano area, where some 32 growers are still holding out against the joint walkout by members of the Agriculture Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and members of NFWA.

The giant farm firm, against which the AFL-CIO has launched a nationwide consumer boycott, has agreed to hold a union recognition election, but has never come up with clear ground rules that NFWA could accept, according to Chavez.

The Teamsters union in recent weeks had moved in on the NFWA strike and began signing up Di Giorgio workers, but backed away under pressure from the Catholic Church, which has strongly supported the grape strikers in Delano.

And only hours after the Schenley agreement was announced, Di Giorgio threw up another roadblock to NFWA.

Chavez announced that "the Di Giorgio Corp. unilaterally informed us that it will conduct its own election among its workers, that it will prohibit all strikers from taking part in the vote, and that all tentative agreements reached between Di Giorgio and NFWA are nullified.

Meanwhile, affiliation talks between the AFL-CIO and the independent farm union are continuing, with "only a few mechanics to be worked out."

Unions Expand Overseas Aid ThroughCARE

International relief activity of AFL-CIO unions channeled through CARE to free trade unions in all parts of the world has increased sharply and totals $50,000 this year, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, a CARE vice president, has reported to Federation Pres. George Meany.

Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers, pointed out that half the total is being used for refugee relief in Viet Nam—$15,000 the Steelworkers have given to provide milk for school lunch programs, and $11,000 available for use by the Confederation of Vietnamese Workers (CVT). Of the latter fund, $7,500 is on hand for food, medicine, textiles or community development.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has allocated $5,000 to buy union-made tools through CARE for two complete carpentry shops in Bogota, Colombia, Minton noted.

On the opposite side of the world, Israeli orphans have benefitted from a gift of $10,000 from the Jewish Labor Committee, he added.

A number of affiliates have allocated funds through CARE for sound projectors, mimeograph machines, typewriters, education kits, food and other supplies with a value of $9,000, Minton said.

The AFL-CIO was a founding member of CARE.

Di Giorgio Vote Plan Denounced as 'Phony'

San Francisco—An attempt to trap striking farm workers with a "phony" grower-sponsored union representation election was effectively intercepted here by AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William F. Kircher.

He angrily denounced plans of the Di Giorgio Corp. to sponsor such an election on June 24 as "improper, invalid, immoral, flying in the face of every decent democratic procedure."

He accused the firm of bad faith. He charged it violated its pledge to refrain from press statements during negotiations with farm worker union representatives and with continuing attempts to coerce the votes of farm workers.

A meeting had been planned for June 22, he explained, to complete arrangements for a consent election.

Kircher said it all as the uninvited and unwelcome guest at a press conference summoned by Pres. Robert Di Giorgio of the giant corporation that has been labeled "the symbol and leader of resistance to farm worker organizing." The firm's products are targets of an AFL-CIO supported consumer boycott.

Di Giorgio had just finished reading a five-page mimeographed statement to more than a score of reporters and a battery of microphones and television cameras. He said, in short, that the corporation had asked a firm of public accountants to conduct a representation election among its "hourly employes" on June 24.

Ballot List

Listed on the ballot, he said, would be the National Farm Workers Association, the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, and the Teamsters.

The proposed election, Di Giorgio said, would be held near two of the corporation's ranches—Borrego Farms, in San Diego County, and Sierra Vista Ranch, near Delano. The latter has been the focus of the grape pickers' 10-month strike.

He had barely finished reading the prepared statement when Kircher stepped into camera range.

"I'd like to correct Mr. Di Giorgio's statement," he said. While Di Giorgio protested from the rostrum, reporters crowded around Kircher. Di Giorgio suggested calling the police. Someone pulled the switch, cutting off the television lights. After a moment, they were restored. As Kircher resumed speaking, Di Giorgio left the room.

Kircher demanded the company remove NFWA and AWOC from the company-sponsored ballot.

Failing that, Kircher declared, lawyers would go into court within hours to obtain an injunction barring the use of the two union's names without their consent.

He called on the Teamsters, too, to demonstrate solidarity by withdrawing.

Kircher explained that he and NFWA representatives had met with Di Giorgio representatives only two days before and had reached agreement on a consent election at Borrego Farms. He said they were still apart on a vote at the Delano property.

The understanding, Kircher explained, was that the agreement would be referred to the company and the union for ratification. They had agreed earlier that neither would make statements to the press while negotiations continued.

But he reserved his strongest condemnation for the company's refusal to allow strikers to vote. It was a violation of law, ethics and morality, he said, to deny the right to vote to employes who had gone though hardship and bitterness for 10 months.

He urged the corporation to join the union in good faith to give the workers "a free, untrammeled choice" in an atmosphere devoid of coercion and pressure.

Instead, he charged, the company displayed an "abiding unwillingness to do what a major part of the corporations of America have done in the past 30 years and recognize and bargain with the unions of their employes."

1 Man, 1 Vote Revolution Sweeps States

Overcomes Rural Grip On Capitals

By David L. Perlman

The era of rural domination of state legislatures is over. The fight for one man, one vote representation has been won in nearly every state.

For the first time this November, legislatures will be elected on the basis of the Supreme Court's revolutionary doctrine that "as nearly as practicable, one man's vote . . . is to be worth as much as another's."

The political revolution of the past several years is of more than academic interest to labor. Union members and their families have paid a heavy price for generations of minority control of state legislatures. The penalty has been inadequate unemployment and workmen's compensation benefits, poor schools and hospitals, punitive anti-labor laws.

The new legislatures will not automatically be more liberal, although several reapportioned legislatures have already compiled outstanding records. But they will at least represent people, not cows or empty acres.

One or both houses of the legislatures of 12 states have been reapportioned by federal or state courts after the legislatures themselves were unable to agree on redistricting formulae which met constitutional standards. These states were Alabama, Arizona, Illinois, Michigan, Montana, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Unions Push Action

In most of the other states, reapportionment has taken place under court order. Several of the court cases were brought by state AFL-CIO councils.

A few court cases are still pending, some temporary redistrictings need further refinements, the Louisiana legislature is still trying to work out a reapportionment of the Senate, and Mississippi failed to meet one man, one vote standards. But overall, the pace of change has been amazingly fast.

The first breakthrough came in 1962, when the Supreme Court agreed to enter what the late Justice Felix Frankfurter had once described as a "political thicket."

It directed a lower court to hear on its merits the complaint of a group of Tennessee residents that they had been denied equal protection of the law because the Tennessee legislature had not been reapportioned since 1901—

'66 Civil Rights Measure Clears House Committee

Housing Bias Ban Narrowed

The civil rights bottleneck in Congress was broken as the House Judiciary Committee voted 24-9 approval of legislation aimed at providing new weapons against race discrimination in America.

Compromises were made in the key fair housing section in order to broaden congressional support for the bill, but other sections closely follow proposals made by Pres. Johnson in a message to Congress two months ago.

The rewritten housing section in effect outlaws race discrimination only in apartment house rentals and in new housing developments. It is narrower in scope than the Administration, civil rights groups and the AFL-CIO had sought.

Other sections of the bill:

- Provide safeguards in selection of both state and federal juries against discrimination because of race, color, religion, sex, national origin or low economic status.
- Give the Justice Dept. power to sue to desegregate schools or other public facilities without waiting for a written complaint of discrimination.
- Strengthen laws prohibiting policemen, public officials or private persons from interfering by threats or force with Negroes or civil rights workers trying to exercise their constitutional rights. It would also ban interference with persons—ranging from school officials to restaurant owners—who attempt to comply

LABOR-INDUSTRY UNITY in fight for a sound national merchant marine policy was stressed by Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers (speaking) at Save Our Shipping conference in Washington co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee and the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

For Strong Merchant Fleet:

'SOS' Parley Stresses U.S. Shipping Crisis

By Gervase N. Love

The sad plight of the physically and economically obsolete merchant marine was placed squarely before the country at a labor-sponsored Save Our Shipping conference.

Some 400 representatives of unions in all sectors of the industry gave strong backing to major recommendations of the President's Maritime Advisory Committee to restore the United States as a sea power.

Labor, management and congressional speakers called on Pres. Johnson to implement the proposals his committee made to build and operate a first-class merchant fleet.

The conference named a five-man committee to seek a meeting with Johnson in a direct plea for aid.

Appointed to meet with the President were the four union leaders who compose the American Committee to Save Our Shipping which called the conference—Pres. Russell K. Berg of the Boilermakers; Pres. Joseph N. Curran, National Maritime Union; Pres. Thomas W. Gleason, Longshoremen, and Pres. Paul Hall, Seafarers—and Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The delegates also visited congressmen and senators to urge legislation revising the merchant marine, including an autonomous Maritime Administration divorced from the proposed cabinet-level Transportation Dept.

They expressed confidence that the new-found unity of labor and management would succeed in persuading the President and Congress that a strong merchant marine is essential for national defense and a balanced economy.

The two-day conference was held on the 30th anniversary of enactment of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. The act, which set transportation of 50 percent of the country's shipping in U.S.-flag vessels

Conductors Back Move For Merger

Cedar Rapids, Ia.—Delegates to the 48th convention of the unaffiliated Conductors & Brakemen took two steps toward merger of the ORCB with two AFL-CIO unions, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and the Switchmen.

- They approved a resolution calling for "appropriate action to convene a constitutional convention" in connection with the merger proposal.
- They named a 10-member committee to help draft a constitution for the new joint union.

ORCB Pres. George H. Harris, who announced the action, later lost a bid for re-election in convention balloting but the result was not interpreted as a merger setback. Senior Vice Pres. Clyde F. Lane defeated Harris and Vice Pres. George Lechner in a three-way race.

The ORCB was the first union to act on merger since the presidents of three operating unions recommended amalgamation into one organization representing some 92,000 members.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert and Switchmen Pres. Neil P. Speirs spoke at the convention in favor of a single organization. Later, Gilbert said the ORCB action was a "major step forward in achieving the goal" of unity and announced he would "promptly" convene the BLF&E policy committee to prepare for merger.

In his convention speech, Gilbert called for a change to meet industry changes which have whittled down members' jobs.

House Unit Approves Broad Aid for Cities

A major new Administration program to make cities livable won a strong, 18-8 endorsement from the House Banking Committee.

The committee combined a package of labor-supported bills into an omnibus measure which includes:

- Pres. Johnson's demonstration cities program, keyed to rehabilitation of entire neighborhoods of decaying cities. It proposes coordinated programs of housing, public transportation, better schools and recreational facilities. The emphasis would be on rehabilitation of neighborhoods rather than a tear-down and relocation program.
- A program of federal grants for metropolitan area planning, involving cooperation between cities and suburbs.
- Federal mortgage insurance for developers of "new towns" planned to provide a variety of housing and community facilities.
- Mortgage insurance for construction of group practice health facilities where other financing is not available.

Davis-Bacon Act provisions were included in the bill to assure payment of prevailing wage rates on construction.

The measure faces a hard fight

N.Y. Pay Floor Set at $1.50 In New Law

Albany, N.Y.—A labor-backed compromise bill setting the minimum wage at $1.50 an hour in New York State has been signed by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

Worked out after Rockefeller had vetoed an earlier measure, it will give the state the second highest pay floor in the country when it becomes effective Jan. 1, 1967. Alaska currently has a minimum of $1.75 an hour.

It is expected to yield wage increases for 500,000 to 750,000 low-paid workers, and provides for a further rise to $1.60 an hour should Congress approve pending federal legislation.

CHARGING DiGiorgio Corp. with breaking its word, AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William F. Kircher interrupts company-called press conference to set the record straight as newsmen crowd around him. Kircher called company-sponsored "election"—June 24—"improper, invalid, immoral." # Kingsport Press Talks Break Down, Striking Unions File New Charges

Kingsport, Tenn.—Talks looking toward settlement of the three-year-old Kingsport Press strike here have collapsed.

Refusal by management of the nation's largest hard-cover book plant to reinstate more than 105 of nearly 1,000 strikers was blamed by the Allied Kingsport Press Unions for the latest stalemate.

A union statement said "we regretfully announce that the strike will continue" and that some unfair labor practice charges have been refiled, and new ones filed, with the National Labor Relations Board.

The charges accuse Kingsport Press management of refusing to bargain with the unions, making contract changes unilaterally, disregarding manning schedules and subcontracting work without notice.

The five unions involved are the Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Machinists, Stereotypers and the Typographers. They declared:

"The company's adamant attitude and hostility toward the collective bargaining process, and the striking unions in particular," demonstrate its "implacable design to destroy any relationship" with the unions and in effect "to punish employes who dared to strike."

The strike started March 11, 1963, as a contract dispute. The unions later filed unfair practice charges but withdrew them without prejudice last May 24 in the belief that there was a prospect for "meaningful bargaining negotiations."

The parties reopened talks in February, 1966, and renewed them in April and June.

At a June 7 meeting, management offered to reinstate 105 strikers—85 within six months, another 20 within a year.

The unions' counter-proposal called for reinstatement of all strikers in three steps over a nine-month period—a third within two weeks after the signing of a new contract, an additional third within four months, and the final third within nine months.

On June 22 the firm "completely rejected" the union proposal and, the unions said, "adhered rigidly to its original proposal." They added: "The futility of continuing any type of realistic strike settlement talks became apparent and the meeting was terminated."

Announcing resumption of a nationwide "Don't Buy Kingsport Products" campaign, the allied unions released a statement from Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. declaring, "It is obvious that Kingsport Press has no intention of offering a settlement" until forced to do so.

This means, Lewis said, that "every branch of the labor movement, particularly the central labor bodies, must renew their appeals to their local school boards to cease buying textbooks printed by this unfair employer."

"The entire labor movement must give this boycott top priority. We must get these strikers back on their jobs under fair conditions."

Grape Strikers' Suit Hits DiGiorgio Co. 'Election'

San Francisco—The Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and the National Farm Workers Association filed suit in California Superior Court here to void the results of a company-sponsored "election" among grape workers at two locations of the DiGiorgio Corp.

Attorneys for grape strikers asked the court to restrain DiGiorgio from recognizing any labor organization on the basis of the poll on the ground that it violates California labor laws.

In other developments:

• Gov. Edmund G. Brown named Ronald W. Haughton, Michigan industrial relations expert, to investigate the poll and make recommendations for settling the 10-month strike of grape workers for contract protections against low wages and intolerable working conditions.

• NFWA Leader Cesar Chavez and two clergymen were charged with trespassing at DiGiorgio's Barrego Springs ranch and held in jail at Ramona, Calif., for a justice court hearing. The three were accompanying eight workers who joined the NFWA strike and had returned to a work camp to get personal effects.

Delano Picketing

The NFWA has been picketing DiGiorgio's ranch at Delano and those of other growers.

Meanwhile the drive to organize all grape workers continued. The strikers are conducting a nationwide "Don't Buy DiGiorgio Products" drive with the full support of the AFL-CIO.

DiGiorgio heads a growers' coalition which opposes union organization. A legal dispute broke out when the corporation staged its informal poll of non-striking workers at two locations. A majority of the workers boycotted the vote but a minority wrote in the name of the expelled Teamsters.

Conductors Back Move For Merger

There is no question, he said, that "a united organization would bring more strength" to the bargaining table and help achieve the goal of "providing the best possible representation . . . at the most economic cost."

Plans to unite the three unions had been under study for nearly a year. One officer from each worked on a joint committee to draft a merger proposal.

Spokesmen for the three declared that a merger would not affect existing contracts and would leave traditional craft lines undisturbed.

Other operating brotherhoods are the AFL-CIO Railroad Trainmen and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Toronto Transit Union Negotiates Pay Hike

Toronto, Ont.—Some 2,700 members of the Amalgamated Transit Union won wage increases of 43 to 54 cents an hour under a new 27-month contract with the Toronto Transit Commission. For some 2,700 subway, bus and trolley operators, rates go immediately from $2.48 to $2.72 an hour and rise to $3 by December 1967.

Musicians to Push Talks on Networks

By Willard Shelton

Las Vegas, Nev.—The 69th convention of the Musicians, representing a quarter of a million members, gave a roar of approval to Pres. Herman Kenin's promise to fight for a "fairer share" of the television and radio networks' profits in New York negotiations opening in mid-July.

Reporting that the "state of the union is good," Kenin said it was prepared to meet head-on any effort of the "vast rich and complex" broadcasting industry to deny musicians an equitable part of their "manna from the heavenly airways" in new contracts replacing those that expire July 31.

The union has gained 2,000 members since its last convention, he said, and has built a pension fund that "flourishes" at a value of approximately $17 million.

The 1,000-plus delegates, representing 597 locals, also heard reports expressing gratification with final repeal of the federal cabaret tax, established in 1914 as a "temporary" wartime measure, which the union had attacked as a job-cutting burden on the entertainment business.

Delegates also devoted a substantial time to seminars and discussions of opportunities for increased employment of musicians in school systems under the federal school aid program of promoting cultural enrichment. Projects for participation by musicians must be worked out in accordance with legal requirements, they were warned, and approval of specific projects was needed at state, local and national levels.

Thompson Hailed

The convention gave a warm welcome to Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) who has been principal House sponsor of many programs, passed by Congress, to promote and encourage the cultural arts. Thompson pointed out that Congress completed action last year creating a National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities which is now part of the arts endowment.

A $25,000 matching grant, he observed, will permit the U.S. to serve as host to the Intl. Society for Music Education at Interlochen Academy, and a further grant was given the American Symphony Orchestra League.

"The awards which pleased me most," he said, were those to "commission new works for as many as 25 orchestras" and help the composers. "This is seed money which promises a rich harvest," he added.

A. J. Hayes, former president of the Machinists, paid tribute to the pioneering work of the Musicians federation as being the first to form "a lonely beachhead of professionalism in the labor movement." It also was the first union, under Pres. Emeritus James C. Petrillo, "to meet the problems of automation and consequent displacement of workers," Hayes declared.

Thus was first established, he said, "the principle that employes as well as employers are entitled to share in the benefits of technological progress."

Kenin pointed out that Petrillo had returned to active service with the union with primary responsibility for effecting merger of racially segregated locals. In 38 cities where such locals existed last year, mergers have been achieved in 12 and agreement on merger in six others, he said.

Thompson was given a gold membership card as an honorary member of the union in recognition of his promotion of the arts. Also awarded a gold card was the veteran musician Phil Harris of Hollywood. A special award, a bronze plaque, was made to Vice Pres. Fred R. Haviland of the Schlitz Brewing Co. for the company's promotion of live performances by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in both New York City and Milwaukee.

A series of bylaw changes was designed to regularize the dues structure for traveling musicians and meet the legal problems created by Taft-Hartley Act violation charges filed by orchestra leaders in the National Association of Orchestra Leaders. Kenin in his report pointed out that such charges are simple and inexpensive to make but may be "costly in time and effort" to the union. In more than 40 cases since passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, he observed, the Musicians' federation has not been found guilty "of a single unfair labor practice."

Kenin and Sec.-Treas. Stanley I. Ballard were nominated without opposition for re-election to their posts. For other executive board posts contests developed that were to be decided by secret ballot of the delegates.

Machinists Set Deadline In Dispute with Airlines

Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists has warned that 35,300 IAM members will stop work on five major airlines July 8 unless an acceptable agreement can be reached in negotiations still under way at the Labor Dept.

"We want a decent settlement, not a strike," Siemiller said. "If a strike comes, the responsibility will rest with the short-sighted men" in charge of the airlines—United, Trans World, Eastern, Northwest and National.

Noting that the five corporations reported 1965 profits of more than $200 million, Siemiller said "they are enjoying the greatest prosperity in their history. There is no question of ability to pay. The issue is whether the employees deserve to share in the prosperity of their industry—and how much."

The IAM represents mechanics and other ground crewmen at nearly every commercial airport in the nation. It has been trying for many months, it said, to get a fair settlement.

A presidential emergency board tried to resolve the dispute but the IAM's Airline Wage Policy Committee said its recommendations provided "no sound basis for settlement."

Siemiller said IAM members on the airlines are not satisfied with the offers made so far and, under federal law, have a right to strike.

"We regret the delays and inconveniences that will result," he said, "but we respectfully sugggest that complaints be referred to the managements of these five corporations." If the strike occurs, he said, 40 percent of U. S. air transport service will still be operating.

At 28th Convention:

U.S. Viet Nam Stand Endorsed by CWA

St. Louis—The Communications Workers gave a strong vote of confidence to U.S. policies in Viet Nam as some 1,500 delegates wound up four days of sessions at the union's 28th annual convention here.

The convention called the Viet Nam war "the most tragic immediate crisis" in the nation's foreign affairs, but declared the U.S. military commitment is necessary "to help defeat the Viet Cong subversion and the armed attacks of the North Vietnamese troops."

This commitment must continue, the CWA said, until the Communists agree to "a reasonable solution" through a negotiated peace that would guarantee to the South Vietnamese people the right "to peacefully choose their own government, enjoy civil liberties, vote in continuing free elections, and freedom to maintain a position of neutrality between the world power blocs if they so choose."

These positions were part of a broad-ranging statement on foreign policy with heavy emphasis on Latin America, where CWA locals since 1959 have taken part in a special program of union-to-union aid.

Reforms Stressed

The statement hailed recent gains in growth and reform legislation achieved through the Alliance for Progress between the U.S. and her Latin American neighbors. It voiced disappointment, however, "at the slow, even though significant, progress on more equitable distribution of tax burdens, action toward agrarian reforms, resettlement of landless peasants, construction of low-cost housing projects and improvements in educational facilities."

The real impetus for such reforms, the CWA said, must come "from those who will benefit from them the most: the lower income groups. This will require mass organizations built around populist political parties, cooperatives and credit unions and free trade unions."

The statement found one of the most powerful forces for this kind of social change in the American Institute for Free Labor Development. It commended the AIFLD for its work in training Latin American trade unionists and spurring direct labor participation in Alliance for Progress projects benefiting workers.

In a major internal decision, the convention voted to broaden the CWA's membership base by expanding the jurisdiction clause of the union's constitution to cover, besides communications workers, "those workers who wish to become part of the union regardless of their field of endeavor."

Through another constitutional amendment, the delegates gave the title "executive vice president" to the three current vice presidents and redesignated nine district directors and three national directors as vice presidents.

The convention approved salary increases for all officers, the first in four years, setting the rates at $29,400 for Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, an increase of $4,900; $24,000 for Sec.-Treas. W. A. Smallwood, an increase of $4,000; $22,400 for the executive vice presidents, an increase of $3,900, and $18,000 for vice presidents, an increase of $3,000.

Among other key actions of the delegates were resolutions that:

- Urged new efforts to win repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act and amendment of Senate rules to prevent the filibuster from obstructing a vote.
- Called for further Taft-Hartley amendments to streamline procedures of the National Labor Relations Board, strengthen remedies for unfair labor practices and remove restrictions against common-site picketing.
- Opposed the spreading use of wiretapping and eavesdropping equipment by government and industry and supported strong legislation to regulate its use.
- Called for specific legislation carrying out recommendations of the National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress to provide total economic security for all citizens.
- Spurred all CWA members to an active role in the 1966 COPE drives for voluntary dollar contributions and voter registration.

COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS were hailed by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne for their commitment to the union's growth that helped boost membership by about 10 percent during the past year. Beirne is shown as he delivered the keynote address to the CWA's 28th annual convention.

Merger Terms Won By Newspaper Guild

New York—The Newspaper Guild strike against the merged World Journal Tribune Inc. neared an end after nearly ten weeks as the Guild reached tentative agreement on all major issues that provoked the walkout preventing the planned publication of the papers on April 24.

Two other unions—the Mailers and the Pressmen — must reach agreement with the firm before the papers can prepare for publication. They intensified the pace of their negotiations following the Guild settlement.

Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy of the New York Guild outlined major points of the settlement at a meeting of the local's representative assembly, but full details were withheld until they have been submitted to a joint membership meeting of the three units involved, July 5.

It was clear, however, that Guild members would not return to work until all of the differences of the craft unions with the publishers have been ironed out.

Pres. Thomas M. Laura of the Mailers, a Typographical Union affiliate, reported some progress in negotiations for the first time in weeks. He indicated that the publishers had agreed to maintain 158 job situations of 189 that existed on the defunct papers.

William J. Kennedy, newly installed president of the Pressmen's local, presented new proposals to the publishers dealing with severance pay, a guarantee of five days' work a week, and contributions to welfare and pension funds.

The agreement reached by the Guild will run only until Mar. 30, 1967. Murphy listed the Guild's principal achievements as follows:

- More than 1,000 guildsmen are going back to work, instead of the 896 that the management originally said it planned to retain, and they are going back on the basis of seniority, with but few exceptions. A rehiring list has been established for 256 persons, also based on seniority.
- A $12 general wage package increase has been won with full retroactivity to Mar. 31, 1965, when the Guild contract expired.
- Automation and jurisdiction clauses equivalent to those prevailing in the contract with the New York Daily News have been won. No new equipment can be introduced without agreement of the Guild and none of the jobs traditionally in the Guild's jurisdiction can be transferred.
- A 90 percent union shop has been achieved by all departments.
- Improvements have been won in night differential, sick leave and work schedule clauses.
- There will be no ceiling on severance pay, and service credits will be carried over to the new papers.

The new papers—the morning Herald Tribune, the afternoon World Journal and the Sunday World Journal Tribune, will operate with one staff in advertising, circulation, publication and other commercial departments, but will maintain basically separate news staffs. However, reporters on a common beat, such as City Hall, will write stories that may be used by any of the three papers. Photographers and artists, Murphy said, would also operate as one staff for all three papers.

N.Y. Pay Floor Set at $1.50 In New Law

mise was a proviso authorizing the State Industrial Commissioner upon proof of hardship to exempt seasonal canning and freezing workers being paid more than the national minimum of $1.25 an hour. An estimated 1,100 of 23,000 workers in the industry would be affected.

All categories of workers exempt from the old minimum wage of $1.25 an hour were also excluded in the new legislation. They include domestic workers, farm laborers, taxi drivers, executives, clergymen and the employes of local, state and federal governments.

A bill to transfer domestics from the exempt to the non-exempt classification has been passed by the Assembly and is now being considered by a Senate committee.

Pres. Raymond R. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO said the bill the governor signed "shows what can be done when good will prevails and efforts are combined to aid those least favored in the economic scale."

He expressed regret that those earning less than $1.25 an hour will not be helped, but called enactment of the new law "gratifying."

The bill was one of two organized labor had strongly backed which Rockefeller signed at the same sitting.

The second granted the right of collective bargaining to hotel and restaurant workers who are employed by charitable, religious or educational organizations.

The bill grew out of a strike by restaurant workers in the Sloane House YMCA in New York where management refused to bargain with the Hotel & Restaurant Employes on the ground that the establishment was not required to do so under the law. It was enacted after a rally of affected workers at the State Capitol.

Pension, Wages Raised In 6-Week Bus Strike

Wage increases, dental care for office employes, and improved pensions for all were among major gains won in a six-week strike of 5,500 Western Greyhound Lines employes in an 11-state area, the Transit Union announced.

Bus drivers, maintenance workers and office personnel struck May 15. On June 23 they voted, 3,014 to 1,215, to accept a two-year pact based on a formula proposed by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

For office employes in San Francisco, ATU Div. 1471 won an agreement to establish a dental care program—first in the industry, the union said. Substantial pension improvements also were won for the western division, and will be sought for three other divisions when negotiations open Oct. 31.

The western settlement raises wage rates for drivers by 4 mills a mile, and for other workers by 10 cents an hour as of Mar. 1, 1966, plus an additional 5 cents next Mar. 1. The former mileage rate was 13.146 cents.

Management agreed that, in the second year of the contract, it will assume pension plan payments totaling 4 percent of wages, now paid by employes. After 30 years of service, workers at age 50 can retire at 40 percent of their average salary over the five highest years, on a scale rising to its high point at age 60.

Additional pension and vacation improvements, an eighth paid holiday, and wages adjusted to cost-of-living increases were won, along with a provision that drivers may wear short-sleeved shirts and no necktie in specified summer months.

Steel Union Certified At Otis Elevator Plant

Hamilton, Ont.—The Steelworkers have won bargaining rights in behalf of 650 employes of the Otis Elevator Co. here. The union was granted certification without a vote after demonstrating its majority.

TWUA Votes Dues Hike For Expanded Program

Montreal—Convention delegates re-elected the top officers of the Textile Workers Union of America and voted to finance an expansion program with higher dues and per capita.

Pres. William Pollock won re-election to a sixth two-year term. He defeated William R. Ewing of Meadville, Pa., by a 652-262 vote.

John Chupka, the TWUA's secretary-treasurer since 1953, was returned unopposed and the 20 incumbent vice presidents were re-elected in a field of 27.

Delegates approved an increase in monthly dues from $4 to $5 and a boost in per capita from $2 to $2.50. Earlier the convention had voted to double the union's strike benefits.

Major convention speakers included Interior Sec. Stewart L. Udall; Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.); Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.); Thomas C. Douglas, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party; Leon H. Keyserling, a former chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, and Nicholas Zonarich, organizing director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Delegates approved resolutions including:

- A call for a congressional investigation of the J. P. Stevens Co. and "the anti-union conspiracy in the South."
- An attack on wage guidelines in the absence of price and profit limitations.
- Strong support for pending civil rights legislation.
- Support of the President on Viet Nam, coupled with a call for greater emphasis on economic assistance.

Salaries of the union's principal officers were raised by $1,500, bringing Pollock to $20,000 a year and Chupka to $17,500.

The 947 delegates expressed strong support during the convention for the triple goal the TWUA has set for itself—closing the gap between U.S. and Canadian wages, narrowing the lag in textile industry pay as compared with other manufacturing industries, and stepping up the pace of organizing.

Craig, Schreier To Head Regions

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced the assignment of George Craig as director of AFL-CIO Region III comprising Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, and John Schreier as director of Region XI, Michigan, effective July 1.

Craig and Schreier have been serving as assistant directors of organization at AFL-CIO headquarters.

Meany announced also these changes in the regional structure of the AFL-CIO:

Region II, now comprising New York and New Jersey will cover only New York.

Region IV, now comprising Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia, will include Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Region III, now comprising Pennsylvania, will be made up of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware.

A Quiet Revolution

A QUIET, PEACEFUL, but nevertheless major revolution has swept the country in the past two years providing a basis for the fulfillment of the promise of American democracy.

Simply stated, the revolution has established that one man's vote shall be equal in weight to any other man's vote; that a representative democracy shall be based on people, not on geography.

The revolution's rallying cry, derived from the U.S. Supreme Court's historic decision, has been "one man, one vote." Today the overwhelming majority of the states have reapportioned their legislatures to achieve this goal.

In effect the country has caught up with the long-term trend toward urbanization. The people in the urban areas, who constitute about three-quarters of the national population, will at long last have an effective and fairly measured voice in the law-making.

The outcry that greeted the court decision has subsided as the equity of the case became clear. The opposition of old-line conservatives, such as Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen, has collapsed in the face of a determined effort, led in large part by organized labor, that the decision would not be subverted.

But the reapportioned legislatures and the redistricting of congressional seats in many states will fall short of the expectations of the one man, one vote campaign if those in the urban areas do not respond actively on the selection of candidates, the debate on the issues and the mechanics of registration and voting.

Urban America has a unique chance, especially this year, to give new leadership, new vigor, new ideas and faces to the state legislatures. There is the opportunity now to enact the vital legislation that has been killed and pigeonholed by "rotten borough" legislatures in the past.

This revolution in American political life must not be frittered away by an apathetic electorate.

13-Year Rebound

IT'S TAKEN 13 long years, but in the spring of 1966 the number of factory production and maintenance workers finally climbed back to where it was in 1953.

For the 13-year period, the number of production and maintenance workers dropped off sharply from the 1953 level—a record high in the postwar years. In the past 2.5 years, as production jumped 26 percent, the number of factory jobs increased by 1.5 million.

The 13-year lag reflects more than the limping pace of production. It discloses also the inroads of automation and new technology. In the years between 1953 and 1966 more than 10 million persons were added to the labor force. Prior to the pickup that started in 1961 many were unemployed or under-employed. But millions more found jobs in the service, white collar and government areas. Job opportunities were more limited in the factories and plants.

The catch-up in factory jobs demonstrates clearly that a vigorous economy, growing annually in meaningful terms, can provide jobs in the factories as well as in the newer growth areas.

Ordman Cites 'Creative Capacities':

Holdout Firms Urged to Heed Economic Value of Bargaining

The following is excerpted from an address by Arnold Ordman, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, to the Labor Law Section of the Tennessee Bar Association.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING, I venture to state, is here to stay. It has been national policy now for over 30 years. And the reason for this is that collective bargaining, free collective bargaining, bargaining in good faith, works. I need not remind you that other societies, other countries, with as great or greater potential in manpower and resources, have not matched our progress.

There are, of course, soft spots even in our thriving economy. There are ethnic groups who have not yet been afforded an equal opportunity for advancement in their political or their economic position. And there are, in various geographical areas and communities scattered throughout the United States, individuals or groups who do not wholly accept the national policy to encourage freedom of organization and collective bargaining, despite the fact that it is national policy.

We would serve our clients well—and incidentally all your respective clients are also ours—if we educated them to the law's requirements, not alone because transgressions are illegal and because they might even prove costly, but because adherence to the law will be a factor in their economic betterment. This is a lesson which most of management and most of labor have learned and the remainder must learn. We must be their teachers.

Collective bargaining has demonstrated that it has creative capacities which can fashion effective approaches in specific situations to solve the problems of an ever-changing industrial society. Illustrations abound. One is found in the General Motors-UAW wage formula under which employes are guaranteed wages which are protected against price erosion and are also guaranteed—in return for not resisting the introduction of labor-saving machinery—that they will share in the benefits of the increased productivity of the economy as a whole through the payment of additional wages based on an "annual improvement factor."

Another illustration is the progress sharing plan developed by Kaiser and the United Steelworkers of America. Still another is found in the 1960 West Coast Longshore Automation Agreement which granted broad freedom to management to introduce labor-saving machinery and work out new crew arrangements. In return, the employers agreed to pay into a jointly-managed automation fund some $5.5 million a year for 5.5 years which would be used to compensate the employes for their agreement to modify old manning practices and work rules. The fund was used to insure the regularly registered longshoremen a minimum weekly wage guarantee as a protection against losses resulting from new cargo handling methods and was also used to provide for early retirement benefits and more generous mandatory retirement benefits to soften the job impact of automation.

THESE ILLUSTRATIONS may or may not be the ideal or ultimate solutions even for the particular situations involved and different approaches may be as appropriate or more appropriate for different situations. But it remains true that, in the cited situations, potentially disruptive situations, which could have taken on major dimensions, were averted. Surely, the (National Labor Relations) Act's provisions requiring bargaining about these matters were a factor in promoting the rational and peaceful handling of the problems the parties resolved through collective bargaining.

We need time and only you can give it to us. The bulk of our caseload still arises from elementary violations committed by that small segment of our industrial sector which has not yet accepted the national policy enunciated in the statute.

It is at the same time an anachronism and our frustration that such violations persist long after such conduct has been outlawed. If, with your help, and with greater knowledge of and faith in the salutary objectives of the act, such cases could be eliminated, the board could substantially reduce its caseload and sharply reduce the time period required for processing the more difficult, the more subtle, the more novel and the more important cases from the standpoint of the nature of the principles involved. The litigants, the bar, and the public interest in establishing and maintaining the national labor policy would be better served.

Collective bargaining means more than industrial stability and job security. It makes possible industrial self-government in which employers and employes stop talking about "rights" and consider and resolve their industrial problems. Our system of private enterprise will be furthered and strengthened by the industrial democracy the National Labor Relations Act seeks to promote, maintain, and improve.

Morgan Says:

'Petnapping' Legislation Proves Value of Letters to Congress

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

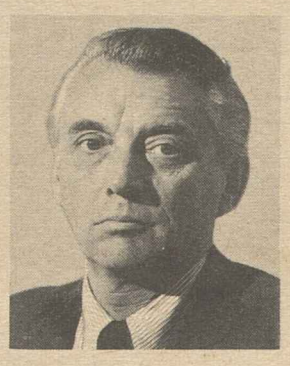
SOMETHING HAPPENED on Capitol Hill recently which should reassure skeptical citizens that there really can be meaning to that time-worn piece of advice, "write your congressman." The Senate, without a dissenting vote, passed a bill to prevent "petnapping" and improve the care of animals used in scientific and medical research. The House had already approved a similar measure but certain conflicts of the two versions must now be worked out in conference before the legislation can be sent to the White House for the President's signature. There might not have been any bill if senators and representatives had not been besieged by letters from their constituents. This flood was quickened by belated but vivid attention given by newspaper editorials and magazine articles to the scandals of cruel treatment and thefts involved in the supply of pets and domestic animals for laboratory experiments.



Morgan

Some weeks ago, Rep. George W. Grider (D-Tenn.) told Congressional Quarterly, "On no other piece of legislation which I have sponsored have I received so much mail." He said the writers were not just "misty-eyed little old ladies who love animals," but were "some of the leading physicians of Memphis, businessmen, lawyers, accountants, housewives, Girl Scouts, nurses, engineers and school children."

Ironically, the American Medical Association mounted a campaign against the measure on grounds it would impair the freedom of research and its regulatory aspects would dangerously invite harassment. Bureaucrats, it is true, are strangely susceptible to the disease of heavy-handedness, but a cure for this does not take precedence over stopping the bootleg traffic in animals for research and the ghastly cruelties and negligent handling inflicted on them in the process.

The Humane Society of the United States reports such extreme cases as follows: "Some (research animals) are burned with blow torches or submerged in scalding water, some are beaten with mallets until they die of shock or internal injuries, some are inoculated with cancer cells and die a lingering and agonized death, hundreds of thousands undergo major surgery and are cruelly neglected while they recover or die. Cosmetic companies test their products by dropping them into the eyes of rabbits immobilized in stocks."

Let's not kid ourselves. Animals are needed for research and it is impossible to eliminate pain and suffering in experiments with them. But the excesses of torture and neglect have left Congress no alternative but to set legal standards for treatment just as the demand for specimens raised by vastly increased research has necessitated a law against the black market in pets, which has become big business. Sen. Joseph Clark (D-Pa.) discovered one such dealer netted $700,000 in one year.

The bill passed by the Senate, sponsored by Clark and Sen. Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) is tougher than the measure which Rep. W. R. Poage (D-Tex.) steered through the House. The Senate bill would give the secretary of agriculture authority not only to set standards for humane treatment but to inspect premises for compliance. Animal dealers would have to be licensed and a research facility could only buy from a licensed dealer. This, obviously, is to protect pet owners and prevent the use of stolen animals for research purposes.

Neither measure attempts to regulate the handling of animals in actual experiments. The House bill's provision for humane treatment before research begins was limited to dogs and cats. The Senate version extended that to include, generally, monkeys, guinea pigs, hamsters and rabbits.

Stiff resistance can be expected to the stronger Senate proviso that research facilities must be regulated by inspection, not merely licensed in terms of their adequacy in care and handling of animals. However, as the legislation goes into conference, Clark's office is optimistic that both that provision and the extension of protection beyond dogs and cats may be preserved.

SENSIBLY ADMINISTERED, this legislation, far from being an impediment to science, as some seem to fear, will instead raise the standards of decency. Such an atmosphere should not be discouraging to research. American animal lovers may then turn their attention to another project already seriously being considered in France: medicare for pets. A kennel operator in Paris named Robert Brasseur has come up with an insurance subscription scheme, voluntary, which would cover as much as 80 percent of veterinary and medicine costs not only for pets but farm animals too. For some families I know such costs are more than children's doctor bills.

Of course the U.S. medicare program for humans, elderly at that, is just going into effect, but even if we can cope with our cruelties only one at a time we may be getting somewhere.

Momentum Gaining:

Kingsport Press Boycott Wins Broad Support in Communities

A NATIONWIDE BOYCOTT of books and materials printed by Kingsport Press is gaining momentum and winning wide community support, the coordinator of a five-union strike against the Tennessee firm said.

Putting an estimate of "$2 to $3 million" on the annual business loss to Kingsport Press as a result of the boycott, Pres. A. J. DeAndrade of the Pressmen predicted that the "primary boycott . . . will eventually bring this company to the point where they will have to sit down with us and negotiate an equal, fair and competitive contract."

DeAndrade, an AFL-CIO vice president, appeared on the weekly public service interview, Labor News Conference, produced by the AFL-CIO and heard on the Mutual radio network.

DeAndrade pointed out that most of Kingsport Press' business is in textbooks and that boards of education in many cities have, after examining the facts, formally resolved to discontinue purchases pending settlement of the dispute. Such action has already been taken in New York, Cleveland and Newark, and the "matter is pending in Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia and many other major cities," he said.

"THE PUBLIC'S MONEY, or the taxpayers' money, should not be spent for books printed under scab or strike conditions," he said. "We feel that there are other publishers who are paying equal and fair wages and fringes from whom the boards of education can get books of a similar nature—books just as good for the teaching of children."

DeAndrade said that the strike, involving more than 1,200 workers and now well into its third year, followed the company's rejection of the unions' joint offer to submit the issues to arbitration.

Questioning DeAndrade were Frank Porter, labor reporter for the Washington Post, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

LAS VEGAS, NEV.—The political gossip from population-heavy California is filled with the incantations of columnists, all of them speculating on the prospects of the Republican gubernatorial TV star, Ronald Reagan, against incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown.

The population of the desert state of Nevada is growing, too, although Nevada is entitled to only one member in the House of Representatives as compared to nearly 40 for California.

There is, almost unreported, the same kind of political battle brewing here as in California—a contest between a Democratic governor of eight years, Grant Sawyer, and a rising GOP charmer, Paul Laxalt, who is now lieutenant governor.

Take it from this correspondent—the issues are precisely those that would be familiar in any political contest in the country.

Laxalt and a Republican running mate announced joint candidacy for statehouse office in a press conference declaring that Nevada could finance its needs without "new or added taxes."

"We have to determine if we are paying too much for welfare," said Laxalt, thus assuring everyone that the lush resort cities have not totally abolished poverty in the state. "Also if we are getting our complete dollar return on education money," he added.

THE SUBURBAN community of North Las Vegas even has a group of taxpayers seeking to prohibit renewal projects, largely federally subsidized, in residential areas.

Urban renewal projects are apparently a species of hostile status symbols for members of any taxpayers association, here as in outlying areas of midwestern and Atlantic seaboard central cities. The group once threatened members of the city council with recall elections if they voted for acceptance of federal funds for urban renewal.

Democratic Gov. Sawyer, with eight years of office behind him, knows very well that one of the principle problems of all states is how to raise the revenues for needed services despite heavy infusions of federal funds.

Every governor hates to take the initiative in raising state income taxes; whether Republican or Democratic, he will usually prefer higher sales taxes or some species of special levy such as the state "cabaret" tax voted in Nevada last year, immediately after the 50-year-old federal "cabaret" tax was repealed as destructive of jobs.

SO TAX POLICY is now an issue in the prospective upcoming election between Sawyer and Laxalt. Sawyer acknowledges that "alternative" sources of revenue may be needed as substitutes for the cabaret tax—a warm issue to members of the entertainment unions in the state's resort cities.

Laxalt announced for the Republican nomination for governor with a declaration that industrial development was urgently needed in the state but that he had not given a specific program "any intensive thought until the last several months."

He sounds very much like Reagan in California, although he lacks the slick platform performance of the practiced movie actor and TV star. The Sawyer-Laxalt contest is almost unknown nationally, but it is about the same as Brown and Reagan and will determine party control of the state and maybe the election of U.S. senators in the future, among other things.

THE NATIONWIDE BOYCOTT against products of Kingsport Press is gaining momentum and wide community support, Pressmen's Pres. A. J. DeAndrade (center), coordinator of the five-union strike against the firm, told Harry Conn (left), editor of Press Associates, Inc., and Frank Porter of the Washington Post on the weekly AFL-CIO program, Labor News Conference. Much of the company's business is in textbooks, he said, adding that appeals to school boards to change to the products of other publishers have been successful in a number of cities.

FIVE UNIONS were represented at the first Quaker Oats AFL-CIO School at Ottawa, Ill., to help develop bargaining liaison and techniques. Education & Research Dir. James Wolfe of the Brewery Workers (center, at far end of table) coordinated the program. Other unions participating were the Auto Workers, Chemical Workers, Machinists and Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. Instructors, besides Wolfe, were Industrial Union Dept. Rep. Don Doherty (at Wolfe's left), Larry Ahern, Chemical Workers research and education director, and Assistant AFL-CIO Education Dir. Otto Pragan.

'Save Our Shipping' Parley Pushes Fight to Strengthen Merchant Fleet

as a goal, was described during the sessions as a sound law that has not been enforced.

The conference was assured of the continuing support of the AFL-CIO by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, representing Pres. George Meany. Biemiller cited recent news stories about the giant shipbuilding program which is expected to give Soviet Russia a merchant fleet twice that of this country by 1971. He also recalled fears that have been expressed about the "possibilities of economic blackmail" in such a situation.

"The primary interest of the AFL-CIO is in the security of the U.S. and of the free world, which relies upon the U.S. for protection," he said. "We are convinced that the security of the U.S., and of the free world, requires an adequate American merchant marine, including the continued maintenance of shipyards and of a supply of skilled maritime workers. . . .

"We support the proposition set forth in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. We believe it should at least be implemented. Once that decision is firmly made, men of good will and of common purpose can readily come to agreement on tactics."

Hall said that what the industry does in the next six months "will determine if we are to succeed in keeping alive what I regard as the highest profession of all, going to sea under the American flag."

It must be assumed, he declared, that the industry has to survive because it is needed for defense purposes, to round out the national economy and to keep the balance of payments problem within bounds.

Berg reminded the delegates of their responsibility for the jobs of members of their unions, warned that protection of the safety and economy of the U.S. and the free world are at stake, and urged pressure on Congress to enact the kind of ship construction and operation program that will keep this country alive as a maritime power.

Rep. Edward Garmatz (D-Md.), chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee, declared it is imperative that his committee be given authority over maritime fiscal affairs.

Rep. Robert D. Sweeney (D-O.) and Pres. Robert Mayer of the West Coast Shipbuilding Association both attacked Defense Dept. shipping policymakers. The latter called for a congressional investigation to bring into the open advocates of policies which make the transportation of arms and equipment for the free world dependent on the ships and crews of other nations.

Rep. Thomas M. Pelly (R-Wash.) said the industry is in "a sort of budgetary purgatory from which it must be released if it is ever to grow and prosper."

Johnson Out

He and several other speakers blamed the Administration for government failure to act to strengthen the merchant fleet. Gleason urged direct approaches to the White House now that Nicholas Johnson, recently named to the Federal Communications Commission, is out as maritime administrator. Johnson's shift to the FCC was welcomed at the maritime conference.

Archibald King, president of Isthmian Lines, Inc., deplored the "terrible fallacy of the prolonged apathy and misguided philosophy" that has brought the merchant marine to "a very dangerous level." Immediate "remedial action is essential to avoid disaster," he declared.

Capt. J. W. Clark, chairman of the Committee of American Steamship Lines, called it "inconceivable" that U.S. shipping can be permitted to decline at a time when the Russians are building up their merchant fleet with the "announced intention to dominate the world's sealanes."

Pres. Ralph E. Casey of the American Merchant Marine Institute called on the President to make public his determination as to the future shape of maritime policy and appealed for constructive, cooperative effort to "restore this country to her former maritime greatness."

Senate Weakens Bill On Employment Service

The Senate weakened an already watered-down bill to update the Federal-State Employment Service before sending it to the House.

An alliance of Republicans and Southern Democrats knocked out of the bill a ban on referral of farm workers to employers involved in a labor dispute. The deletion, proposed by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), was approved on a 46-39 rollcall.

Before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller had urged senators to vote against the Prouty amendment.

"The AFL-CIO is unqualifiedly opposed to having the public employment service aid employers to break strikes or reinforce their lockouts," he said.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D-N.J.) strongly protested the Prouty amendment during the Senate debate, warning that it could lead to "government strikebreaking at the taxpayers' expense."

The legislation fell far short of the goals labor had urged in testimony calling for a federalized public employment service rather than a token effort to "paper over the weak spots" of the present network of 50 state-operated agencies.

As passed by the Senate by voice vote, the bill would amend the 33-year-old Wagner-Peyser Act by separating the service's unemployment benefits functions from its manpower service role—a separation endorsed by labor. It also gives the secretary of labor authority—subject to judicial review—to withhold federal funds from states which fail to meet standards for operations of job centers. It also authorizes loans to enable jobless workers to relocate in areas where there are work opportunities.

Many of the bill's provisions are designed to write into law practices already followed by the U.S. Employment Service.

On the negative side, from labor's viewpoint, the Senate bill limits recruiting of workers for jobs to those who are unemployed or underemployed, except where manpower is needed for national security needs. It also permits states to contract out part of their functions to private employment agencies.

Losey Retires as Carmen's Officer

Kansas City, Mo.—The Railway Carmen have announced the retirement of a veteran vice president, Thornton E. Losey, and the appointment of a successor.

Losey, a union member for nearly 49 years and vice president since 1945, will be succeeded by Lewis F. Wood, secretary of the Carmen's executive board.

Statute 60 Years Old:

Rail Unions Urge End of 16-Hour Law

Changes in the 60-year-old law that permits American railroads to work their operating employes 16 hours a day were urged on Congress by rail union leaders and the AFL-CIO.

Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen told House and Senate subcommittees that the present law is "grossly inadequate" in the light of today's longer trains, faster speeds and heavier loads handled by a reduced workforce.

Federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller voiced support for a change in the Hours of Service Act passed in 1907. Forcing men to work long hours without adequate rest, he wrote in letters to all members of the subcommittees, imposes "intolerable physical and mental strain on workers" in high-speed, long-train operations.

Chief executives of the Railroad Signalmen, the Transportation-Communication Employes and the Conductors & Brakemen also sent statements backing the amendments.

Gilbert testified in support of bills by Rep. Torbert H. Macdonald (D-Mass.) and Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.).

The BLFE president urged that changes would:

- Reduce from 16 to 12 the number of hours that operating employes can be worked without eight hours' rest.
- Limit engineers working alone to nine hours' continuous time on duty.
- Limit service by telegraphers, dispatchers and similar workers to nine or 13 hours, depending on the number of shifts involved.
- Require that time spent by enginemen in "deadheading" back to their starting place not be counted as a rest period.
- Set a minimum penalty of $500 for every violation of the law.

Gilbert cited a 30 percent increase in train speeds, 50 percent in train tonnage, and 40 percent train length over the last 20 years alone. In the same period, he noted, the work force has been reduced 40 percent.

"The obvious result," Gilbert said, "has been the shouldering of an increased transportation burden and its hazards by relatively fewer rail workers." The practice of overworking an understaffed force creates serious safety problems and causes men to be worked to the limit of their physical endurance at times, he declared.

Minor Cost Changes

He said the changes would have little financial impact on the industry, but would lead to more efficient service because employes will be better rested.

Listing abuses under the present law, Gilbert cited the case of a Louisville & Nashville locomotive engineer who worked 30 hours in a 38-hour stretch, but spent only two hours of his eight hours rest at home. Most of the engineer's "rest" period was spent "deadheading home in an engine cab," Gilbert testified.

The law of 1907 was adequate, he concluded, when one steam locomotive hauled 30 cars and moved at average speeds of 10 miles an hour or less. It was not intended, he said, as a "device to permit excessive overtime" or to give railroads a license to schedule work on a 16-hour basis.

Auto Safety Measure Approved by Senate

A strong auto safety bill passed the Senate unanimously and Pres. Johnson urged the House to "speed passage of this vital legislation that will benefit every man, woman and child."

The bill, stronger than the legislation the Administration originally sought, directs the secretary of commerce to set up safety standards to cover all motor vehicles, including cars, buses, trucks and motorcycles. Foreign cars brought into the United States would also be covered.

Interim standards, based largely on safety requirements already demanded by the government for vehicles it buys for its own use, would be published by next Jan. 31 and put into effect from six months to a year thereafter. The following year, permanent standards would be issued, based on government research and testing. They would be revised periodically thereafter.

The Senate bill also requires manufacturers to notify the government of all defects uncovered in car models.

The Senate rejected proposals for criminal penalties and set a fine of $1,000 for each violation, up to a maximum of $400,000.

The legislation had strong backing from consumer groups—and was endorsed by the Auto Workers, whose members build the cars. Auto industry employers fought the bill, but an industry spokesman said after the Senate vote that "we can live with it."

A big boost for the legislation came through the public attention focused on Ralph Nader, whose book "Unsafe at Any Speed" moved into the best seller lists after it was disclosed that General Motors hired private detectives to investigate Nader.

Despite the unanimous Senate passage, the bill faced problems in a divided House Commerce Committee. The committee initially voted down a proposal to adopt the Senate bill and set about trying to write its own version.

Mine Safety Bill Cleared by Senate

The Senate voted 57-18 to bring virtually all types of mines under federal inspection similar to that now provided for coal mines. The House last September had passed a mine safety measure and a conference committee will try to resolve differences between the bills.

Two amendments were narrowly defeated. One would have permitted a state to take over responsibility for inspection if it had a program meeting federal standards. The other would have exempted sand and gravel operations. The labor-supported bill also requires the secretary of the interior to develop health and safety standards.

New Political Era:

1 Man, 1 Vote 'Revolution' Ends Rural Control of States

in violation of the state constitution.

This touched off a rash of suits in other states, but it was not until 1964 that the Supreme Court spelled out the full implications of its ruling in decisions declaring:

- Both houses of a legislature must be based on population. The "federal analogy" of a House representing people and a Senate representing geographical areas is not applicable to state legislatures.
- The right to equal representation can't be taken away by a majority vote. A plan departing from one man, one vote standards is unconstitutional even if it has been approved in a referendum.

With the ground rules set, the pace of reapportionment speeded up. The biggest rush came during the past 19 months, when one or both chambers in 39 states were reapportioned.

The ripples from the original court decisions are still spreading—to a subsequent one man, one vote ruling on congressional districts and, more recently, to lower court decisions on the makeup of city and county legislative bodies.

For a time there was the threat of a constitutional amendment to turn back the clock, sponsored by Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. But support for the Dirksen amendment dwindled rapidly as legislatures were reapportioned and the threat appeared to have been finally put to rest when the amendment failed for the second straight year to approach the needed two-thirds majority in the Senate.

The state by state roundup on reapportionment which follows is based largely on a report prepared by Congressional Quarterly, an authoritative, non-partisan publication.

ALABAMA—At the time of the Supreme Court decision, Alabama's legislature had not been reapportioned for more than 60 years and districts with 25 percent of the population elected a majority of the House and Senate. Reapportionment was completed last fall, when a three-judge federal court upheld the redistricting of the Senate, but substituted its own formula for the House. The court said the House redistricting plan adopted by the legislature was gerrymandered to prevent the election of Negroes.

ALASKA—The Alaska Supreme Court recently upheld a reapportionment plan for the Senate proclaimed last year by Gov. William A. Egan (D). The governor has authority under Alaska's constitution to reapportion the House. The court held that he also has "implied" authority to do the same for the Senate.

ARIZONA—A three-judge federal court this year imposed a temporary reapportionment of both the House and the Senate after a special session of the legislature failed to come up with an acceptable plan. It will apply to the elections in November.

ARKANSAS—Under court order, the legislature was redistricted last November by the State Board of Apportionment. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the plan.

CALIFORNIA—Until the legislature acted last fall—after repeated court prodding—10 percent of the population elected a majority of the Senate. The new one man, one vote apportionment shifts control to populous Southern California.

COLORADO—Both chambers of the legislature are now apportioned on a one man, one vote basis, although some revisions may be made. Both state and federal courts have been involved in the reapportionment process, and it was a Colorado case which led the Supreme Court to rule that the constitutionally protected right to equal representation can't be denied even if an alternative plan is approved in a statewide referendum.

CONNECTICUT—A bipartisan reapportionment plan has been adopted and voters approved a state constitutional amendment requiring reapportionment every 10 years in line with "federal constitutional standards." The State AFL-CIO was a party to the suit which brought about reapportionment of the legislature, where 12 percent of the population had been able to elect a majority of the House, 32 percent a majority of the Senate.

DELAWARE — Industrial areas of Delaware came close to doubling their representation in the House and Senate as the legislature was reapportioned for the first time since 1897. A Republican challenge to the House redistricting has not yet been decided in federal court.

FLORIDA—Before reapportionment, one rural vote equalled 100 Miami votes and less than 15 percent of the state's population elected a majority of the legislature. After several tries, the legislature this year adopted a plan which met the approval of a federal court.

GEORGIA—A reapportionment plan which fell short of full one man, one vote standards is in effect on a temporary basis. But a federal court has directed that reapportionment be completed by May 1, 1967, for use in the 1968 elections.

HAWAII—The House was reapportioned in 1964, but Senate reapportionment proved a thorny problem for the courts. The U.S. Supreme Court earlier this year reversed a lower court decision and allowed a plan adopted by the legislature to stand for the 1966 elections. The Senate reapportionment uses registered voters as a population basis, and sets up several multi-member districts. The legislature is expected to tackle the reapportionment problem anew next year.

IDAHO—Starting with 17 percent control of the Senate and 33 percent control of the House, Idaho made several attempts to come up with a constitutionally-acceptable reapportionment plan. This year it apparently succeeded. A plan adopted by the legislature in March has been approved by a federal court.

ILLINOIS—The Illinois Senate has been reapportioned by the courts, the House by a bipartisan reapportionment commission. Failure of the legislature to agree on reapportionment had led to a unique at-large election of the House in 1964—with the Democrats capturing control.

INDIANA—A federal court panel last November chose reapportionment plans for both the House and Senate from among an assortment of bills passed by the legislature. After having 1963 and 1965 reapportionments upset by the courts, a special session of the legislature passed four alternative plans for each House, inviting the court to take its pick.

IOWA — The Iowa Supreme Court in April approved a temporary reapportionment of the legislature, but said changes would have to be made for the 1968 elections. The court objected to at-large elections in multi-member districts. Iowa made its initial start towards one man, one vote representation through a court suit initiated by the State AFL-CIO. At that time, 27 percent of the voters elected a majority of the House and 34 percent controlled the Senate.

KANSAS—After a 1964 reapportionment was invalidated by the courts, the legislature this year passed a House redistricting plan which was approved by the Kansas Supreme Court. A federal court has put back the deadline for reapportioning the Senate until Apr. 1, 1968, thus giving senators elected for four years an opportunity to serve out their full terms.

KENTUCKY—No court challenge has been raised to the 1963 reapportionment of both the House and Senate on a population basis.

LOUISIANA—The legislature is struggling to come up with an acceptable Senate reapportionment plan under warning that a federal court panel will act if it fails.

MAINE—The House was reapportioned in 1964 and a bipartisan constitutional amendment to apportion the Senate on a population basis, with a maximum variance of 10 percent, will be on a referendum ballot in November.

MARYLAND — State courts approved reapportionment plans for both the House and Senate this year. The Maryland legislature had passed two plans, leaving the decision to the courts. Previously, 14 percent of the voters elected a majority of the Senate, 35 percent a majority of the House.

MASSACHUSETTS — Both House and Senate appear to meet one man, one vote standards and no court challenge is pending. The state constitution requires reapportionment again next year.

MICHIGAN—The State AFL-CIO had pioneered in court challenges to a malapportioned legislature even before the Supreme Court decisions. A temporary court-imposed reapportionment adopted for the 1964 elections will be continued at least until 1970 census figures are available for a new try, the Michigan Supreme Court ruled this spring. The ruling came after both an eight-member bipartisan commission and the court itself had deadlocked in an effort to work out a permanent plan. The 1964 reapportionment, ending control of the Senate by districts with 29 percent of the population, brought Democratic control of the legislature last year for the first time in 30 years.

MINNESOTA — Two reapportionment plans passed by the conservative-dominated legislature were vetoed by Gov. Karl F. Rolvaag. A third try received the governor's approval in May of this year.

MISSISSIPPI—A 1963 reapportionment—the first since 1890—is still short of one man, one vote standards. A federal court may act if the legislature can't do better.

MISSOURI — Bipartisan commissions have reapportioned both the House and Senate and a constitutional amendment confirming the procedure was ratified by the voters early this year.

MONTANA—A federal court panel drew up a reapportionment plan for the 1966 elections, when a constitutional amendment will be submitted to the voters. Previously 16 percent of the population controlled the Senate, 37 percent the House.

NEBRASKA — A three-judge federal court this year upheld a 1965 reapportionment of the nation's only one-house legislature. Previously representation had been based about 75 percent on population, 25 percent on geography.

NEVADA—Under court order, the legislature ended long-standing rural domination at a special session last fall. A federal court panel approved the plan this spring, although warning that it "approached dangerously close to the edge of unconstitutional waters" because of deviations from population standards. Previously 8 percent of the voters elected a majority of the Senate, 29 percent a majority in the House.

NEW HAMPSHIRE—State was reapportioned last year following constitutional changes which shifted basis of Senate representation from taxable property to population and ended provision for small town representation.

NEW JERSEY—A constitutional convention recently approved a population-based apportionment procedure, subject to ratification by the voters in November. A temporary reapportionment is now in effect.

NEW MEXICO—The House has been reapportioned, but a three-judge federal court this spring rejected the reapportionment of the Senate and ordered its own plan put into effect, at least for 1966.

NEW YORK—After an intricate series of court battles and the passage of four alternative reapportionment plans by a lame duck Republican legislature, this is the situation: The state court of appeals in March ordered into effect for the November elections, "and thereafter until validly superseded," a reapportionment plan drafted by a five-member bipartisan commission established by the court. A 1967 state constitutional convention will have the option of drawing up a new plan or officially adopting the court-imposed formula.

NORTH CAROLINA — The legislature met a court-imposed deadline for reapportionment and the result met the approval of a three-judge federal panel.

NORTH DAKOTA—A federal court panel rejected the reapportionment plan voted by the legislature and imposed its own redistricting formula, at least for 1966.

OHIO — A redistricting plan drafted by an all-Republican state apportionment board has been approved by federal courts and will apply for the 1966 elections. Earlier, voters had turned down a labor-opposed apportionment plan which would have gerrymandered the state to ensure GOP control.

OKLAHOMA—A temporary reapportionment plan drawn up by a federal court for the 1964 elections was made permanent when the legislature enacted it into law last year. Previously 25 percent of the voters elected a majority of the House, 29 percent controlled the Senate.

OREGON—The state continues close to one man, one vote standards without court action.

PENNSYLVANIA — The Pennsylvania Supreme Court imposed its own plan for the 1966 elections after the politically split legislature failed to meet a court-imposed deadline. The plan has been challenged in federal court.

RHODE ISLAND—The Democratic legislature overrode the Republican governor's veto and approved a reapportionment plan for the 1966 elections. A constitutional convention is working on a permanent apportionment formula for submission to the voters.

SOUTH CAROLINA — A federal court panel has upheld one of two bills reapportioning the Senate for the 1966 election and upheld existing apportionment of the House. The Senate must be reapportioned again in 1967.

SOUTH DAKOTA — Both houses reapportioned without court action.

TENNESSEE—This is the state where it all started with the Baker vs. Carr decision, but the smoke hasn't cleared yet. Several reapportionment plans were rejected by the courts until a 1965 redistricting law was allowed to stand by a federal court panel. However the state Supreme Court modified the Senate redistricting by disapproving subdistricting of large counties. Voters in November will also vote on several alternative constitutional changes on apportionment.

TEXAS—A federal court panel this year approved reapportionment of the House and Senate, but directed that changes be made in 1967.

UTAH — Legislature's reapportionment plan upheld by courts, except for a provision preserving the four-year terms of senators elected in 1964. The entire legislature must stand for election this year.

VERMONT — Since 1792, each town had one representative in the House and 12 percent of the population elected a majority. Under court order, the legislature reapportioned both the House and Senate and set up procedures for future reapportioning. Senate districts are based on total population, House districts on "legal voters."

VIRGINIA—On its second try, the Virginia legislature came up with a plan that met court approval.

WASHINGTON — Democrats and Republicans finally agreed on a reapportionment plan which passed court tests after two bills passed by a Democratic legislature had been vetoed by a Republican governor.

WEST VIRGINIA — State reapportioned under court pressure in 1964.

WISCONSIN — A temporary plan imposed by the Wisconsin Supreme Court in 1964 is still in effect since the legislature has been unable to agree on any alternate formula.

WYOMING — Legislature successfully redistricted the House, but a federal panel rejected the Senate formula and imposed its own plan, ending 24 percent control.

House Panel Adopts Civil Rights Measure

with the law and offer everyone equal treatment. The committee narrowly adopted an amendment, criticized by civil rights leaders, limiting protection to persons engaged in "lawful" activities.

As the House committee reached agreement on the measure, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee on behalf of the Administration bill with strengthening amendments.

Biemiller said he gave no credence to reports that Congress is "tired" of the civil rights issue. He added:

"We believe this Congress will recognize—as did the President in the message in which he submitted this bill—that the unresolved problems are many and great but that they can be solved, and indeed that they must be solved.

Mood of People

"We in the AFL-CIO are dedicated to the belief that true and absolute equality of opportunity is possible in America and we intend to help achieve it. That, we are confident, is the mood of the American people."

The Senate is expected to be the ultimate battleground for the civil rights bill, with the strong likelihood that a two-thirds majority will have to be mustered to beat a southern-led filibuster. That, at any rate, has been the pattern in the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964 and in the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen, who supported the two previous bills, this year sharply attacked the fair housing provisions sought by the Administration. A number of House members were reluctant to support a strong fair housing provision if it would be weakened in the Senate.

The final compromise, offered by Rep. Charles M. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.), considerably lessened the impact of the housing section.

It permits a home owner to sell his house either himself or through a real estate agent without regard to fair housing requirements. However, the real estate agent is prohibited from discriminating on his own. Exempt from coverage of the law are rentals of apartments in buildings with less than five dwelling units.

The committee did, however, approve one strengthening change sought by civil rights groups. It put in a provision for enforcement by a federal commission, similar to the mechanism of the National Labor Relations Board. The original bill would have required a complainant to sue for his rights.

Despite the compromise, Dirksen reiterated his opposition to fair housing legislation.

The current timetable is expected to bring the bill to the House floor sometime in August, under the "21-day rule" by which legislation can bypass the Rules Committee.

One aspect of the bill not widely noted was pointed up by Biemiller in his Senate testimony. He praised the ban on so-called "blue ribbon" juries, drawn from the upper economic brackets of the population. "Discrimination in selection for jury service against people having low incomes is decidedly not a peculiarly southern vice," Biemiller noted. Yet it "is just as violative of the equal protection of the law as discrimination on grounds of race."

Stressing the importance of open housing, Biemiller said that "equal opportunity in housing is intimately linked to equal opportunity in schooling and to other civil rights."

Urging the need for stronger laws dealing with crimes against civil rights workers and Negroes seeking to exercise their rights, Biemiller pointed out: "There have been numerous such crimes in recent years, but very few convictions in either the state or the federal courts."

Worker Group Re-elects Faupl To ILO Posts

Geneva—Rudolph Faupl of the Machinists, U.S. worker delegate to the Intl. Labor Organization, was re-elected to key committees of the ILO Governing Body at a one-day meeting here. These include the committees on finance and international organizations, as well as the special unit engaged in revamping the ILO's program and structure.

The Governing Body, which meets between annual conferences of the ILO, functions as an executive board for the United Nations specialized agency. It is made up of 12 worker representatives, 12 employer and 23 government delegates.

Jean Moeri, veteran Swiss trade unionist who has long headed the Governing Body's worker group, again was its unanimous choice as worker vice chairman.

Morio Aoki was elected to a one-year term as chairman, becoming the first Japanese delegate to head the Governing Body. He has represented his government in the ILO and other international agencies here for a number of years.

Faupl returned to Geneva for the Governing Body meeting after reporting to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in Washington on the U.S. worker delegation's walkout from the recent ILO conference over the election of a Communist government delegate as president. The Executive Council, supporting the action, noted that it was "a demonstration of protest . . . not a withdrawal from the ILO."

Broader Labor Role Sought in Foreign Aid

A bigger share of American aid to developing nations should be channeled through the trade union movement, the House Foreign Affairs Committee declared.

The committee accompanied its approval of the Administration's $3.4 billion foreign aid authorization bill with a strong directive to the administrators of the aid program to make greater use of democratic, nongovernmental organizations in the countries being helped.

The goal of attaining popular participation in development programs, the committee said, "can best be achieved through the fostering of cooperatives, labor unions . . . and other organizations which provide the training ground for leadership and democratic process."

In a section dealing with the Alliance for Progress in Latin America, the House committee said:

"It seems clear . . . that the portion of technical assistance aid going to labor is small in proportion to the role it is generally agreed labor must play in democratic development.

"Trade unions are often the only major channel by which low income groups can defend their interests, can assure that they are not forced to bear an unfairly heavy share of the costs of growth . . . and can obtain an equitable distribution of the new production which growth creates. Strong free unions are thus essential to development which promotes justice and pluralism rather than exploitation and statism."

Participation Stressed

Written into the bill by the committee was an amendment proposed by Rep. Donald M. Fraser (D-Minn.) which directs "maximum participation in the task of economic development on the part of the people of developing countries."

The House bill also raises the interest ceiling on guaranteed loans for Latin American housing to make the investment competitive with the U.S. mortgage market.

A committee compromise provided a two-year authorization for most foreign aid programs, as compared with past practice of one year and an Administration request for a five-year program.

Across the Capitol, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a somewhat different version of foreign aid legislation—limiting the authorization to one year, dividing economic and military aid into separate bills, and cutting a total of $117.2 million in economic aid and $25 million in military assistance.

BLFE to Appeal Contempt Fines

The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen announced an appeal from a federal judge's order levying a $25,000 fine on the union and a $2,500 fine on BLFE Pres. H. E. Gilbert.

The fines were assessed by U.S. District Judge Alexander Holtzoff, who found the union in contempt of court for a 12-hour delay in complying with an order to halt a strike against eight railroads last April.

Holtzoff stayed the collection of the fines pending appeal.

Food Industry Report Urges Consumer Aid

Establishment of a centralized consumer agency in the executive branch of the government was urged by the National Commission on Food Marketing in a final report to the President based on an 18-month study of the food industry.

The move was one of a series designed to give consumers the information they need for skillful buying and which they do not get from the industry's "current practices."

Other recommendations called for consumer grading for all foods for which grades are feasible; establishment by the Food & Drug Administration of standards of identity for foods recognized "as belonging to a definite product category and for which standards are practicable," and a requirement of "non-deceptive packaging and informative labeling."

The report was critical of some types of advertising and of trading stamps as a form of promotion, claiming both were "significant" factors in the food bill. It also urged curbs on mergers as a means of maintaining competition, and analyzed prices to show that the cost at the farm of a market basket of foods was unchanged between 1950 and 1965, but retail prices increased 20 percent and the farm-retail spread by 37 percent.

The 113-page report was signed by nine of the commission's 15 members, six conservative congressmen and business men dissenting in every major aspect and calling the majority report unfair to the food and advertising industries.

on the House floor, but its supporters were encouraged by the big vote it received in committee. The margin of support was greater than had appeared likely several weeks earlier.

Johnson's original proposal called for a $2.3 billion authorization for the demonstration cities program, spread over six years.

The committee voted $12 million in first year funds for planning, with an "open-end" authorization for the balance of the program, leaving it up to future Congresses to determine the amount which should be spent each year.

In its testimony on the bill, the AFL-CIO praised the cities concept as "an important and auspicious step" but urged that the program be expanded. Boris Shiskin, secretary of the federation's Housing Committee, warned that "central cities have increasingly become slum ghettos and decaying areas."

To be eligible for grants under the bill, cities will have to present comprehensive plans designed to change the "total environment" of the neighborhood involved.

Congress Tackles Legislative Backlog

Key Bills Still Face Final Action

By David L. Perlman

The 89th Congress, which in its first year responded magnificently to the nation's pressing need for medicare, aid to education and voting rights, could wind up its second session with another solid record of achievement. But at the six-month mark, that record is still far from being written.

Most of labor's legislative priorities are still unmet, including minimum wage improvements, federal standards of unemployment compensation, new civil rights guarantees and meaningful protection for consumers.

Congressional action has been started in all these areas. Some bills have passed the House, some the Senate, others have been cleared for floor action. But none has yet become law.

Three high-priority labor-backed bills have been derailed, although none has been defeated on an actual vote. The Senate has been prevented from voting on repeal of the "right-to-work" Sec. 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. The House has been blocked from voting on the on-site picketing bill. And self-government for the District of Columbia appears to have been stymied.

There have been a few notable successes. Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen was again rebuffed when he tried to overturn the Supreme Court's one man, one vote rulings through a constitutional amendment. And a GI Bill of Rights for present-day veterans, long supported by the AFL-CIO, has become law.

Budget Battles

Although Republicans were beaten on their across-the-board budget-slashing efforts, the "inflation" argument has been used with some effectiveness to hold down expansion of existing programs and to oppose new social legislation. Some of the major budget battles are still ahead, including preservation of the anti-poverty program and stepped-up school aid and housing.

Congressional leaders have already withdrawn their initial predictions of an early adjournment of Congress, despite the pressures of fall election campaigning. The agenda facing Congress when it

The vote signaled the end of 60 years of "open shop" rule at the Homestake gold mine in Lead and the company's sawmill in nearby Spearfish, S.D. Six previous attempts by the USWA and two other unions had failed.

Jubilant union backers staged a victory celebration when the result was announced. It was the first setback for company domination since 1904, when management locked out the Western Federation of Miners and kept it out until union Local 2 expired after six years of struggling for existence.

Sweeping Reforms Urged In Public Welfare System

Task Force Asks Basic Standards

By Robert B. Cooney

A top-level task force created by Congress has proposed sweeping reforms in the nation's archaic public welfare system, urging a federally-set guaranteed income for all and social services based on need alone.

The most "revolutionary" change would reverse the traditional federal-state roles, placing on the federal government the responsibility of setting minimum welfare standards and paying the costs to the extent poorer states cannot.

The present maze of 54 separate public assistance systems, under which the states set standards and secure matching federal aid, has resulted in generally low payments which perpetuate poverty, the task force observed, adding: "It is paradoxical that, while government spends millions of dollars to eliminate poverty for some, it also spends millions to sustain it for others."

The task force also would abolish such special public assistance programs as Old-Age Assistance, Aid to the Blind, Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled and Aid to Families with Dependent Children. In their place would be created a comprehensive single program in which need is the only test of eligibility.

Two-Year Study

The 12-member Advisory Council on Public Welfare, appointed two years ago under a congressional directive to review the administration of federally-aided public welfare programs, filed its report with Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner.

The blue ribbon group was headed by Fedele F. Fauri, dean of the School of Social Work at the University of Michigan. Leonard Lesser, general counsel and social insurance expert of the AFL-CIO

Abel Warns Governors:

New 'War' Brewing On Plant Pirating

By Willard Shelton

Los Angeles—A warning against the "newly-generated war between the states" through the "pirating" of plants and industry from one state to another was voiced at the National Governors' Conference here by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. I. W. Abel.

The first union official to speak to the Governors' Conference in the memory of long-time staff members of the Council of State Governments, Abel, the president of the Steelworkers, lashed specifically at the "indecency" of plant piracy through the issuance of tax-free bonds "to lure employers by subsidizing the building of cut-rate plants for sale or lease to private persons."

The misuse of tax-free bonds has spread from three states in 1956 to 30 states today, he said, and the money value of bonds issued in this year had more than doubled the $213.5 million total in 1965.

All states naturally seek economic growth, Abel conceded, but what "bothers the labor movement is the depths to which competition for industry among the states has sunk."

Some of the states, he said, "try to entice new plants or factories on the basis that theirs is a low-wage state. Others do it with substandard welfare legislation. Still more boast that they have the most regressive tax systems. In 19 states there is an open invitation to union-busting" through so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Labor turned to the federal government for help, he said, when the state governments increasingly abandoned their historic position in the forefront of experimental social legislation.

"I do not contend that all present divisions of power and responsibility between governments—federal,

IAM Strike Looms on 5 Airlines

Talks aimed at heading off a strike of more than 34,000 mechanics and ground personnel on five major airlines ended in disagreement and were broken off a few hours before a scheduled walkout of the Machinists.

Eight issues of national importance and many local issues were unresolved when the parties returned to the bargaining table for a last-minute try. When the talks ended, agreement had not been reached on any of the national issues, the union said.

The IAM previously had set a strike deadline of 6 a.m. local time July 8. As the AFL-CIO News went to press, a union spokesman said prospects were "99 to 1" that a strike would take place as scheduled on United, Trans World, Eastern, Northwest and National airlines.

Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds said there would be no further efforts to bring the parties together until Reynolds can confer with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, due to return from Tokyo the night of July 8. The negotiators agreed

Meany Message to NAACP Spurs Drive to Make Rights Laws Work

Los Angeles—Civil rights now guaranteed by law must be "translated into day-to-day life," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a message to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People here.

"The Number One objective of all who are dedicated to the principles of full and equal opportunity must be the realistic implementation of the laws that are now on the books," Meany said.

Meany's message to the NAACP convention also stressed the importance of providing additional legislative safeguards through the pending civil rights bill.

"Equal access to housing is crucial" to achievement of other goals, he said.

The AFL-CIO president urged "stronger, more vigorous, better-financed enforcement procedures" to carry out the equal opportunity principles already written into law.

Unemployment has declined, he noted, but it has not been wiped out and its chief victims are Negroes and other minority groups.

There has been "great progress in the war on poverty" but much more needs to be done, he said, as American society approaches "the point when differences of race, creed and national origin are irrelevant." Meany added:

"The NAACP and the AFL-CIO will fight side by side in many more campaigns. . . . Our greatest task in the years ahead will be to turn laws into life. That was our common purpose in seeking the laws, and it is a purpose we will pursue to its ultimate fulfillment."

Talks Halted As IAM Nears Airlines Strike

to be available for further parleys, Reynolds said.

A strike will not affect flights essential to the national defense, the assistant secretary said he was assured by the union.

A walkout would affect about 60 percent of commercial flights, with other lines remaining in service to accommodate travelers.

Vice Pres. Joseph W. Ramsey, chief union negotiator, told newsmen shortly before the talks were suspended: "We're still as far apart as the distance from the North to the South poles."

IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller previously had given the nation warning of an impasse. If a strike comes, he said, "the responsibility will rest with the short-sighted men who direct the affairs of these carriers."

The five lines made more than $200 million in profits last year, he said, and are "enjoying the greatest prosperity in their history."

The question is not one of ability to pay but whether the employes "deserve to share in the prosperity of their industry—and how much," the IAM chief said.

The union began joint negotiations with the five lines last year, for the first time in their bargaining relations. The talks bogged down and, after two unsuccessful attempts by the National Mediation Board, the IAM was preparing to authorize a walkout when Pres. Johnson intervened.

The President named a three-man emergency panel which made recommendations the union called "disappointing." When negotiations were resumed, the parties disagreed on major issues including a wage hike tied to the cost-of-living index —a point the presidential panel failed to meet satisfactorily, according to the union.

IBEW Program Sends Journeymen to College

Eight journeyman members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have been named the first winners of scholarships in a new union program that gives them the opportunity to become electrical engineers.

The program was started last April with the cooperation of the National Electrical Contractors Association and gives each winner a four-year scholarship worth up to $2,500 a year and good in any recognized college.

Not only is the industry giving the winners the chance to advance themselves, but the union has promised to help them get summer or Christmas vacation jobs, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman said.

The winners and their locals are:

Richard D. Eckhoff, Coon Rapids, Minn., a member of Minneapolis Local 292; Daniel H. George, Balboa, Canal Zone, Local 397; Rollin E. Hines, Jefferson, Ore., a member of Salem, Ore., Local 280; Phillip E. Johnston, Lakewood, Colo., of Denver Local 68; Gerald W. Jones, Cleveland, Local 28; Albert H. Knoop, Jr., and Gerald McGaha, both of Louisville, Ky., and both members of Local 369; and Bruce T. Siren, Bozeman, Mont., a member of Great Falls Local 122.

The winners were selected from among 114 qualified applicants all under 30 years of age, graduates of recognized apprenticeship programs and employed for at least one year as journeymen.

In congratulating the winners, Freeman and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan thanked other applicants for their interest and participation in the program and urged those who did not win to "keep working toward your goal and, if you still qualify, try again next year."

The winners were selected by a committee composed of G. Watson Algire, director of admissions and registration at the University of Maryland; Chairman Stanley Adams of the National Joint Apprenticeship Committee for the Electrical Industry, and Prof. Joseph C. Michalowicz, head of the Dept. of Electrical Engineering at the Catholic University of America.

ACWA Vice Presidents Kroll, Bellanca to Retire

New York—Two veteran vice presidents of the Clothing Workers, both pioneers in labor political action, have withdrawn as candidates for re-election.

They are Jack Kroll, former co-director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, whose record includes more than 50 years of service to the union and 38 years as a member of the general executive board, and August Bellanca, who has given the ACWA 55 years of service, including 34 as a vice president.

Kroll and Bellanca were renominated at the union's recent convention in Atlantic City. In letters of notification to Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum they expressed "deep regret" at the necessity of declining to seek new terms. Kroll's letter was dated on the eve of his 81st birthday. Bellanca wrote that at the age of 83 "I have begun to feel the burden of my years."

In addition to his service as an ACWA vice president Kroll is manager of the union's Cincinnati Joint Board. He also spent 12 years as president of the former Ohio CIO; nine years as national director of the CIO Political Action Committee and nearly two years as co-director of COPE.

He became active in clothing industry unionization as early as 1910, was on the picket lines in historic strikes in 1915 and 1919, was named Cincinnati joint board manager in 1926 and two years later became a vice president. In the 1940s he also served as manager of the union's Laundry Workers Joint Board.

Bellanca, whose services to the union also began in its founding days, has been one of the country's outstanding Italian-American leaders and was the ACWA's unofficial liaison with the anti-Fascist postwar Italian government, which presented him with the Order of Merit in 1955.

Elected in 1916

A union worker in many parts of the United States and Canada, Bellanca was first elected an ACWA vice president in 1916, serving until 1934. He again served from 1946 until 1948, and was named once more in 1952, remaining in office until the present.

He and his late wife, the former Dorothy Jacobs, who was an ACWA vice president at the time of her death in 1946 at the age of 53, were early associates of the late Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia of New York in liberal political activities. Their association began in 1912, when Bellanca was manager of the Italian local of the Brotherhood of Tailors and LaGuardia was a lawyer defending the rights of union members.

Travelers Aid Elects CWA Leader to Board

San Juan, P.R. — Vice Pres. Glenn E. Watts of the Communications Workers was elected to the board of directors of the National Travelers Aid Association during the biennial convention here.

He succeeds Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities, who completed a four-year term as a board member.

Hilda Siff Dies; Led AFSCME Unit

Hilda Siff, former executive director of the Community & Social Agency Employes Union of New York—State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1707—died after a heart attack at her home in Washington. Since 1963 she had been a social analyst in the Welfare Administration of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

A graduate of Hunter College in her native New York City, Miss Siff did graduate work at Columbia University in economics and at the New York School of Social Work. She served as an international representative of the former CIO Government & Civic Workers Organizing Committee; during World War II, on the former CIO War Relief Committee; as an economist with the New York City Dept. of Labor and as assistant director of the American Jewish Committee.

To Preserve Democracy:

Labor Spurs Fight On Right-wingers

Cincinnati—Trade unionists here were urged to fight the spreading influence of right wing extremism for the good of their community and their unions.

A weekend seminar on "Extremism vs. Democracy" gave more than 150 local union leaders an in-depth look at the John Birch Society and allied right wing groups. The seminar was sponsored by the Cincinnati AFL-CIO, with James Wolfe, research and education director for the Brewery Workers, presiding.

Speakers were Wesley McCune of Washington, director of Group Research, Inc., which distributes research material on the extremists; Charles Taft of Cincinnati, chairman of the Fair Campaign Practices Committee; and William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO director of organization.

Delegates saw a film on how the Birchers infiltrate community government. They discussed the problem of extremism faced in Cincinnati, and peppered the panel with questions on how best to fight for democratic principles in areas where the Birchers gain a foothold.

The seminar, the first of its kind in the area, was hailed by Kircher as "setting the example for scores of such seminars throughout America."

"The John Birch Society is a direct threat to trade unions," Kircher warned. "Many of its members are on the National Right to Work Committee," he said. "And we find these right wingers taking an active role against unions in organizing drives."

He said the radical right is infiltrating school groups including Parent-Teacher Associations, scrambling for positions on school boards and in general attempting to set an extremist tone in the communities where workers live.

"Right down the line they fight against just about everything labor is for, and we would be blind if we ignored the fact that all too often they are successful," he added. "Just as we exposed and fought the radical left in the 1940's, today labor must take the lead in exposing and fighting the radical right."

McCune told the group that the radical right will spend more than $30 million dollars this year, "with the John Birch Society alone projecting a budget of $12 million."

"I think it is a shocking thing that here in Cincinnati, William Flax, a John Birch coordinator, should poll 20 percent of the vote in the Republican primary in his race against Robert Taft, Jr.," he said. "This is certainly indicative of the increased political know-how of the Birch Society."

No 'Old Ladies'

"These are not a bunch of old ladies in tennis shoes," McCune warned. "They are dedicated, if misguided, individuals, and their programs are sophisticated and professional. They are making trouble all over America."

Taft, an uncle of the successful GOP candidate, called for a resurgence of faith in American democracy.

"Confronted with all sides of a problem, the American people make the right choice," he said. "This is a part of our most cherished traditions. The battle against extremism of either the left or right is a battle to preserve our heritage."

Idaho Convention Votes Per Capita Dues Hike

Burley, Ida.—Delegates to the convention of the Idaho State AFL-CIO voted to raise per capita payments from 20 to 25 cents per member per month and endorsed a broadened program of political education.

After hearing five candidates for the Democratic and Republican nominations for governor, COPE Area Dir. Walter Gray and Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh, western director of COPE's Women's Activities Division, the convention acted to delay political endorsements until after the coming primary elections. They will be made at a special COPE conference slated for Aug. 20 in Boise.

The 150 delegates unanimously approved a resolution calling for expansion of Bonneville Dam power to Southern Idaho. They took a neutral position on repeal of the 3 percent state sales tax, which became effective July 1, 1965, and which goes to a referendum vote in the November election.

Acting Dir. Raymond Munts of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security declared that medicare for the first time in history makes medical benefits available to rich and poor alike.

"Never before has medical care through a public program been available on a basis of right rather than on a basis of need," he observed.

"We celebrate the application of democratic values in the field of health, values that are consistent with the principles of a self-respecting society. Labor has a right to be proud of its contribution to this victory for the American people."

Other speakers included Pres. A. F. Hartung of the Woodworkers and Clem Powell, Seattle, Wash., authority on pensions.

Neither Pres. Darrell Dorman nor Sec.-Treas. Albert B. Beattie was up for re-election this year, but at the conclusion of the convention the latter notified the executive board of his intention of retiring. The board will name his successor at a later meeting.

Beattie, a member of the Communications Workers, has been secretary-treasurer of the state body since the AFL-CIO merger and previously had held a similar post with the former state CIO.

AFGE Adds 2,500 At Oakland Base

Oakland, Calif. — Government Employes Lodge 1533 has won exclusive bargaining rights for a third unit at the Oakland Naval Supply Center and is campaigning successfully in a fourth.

The local's latest victory was a 1,423-127 triumph in an election among the 2,500 employes in a so-called "all others" unit.

It followed earlier victories in the Military Sea Transport Service unit, for which a contract has been negotiated, and the Public Works unit, for which negotiations are under way. An election is being sought in the Security unit.

Musicians' Delegates Push Political Action

Las Vegas, Nev.—The American Federation of Musicians, reflecting continued pleasure at a surge of new support for the performing arts, closed out its 69th convention here with strong emphasis on political action and a declaration of support for organization of California farm workers.

Thirty-three of the union's locals were cited for meeting fully their suggested quotas for contributions to TEMPO, the Musicians' name for their voluntary political activity fund, and a special bronze plaque was awarded to San Francisco Local 6 as leader with more than $7,000 in contributions.

Hampton Honored

Lionel Hampton, veteran member cited as aiding in the resurgence of the "big band" sound to new popularity, made a TEMPO contribution from the platform, and convention delegates added more than $2,500 during the meeting, according to an announcement by Pres. Herman Kenin in the closing minutes.

Hampton's band played for more than half an hour as the convention adjourned, and delegates crowded around in enjoyment before departing—the kind of feature familiar to the Musicians' own members that is matched in few union conventions.

The convention voted its support of efforts of striking farm workers to organize the giant DiGiorgio enterprises in California's Delano Valley after hearing an eloquent plea from AFL-CIO Rep. Larry Itliong for help for the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee.

The migrant farm workers, including the grape workers in the Delano Valley, are the "most abused, underpaid group in the nation," Itliong told the convention, and the delegates promptly responded with a declaration of "wholehearted" unity and support.

In business sessions the convention:

● Approved a proposal to strengthen the union's fiscal base by raising initiation fees paid the international union on a sliding scale estimated to provide about $150,000 in additional annual revenue. A report said the union had been running in the red on current operations, although total net worth and pension fund reserves had risen.

● Approved a series of constitution and by-law proposals designed to soften vexatious difficulties arising from differing dues schedules and pay scales among locals in closely-related geographical areas. Resolutions proposed to freeze pay scales and restrict traveling performances by Musicians into a single pattern were rejected or referred to the executive board for study.

● Re-elected all incumbent officers, including Kenin and Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard without opposition, and five board members from the United States and Vice Pres. William J. Harris in a secret ballot election against opposing nominees.

A constitutional amendment setting up formal procedures for challenges to local union elections was adopted.

In miscellaneous actions the convention urged early Senate ratification of a pending international convention for protection of performers, record producers and broadcasters on a worldwide basis.

It also approved telegrams to Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and the New York City Council urging their support of a current campaign to "save" the old Metropolitan Opera House, now scheduled for dismantlement to make way for a new office building.

The delegates voted to defer until next year's convention action on a recommendation that salaries of the executive officers be raised. The proposal approved by the finance committee would have increased Kenin's salary from $35,000 to $40,000, Ballard's from $25,000 to $30,000, and the salaries of general board members from $5,200 to $7,500.

Annual Convention Backed

Delegates made clear their desire that the union continue to schedule annual conventions, and were assured that the initiation fee increase approved at the convention would make this possible. A resolution to shift to biennial conventions was withdrawn by its sponsors.

The convention voted to meet next year in Miami Beach, Fla., and approved a committee suggestion that Sacramento be favored in 1968 and Denver in 1969.

PRESIDING at the 69th convention of the Musicians in Las Vegas, Nev., was Pres. Herman D. Kenin, who was re-elected without opposition.

Growing Number of Contracts Guarantee Job Transfer Rights

The tender, loving care that management once reserved for executives when it moved or closed a plant or department has trickled down to the worker through an increasing number of union contracts, an AFL-CIO study has found.

These protections include advance notice, transfer rights, application of the principle of seniority, training and retraining, and moving and relocation allowances, the survey shows.

Some of the techniques spelled out in union-negotiated contracts to give the displaced worker the right to follow his job—even if its content changes—are examined in depth by Rudolph Oswald, economist with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, in the July issue of the American Federationist.

"Transfer rights are just one of the many techniques developed to meet the problems of plant and department closings," Oswald notes.

"They are no substitute for such other programs as early retirement and adequate severance provisions. Advance notice clauses assure the workers of adequate forewarning and attrition clauses protect the worker's job. Retraining provisions often go hand-in-glove with transfer clauses."

The "primary type" of protection found in union contracts, Oswald says, is to give the employe the right to follow his work because it is the work he knows and to which he has devoted his life. If the only jobs available pay less, unions want him to be guaranteed his old wage at least temporarily.

"When the available new jobs require somewhat different or additional skills or duties, which the worker could ordinarily master after a reasonable retraining period," he continues, "the objective is to have the company provide the necessary retraining to equip the workers.

Moving Costs Paid

"To avoid an undue economic burden on workers and to make the transfer opportunities most meaningful, the company should pay all or at least part of the expenses involved in the moving of the worker and his family and possessions and in the family's resettlement in the new community."

Oswald points out that transfer rights may be narrow or broad—restricted to one plant of one company, extended to all plants of one company, or to a number of plants of different firms within one industry or area. They may be limited to employes laid off because of a plant or departmental shutdown, or may be given to workers laid off for any reason at all, he continues; a worker may have the right to move only to a plant in a new location, or he may be able to move to any plant the company operates.

The article, a Collective Bargaining Report feature in the Federationist, examines in detail the application of seniority rights in transfers, noting that a clause which allows transfer only within an occupation or a department "may not protect long-service workers when a particular occupation becomes obsolete or is phased out."

"The question becomes particularly important," Oswald writes, "when an entire operation or department is seriously affected by technological change. Such problems have often led to revised seniority rules so as to provide workers greater protection in exercising job retention rights."

He discusses the transfer clauses in a number of union contracts and court decisions dealing with the rights of workers to follow their jobs to new locations.

He also points out that the federal government has recognized the need for relocation expenses and that Pres. Johnson has asked Congress for authority to make grants beyond the actual cost of moving.

"Experience indicates that workers prefer to stay in their communities or to transfer to other plants within commuting distance of their homes," he concludes. "However, economic conditions in their home communities and the prospect of alternative job opportunities weigh heavily in the choice between moving with a job or staying home.

"The guarantee of transfer, with full seniority for purposes of job rights, is an important determinant as to whether workers will transfer or not. . . .

Obstacles Cited

"Obstacles to transferring include home ownership, family and social ties and children in school. Some transferred workers find it necessary or expedient to maintain two homes and to commute . . . at least in the first year after transfer.

"The question of who bears the cost of relocation is an important determinant of whether a displaced worker will transfer or not. Too often the worker does not have sufficient resources of his own to bear the financial burden of relocation. Without help in meeting the relocation costs, the right to transfer may be illusory."

Maine AFL-CIO Calls For College Tuition Cut

Bangor, Me.—A cut in tuition at state-controlled universities and colleges so students can get all the education they can absorb without worry about finances was urged by the Maine AFL-CIO at its annual convention here.

In addition, about 160 delegates unanimously passed a resolution approving Pres. Johnson's policy in Viet Nam and sent him a copy by wire.

The convention endorsed the AFL-CIO national legislative program, repeating a call for repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. The speakers included Marian Martin, state commissioner of labor and industry, whose opposition to legislation seeking to outlaw the union shop in Maine was one of the major factors in its defeat.

Action on political endorsements was left to the State COPE convention, scheduled for August, although speakers included Gov. John H. Reed (R) and Rep. William D. Hathaway (D), who are seeking re-election, as well as Sen. Edmund Muskie (D) and Assistant Dir. Joseph Rourke of National COPE.

A convention highlight was a visit by a delegation from the Poland Springs Job Corps Training Center, members of which described the training and outlined the program's objectives, then answered questions from the floor.

Other speakers included State Employment & Security Commissioner Joseph E. Cote; Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists; Pres. John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers; Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks; Vice Pres. Clifton Caldwell of the Meat Cutters; Assistant AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Franklin Murphy, and Thomas Cosgrove of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Pres. Benjamin J. Dorsky was re-elected to his sixth term. Also named to new terms were Sec. Louis J. Rancourt, Vice Pres. Kenneth Snowden and Treas. Vernon Harris.

Carpenters Establish Unit for Political Action

The Carpenters have announced the formation of a new Carpenters Legislative Improvement Committee (CLIC) to solicit contributions of at least $1 from individual members to finance legislative and political activities.

The funds raised will be used to strengthen the union's representations to members of Congress in behalf of legislation affecting workers, and also to help elect candidates sympathetic to the cause of labor.

Announcement of the new committee was made in the union's official publication, the Carpenter.

"It is extremely important that labor be represented on a day-to-day basis in Washington," the publication said. "While the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) does an outstanding job of registering voters, educating them, letting them know the voting records of the candidates, and getting them to the polls, this work only deals with part of the political action problem.

"After a candidate is elected to Congress, he is subjected to countless pressures from special interests. It takes constant work to counteract the efforts of our enemies.

"As everyone knows, federal law prevents the use of union funds for political purposes. Every cent of money used by organized labor for political purposes must come from individual members on a voluntary basis."

Treas. Peter Terzick of the Carpenters said CLIC expects to work closely with COPE and to complement its efforts.

Hotel Unionist Named To N.Y. Hospital Body

New York—Pres. Jay Rubin of the New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council has been named by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller to a three-year term on the State Hospital Review & Planning Council.

Medicare

UNION MEMBERS have a right to be proud this week over the start of the new medicare program for those over 65.

This expansion of social security is the fruit of 30 years of planning, promoting, pleading and politicking by union officers, health officials, social workers, senior citizens and countless others.

For many of our senior citizens, medicare will mean the difference between suffering alone to the end and being able to seek the help of a doctor or a nurse.

Medicare is a brave, new step toward meeting the health needs of our nation. But because it is a new step for the United States, many are worried that it won't work.

Much more elaborate health insurance programs already are operating successfully in other industrialized nations. There is no sound reason it shouldn't work well here.

Some doctors, who tried so hard to block medicare, have predicted a stampede by the elderly to doctors' offices and hospitals. They fear a medical crisis.

Should this occur, it will be concrete evidence of the unmet need of our elderly for medical care.

Our biggest regret is that the medicare program falls so far short of real needs. There are no provisions, for example, for glasses or hearing aids or dental plates that the elderly so often cannot afford no matter how desperate their need.

And, there is no national health insurance for anyone under 65. But now that may be possible.

NATIONAL health insurance for everyone as part of the social security program was first recommended to Congress in 1935 by Pres. Franklin Roosevelt.

In 1943 the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill was introduced in Congress calling for expansion of the Social Security Act to include national health insurance for all.

In 1945, Pres. Truman sent Congress a message on health insurance proposing, in essence, a comprehensive prepaid medical insurance plan for persons of all ages.

In 1957, Rep. Aime J. Forand of Rhode Island proposed increasing social security taxes to pay for hospital and nursing home care and necessary surgery for the aged. The Forand bill became an issue in the 1960 Presidential election.

In 1963, Pres. Kennedy delivered a special medicare message to Congress on Aiding our Senior Citizens.

In 1964, the Senate and House passed conflicting measures and the bill was defeated in a Senate-House conference.

But public demand for the legislation continued to mount. Under the leadership of Pres. Johnson, the bill became law in 1965—after 30 years of effort.

Let's hope the extension of medicare to the rest of the country will come more quickly.

Ring the Bell!

'Dubious Privilege' to be Exploited:

'Right-to-Work' Laws a Fraud, West Virginia Paper Declares

The following editorial, "Right to Work Laws a Fraud," is reprinted from the Dominion News of Morgantown, W. Va., June 25, 1966.

THE NATIONAL RIGHT TO WORK Committee has expressed great indignation at Pres. Johnson's recent promise to continue working for the repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Labor Management Act. The controversial section authorizes states to enact laws which prohibit union shops.

Some 19 states have such "right to work" laws on their books, and they included all the states of the deep South. The title of these laws is misleading. They do not give anyone the right to work but rather give him the dubious privilege to be unorganized and at the mercy of any employer who wishes to exploit him. These laws have not improved the status of the workers but have resulted in continuing depressed wages, inferior working conditions and greater profits for industry and business.

Many industries have moved into "right to work" states solely to avoid the pressures of unions seeking better conditions for workers. And it should be noted that firms in these states which pay over the federal minimums are normally those with head offices in the East or Far West; or else they are firms working on government contracts. Few home-based industries in these states have seriously bothered to share the fruits of productivity with their employes. "Right to work" laws have protected them in their exploitation and have perpetuated unsavory working conditions.

The union shop is not "compulsory unionism." Simply put, it is a voluntary agreement between a company and a union that all employes represented by the union should become union members. It is a voluntary act which has as its basic principle that a worker benefiting from collective bargaining should pay his share and not become a freeloader. Workers who are independent are not involved. Only those enagaged in a joint productive effort, such as in plants and factories, are affected.

An individual in a plant has every right to freedom of choice, but this right is restrained by the rights of the employer whose facilities he uses, and the rights of his fellow workers whose needs may be paramount to his own. What is involved here is a social obligation to the common good. It is a moral, as well as a sociological principle, that individual rights and property rights are not absolute. Even the great interpreters of the Constitution would agree.

Opponents of the union shop put great stress on its alleged compulsory nature, and they feel the government has no right to impose it on any individual. Yet such federal compulsion is accepted by all of us in many areas of our lives. Taxes are compulsory and we don't like to pay them; education is compulsory, yet some people would much prefer to send their children out to work to earn money; passports for foreign travel, drivers' licenses, auto registration tags, auto inspections and the like; all these things are imposed on us for the good of the community, and we should accept them as in the best interest of society.

THOSE ARGUING about the union shop might clarify their ideas if they examined the parallel situation prevailing in many of the professions. How many doctors can be successful without membership in a national, state or local medical association? How many lawyers would attempt to practice without joining one of the bar associations? Of course, there are some in these professions (and in others) who refuse to join recognized organizations. It is their free choice, but they suffer for it economically and otherwise.

To single out the union shop as some terrible imposition on the right of workers seems farcical when the question is examined objectively. No one can deny that the union shop has brought about better wages, improved working conditions, pensions, more vacation time and increased productivity. Few industries or businesses have gone under through paying living wages to their workers. But we do know of firms which have moved their plants from highly unionized areas simply to avoid paying living wages.

There is one more point. The National Right to Work Committee makes a great play of the fact that the rate of increase of economic growth in "right-to-work" states is greater than that of the highly unionized states. There's nothing surprising in this considering that it is only in the past decade that industry has expanded into the "right-to-work" areas. Cheap labor is the prime reason.

Family Health Center in Watts Answer to AMA's Indifference

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

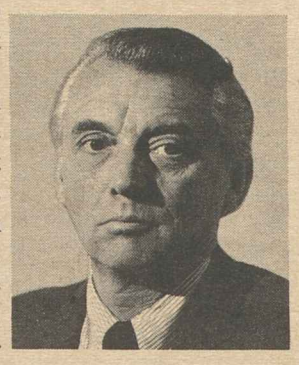
ONE OF THE PROBLEMS facing 50 governors at their conference in Los Angeles is how to plug their states in on programs—involving civil rights and poverty among many other things—which are being shaped and controlled increasingly by a kind of axis binding the federal government at one end to the city government at the other.



Morgan

The conferees could do worse with their spare time than to spend part of it in a Los Angeles laboratory of human problems called Watts. Some aspects of these problems are, of course, unique to Watts, but communities everywhere share their common roots and officials on every level of government must be mobilized if they are going to be coped with intelligently.

There would be little or no surface impact detectable in Watts today from the announcement that Sargent Shriver, director of OEO, the Office of Economic Opportunity, has approved a grant of $2.4 million in anti-poverty funds to the University of Southern California Medical School to establish and run a Neighborhood Health Center in this Negro slum. If it succeeds, the long-term impact on the health and habits of Watts could be great.

The neighborhood has no hospital now and one month ago Los Angeles County residents voted down a bond issue to build one. County authorities are committed to have one anyway—probably built by private capital and turned over to the county on a "lease-back" basis. But this will take a year or two, possibly longer.

The USC Medical School hopes to have the health center in business by January, It won't be a hospital. It won't even have any beds. But it will provide in one place family health services which Watts residents must now travel across Los Angeles to get—if they have the time and this sometimes doesn't involve merely hours but days.

Take, for theoretical but realistic instance, a pregnant mother. She carries her year-old child to the local well-baby clinic where it is found to have an ear infection so it can't be treated there. It must be taken to a private physician or the County Hospital, two hours away by bus. The mother may get prenatal care at the clinic but on a different day. If her pregnancy develops complications she has to be treated at the County Hospital.

Or, say, a man with a history of tuberculosis develops high blood pressure and diabetes. Unless he can afford private care—and few residents of Watts can—he must go to three different clinics at the County Hospital, almost inevitably on three different days (the case-load is fierce) and see three different doctors; he probably will never see those same ones again.

Dr. Robert Tranquada, who will help direct the Watts Health Center, hastens to point out that this kind of patient run-around is not a Los Angeles "first." It happens all the time in many other cities. Frequently half a dozen agencies in as many locations minister to a poor family's health needs. One family in Watts had eight public agencies helping it but not one administering preventive care.

WHO WINS THE OSCAR for such miserable performance in public health? Petty politics, patronage, inter-agency jealousies all play supporting roles. But for the chaotic and wasteful inadequacy of American public health services today we have largely to thank the heavy in this tragic drama, organized medicine. Doctors, or more accurately their professional front, the American Medical Association, wanted it that way. The AMA has fought public health programs almost every inch of the way.

"The AMA's classic approach," as one physician puts it, " has been to keep diseases of the poor among the poor."

But this confinement is beginning to crack under the triple pressure of governmental efforts, such as the war on poverty, citizens being slowly aroused to outrage and on the awakened demands of poverty's victims for better health services. USC Medical School authorities hope the Watts center can help fill the medical needs of 75,000 people. They are aiming at something more. They hope the center can become part of a post-graduate medical education program in which budding doctors are directly involved in patient care.

The astonishing thing is that this kind of orientation—at least in such planned patterns—exists in few if any other medical schools in the country—again thanks, in large part, to the narrow self-serving orientation of organized medicine, with its eyes focused on the higher-income patient.

When Watts was being surveyed for the need of a health center one woman said she would settle for just a slab—a slab to put the sick or injured on before the ambulance arrived. That sometimes takes four hours.

"The undertaker is always faster," she said.

Federalization Urged:

Revamped Employment Service Held Vital to Manpower Policy

AN AFL-CIO spokesman has urged a federalized public employment service as a key step in developing a sound national manpower policy.

Marvin Friedman, economist in the federation's Dept. of Research, said the present system should be revamped to make job information available nationally to workers who are seeking jobs.

Friedman said that because of the increased mobility of industries and people, "jobs are shifting and moving and it is no longer accurate to try to describe our economic activity according to state boundary lines."

"Yet this is the way the public employment service operates," he noted, and "wherever labor markets cut across state boundaries, we are hampered in trying to conduct an efficient labor placement service." Friedman was interviewed on the AFL-CIO produced public service program, Labor News Conference, aired weekly over the Mutual radio network.

He listed larger manpower training programs and relocation assistance to unemployed workers as other essentials in developing a national manpower policy.

"WE REGARD a full employment economy as the No. 1 requirement of a national manpower policy," he said. "Anything that one tries to do in connection with manpower activities which does not include full employment is bound to lead to frustrations and failures."

He rejected the contention that there is now a general labor shortage. "There are some shortages in a limited number of occupations and in some geographic areas," he said, "but we have nothing approaching a national shortage of labor."

Unemployment, now standing at 4 percent of the work force, "could go considerably below 3 percent and we could still operate rather efficiently," he said.

Reporters questioning Friedman were Duane Emme of Labor Newspaper and Alan Adams, Washington correspondent for Business Week magazine.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

LOS ANGELES—The catalyst for the most recent effort of Republican governors to assert their influence against a repetition of the 1964 debacle of the Goldwater nomination was Gov. John H. Chafee of Rhode Island.

In an open letter to his fellow state executives of the GOP (there are 17 of them, although Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York skipped the annual Governors' Conference here), Chafee expressed outrage at the fact that not a single governor was a member of the 1964 Platform Committee and that "at least" 12 out of the 16 Republican incumbents of that year profoundly disagreed with the platform.

The platform was, of course, a product of a Goldwater committee majority, dutifully established as the Goldwater delegate majority for the nomination was built up, and Rep. Melvin Laird (R-Wis.), the chairman, carefully executed his function of keeping out anything that the Arizona senator disagreed with.

Chafee's further point was the still slightly incredible proportions of the Goldwater disaster in Rhode Island: the governor himself was re-elected, but Pres. Johnson got 81 percent of the vote against 19 percent for the Arizona senator.

The Republican Governors Association accepted one Chafee proposal—that it establish regular meetings in December and April of each year to review election results and plan methods of increasing its influence in party councils. It postponed action on a Chafee demand for guaranteed Platform Committee membership. But this was merely to avoid premature argumentation on an issue for 1968 at a time when the GOP wants desperately to score gains in the state and congressional elections of this year.

THESE GAINS, most party spokesmen claim, may be sufficient to look like something of a bounceback.

They speak in terms of winning perhaps six more governorships and holding most of those they have, which would mean a respectable 20 to 23 of the 50 states. Rep. Gerald R. Ford (Mich.), The GOP floor leader, says he thinks Republican increases in the House may run to 40 or 50.

On the Senate races the claims are more modest—perhaps two or three, net, for the GOP, and it might not be that.

Oddly enough, however, the results might not be wholly gratifying to the progressive and modern-minded Republicans, for whom Chafee and Republican Governors Association Chairman Robert Smylie of Idaho have attempted to speak.

The GOP governors here generally showed a respectful civility to Ronald Reagan, a right-winger from the Goldwater camp whose public stance is being carefully refurbished—but whose advisers are cautiously preventing from outright repudiation of John Birch Society votes. Reagan and the governors had breakfast together.

Flickering around the edges of the conference, also, has been an experienced Goldwater campaign tactician, F. Clifton White, who might well be looking for another candidate for the future.

White was an originator of the group that gathered in Chicago in 1962 with the deliberate intention of nominating Goldwater. He was the organizer of the Arizona senator's California primary victory over Rockefeller that guaranteed the nomination. He seemed to have a natural claim to the party chairmanship for the campaign—but Goldwater picked Dean Burch instead and White was demoted to operating the Citizens Committee fund-raising functions.

THE ISSUE of who owns the Republican Party—the old-line traditional middle-of-the-road groups, with financial backing from bankers and lawyers with much sophistication and a tradition of public service, or the newer pro-Goldwater millionaires and southern Republicans reaching for power as stubborn segregationists—remains wide open.

A FEDERALIZED public employment system would be a key step in developing a sound national manpower policy, AFL-CIO Economist Marvin Friedman (center) told Duane Emme (left) of Labor Newspaper and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine during the Mutual radio network interview, Labor News Conference, produced weekly as a public service of the AFL-CIO.

THIS 11-STORY BUILDING is the new Health, Training & Recreation Center of the National Maritime Union in New York, just dedicated at a ceremony attended by 3,500 union members and their guests. Two stories are devoted to health facilities; two stories to facilities for training the crews of automated ships; six floors for living quarters for trainees, and one floor to an auditorium and other recreational facilities.

Elevator Constructors Elect New Top Officers

Los Angeles—The Elevator Constructors elected two new top officers and set new contract and organizing goals at the 21st convention here, the best-attended in the union's history.

Elected for five-year terms by unanimous vote when other candidates withdrew were Pres. Richard W. Williams, Sec.-Treas. Thomas E. Fitzgerald and Edward R. Smith, assistant to the president.

Williams had been secretary-treasurer since Edwin C. Magee resigned from that post about 18 months ago. He succeeds John Proctor, who retired as president because of illness but sent a message to the convention through Williams.

Fitzgerald, from San Francisco, had been serving as fifth vice president. Smith kept his former post. Two new vice presidents were elected to fill vacancies—George W. Koch, Jr., New York, and J. D. Peoples, Houston, Tex.

Delegates from 106 local unions in the United States and Canada named a committee to meet with management spokesmen in negotiations for a nationwide contract later this year. In a series of resolutions they spelled out contract improvements that both management and union members could "live with."

Williams and other officers reported that the union is growing but needs to strengthen its defenses against job losses caused by automation and pre-fabrication of building materials.

The convention received messages of greeting from Pres. Johnson, Vice Pres. Humphrey, and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, among others.

The delegates approved a plan to make the Elevator Constructor more readable and educational and authorized changes in the format of the monthly magazine.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler congratulated the union on its steady growth and urged "total participation" by members and officers in affairs of their own communities.

Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said the pre-fabrication of building materials represents one of the biggest problems facing construction unions. He stressed the need for continuous cooperation between the building trades and state and local central bodies, and pledged the cooperation of the department.

Teachers' AFL-CIO Ties Reaffirmed by Cogen

Chicago—American Federation of Teachers Pres. Charles Cogen said he has an "open mind" on working with the National Education Association for a united teaching profession but is opposed to any severance of teachers' ties with organized labor.

Cogen's comments were made here at a news conference in answer to reports from the NEA convention in Miami Beach. The incoming NEA president—Miss Irvamae Applegate—had told newsmen that AFL-CIO affiliation would not be a bar to joint action, but the outgoing president—Richard Batchelder—"lashed out with NEA's standard anti-labor smear," Cogen observed.

Organized labor has been "the only consistent and effective supporter of the public schools" and "teachers have benefited from AFL-CIO's support," he said.

Furthermore, he continued "participation in labor affairs has helped teachers to become involved in many of the greatest socio-economic issues of our time—civil rights, housing, medical care for the elderly, reapportionment."

Cogen recalled that last year he proposed that the NEA and AFT engage in a dialogue to establish a national "code of observance" for the conduct of representation elections among teachers. Since then the union has defeated the NEA in most elections, he noted.

At its 1957 convention AFL-CIO labeled the NEA and its affiliates "company unions." The 1965 convention cited the benefits that collective bargaining has brought to teachers and schools and said the effectiveness of the AFT in major cities "has proved what the AFL-CIO has long contended, that unionism is good both for teachers and the schools."

Cogen added here: "The AFT knows that our affiliation with the AFL-CIO is a great asset. . . . No organization dominated by out-of-classroom administrators, standing aloof from organized society, can possibly achieve" teacher goals.

At Governors' Conference:

Abel Hits Tax-free Bond Use In Plant Piracy by States

state and local—should forever remain unchanged," Abel said.

"New cooperative solutions must be found for the unresolved problems of metropolitan areas" such as rapid transit, air and water pollution, the growth of crime and the need of regional approaches in economically depressed multi-state territories, he continued.

But there are still 12 states with no minimum wage laws, 15 without anti-discrimination laws, many with "retrogressed" unemployment compensation systems.

There has been a sharp shift in the burden of state taxation, he pointed out, citing a "typical" state in which a short time ago "corporations supplied 35 percent and consumers 44 percent" of the revenues, but "corporate taxes were down to 27 percent and consumer taxes up to 57 percent" in 1965.

"Plant piracy" or shutdowns have in three years caused the loss of jobs to 60,000 steelworkers alone and hundreds of thousands of workers in other unions, Abel declared.

"Industrial piracy should be abolished under jointly agreed-upon ground rules adopted by the states," he told the governors, "and I implore you to take such action . . . promptly." If the states do not act, "then once again the answer will have to come from Washington."

"The states can return to the golden age they once enjoyed as leaders," he said, particularly since their legislatures have now been reapportioned, but not if they do not "halt the exploitation of workers and encroachment on human dignity in the pursuit of industry."

Abel's speech, coming the first afternoon of business sessions of the 58th annual Governors' Conference, was set against the backdrop of heavy politicking familiar at such meetings.

The war in Viet Nam was a constant theme of preliminary sessions and Gov. Grant Sawyer (D-Nev.) served notice that he would file a resolution comparable to that of the 1965 conference endorsing Pres. Johnson's leadership.

Gov. George Romney (R-Mich.) and Gov. Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.) as they did last year, indicated they would not join in such a proposal. Gov. William W. Scranton (R-Pa.) and Gov. John A. Love (R-Colo.) said the President should have ordered bombing of the Hanoi-Haiphong industrial complexes several months ago.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, in a low-key speech, told the governors that the Vietnamese war must be considered in the context of 20 years of "confrontation" by which threats involving Greece, Western Europe, Berlin, and Cuba have been met.

Like the assault on Greece in 1947, "it is a split-level attack from a sanctuary," he said, in an area "which could not have been more unfavorable from the viewpoint of the defense." We do not have the "option of moving the war to a preferable spot, say an island in the Indian Ocean," he commented ironically.

Citing a growth of stability in Asia generally as well as U.S. successes in Viet Nam, Humphrey said "we must stay and work and fight until we have achieved our objectives—the halt of aggression from the North, the independence of South Viet Nam and peace in Southeast Asia."

The governors also received in executive session a briefing on the current situation from Walt W. Rostow of the White House staff and Ambassador Averell Harriman, dispatched for that purpose by the President.

The Republican Governors Association, spurred by a letter issued by Gov. John H. Chafee (R-R.I.), decided to hold two meetings annually in addition to its meetings at the conference, hoping to exert greater influence in the choice of GOP presidential candidates and platforms.

Chafee's letter said he was shocked to discover that not a single Republican governor was on the platform committee at the 1964 convention that nominated then Sen. Barry Goldwater and that "at least 12 of the 16" GOP state executives were out of sympathy with the platform adopted.

The Governors' Conference proper tied its business sessions generally to familiar subjects such as federal, state and local relations and the devising of methods of increasing state revenues, with an added forum on the "responsibilities of news media."

Romney headed a special committee on revenue sources, stressing heavily what many governors consider an extremely attractive idea—a transfer back to the states of a small percentage of federal revenues collected in those states (the so-called Heller plan).

Abel pointed out that the country's wealth "is highly concentrated in certain areas" and that federal "tax leverage" is used "to dispense some of it to the hard-pressed states and localities."

"It astonishes me," he commented, "to hear some leaders in poorer states berate the federal government when their citizens so largely benefit from federal grants-in-aid."

Wage, Security Gains Won by Marble Strikers

Proctor, Vt.—Wage increases of 27 cents an hour over three years plus maintenance of membership and substantial fringe benefits were accepted by members of five locals of the Stone Workers to end a 56-day strike at 10 plants of the Vermont Marble Co.

The company boosted its wage proposal after the union had put the previous offer of 20 cents before a membership meeting only to have it rejected by a 9-1 vote.

The settlement was called a "tremendous victory for labor in Vermont" by Ralph E. Williams, international representative of the union and president of the Vermont AFL-CIO, who added he was "very pleased, very happy" with it.

The 700 union members will receive wage increases of 10 cents an hour during the first year, 8 cents the second year and 9 cents the third, with about 100 employes receiving additional adjustments ranging from 5 to 10 cents an hour.

The maintenance of membership clause, the first union security provision in the union's history of relations with the firm, includes a 10-day escape period at the end of the second year.

Other gains, effective the second year of the contract, give employes with 15 years seniority three weeks paid vacations and provide for time and a half for all Saturday work in weeks during which there has been a holiday. Insurance protection also was improved, and premiums were increased to 7 cents an hour on the second shift, a gain of 2 cents an hour, to 10 cents on the third shift, an increase of 3 cents.

The company agreed that time lost because of the strike would not be excluded in determining seniority, guaranteed vacations this year, and pledged that foremen will not do work ordinarily performed by members of the bargaining unit.

In addition it agreed to give the union the names and home addresses of all employes, and to send them a letter saying it does not discourage membership in the union.

The Stone Workers have represented the union at Vermont Marble since 1945 and had increased membership to 90 percent of the work force when negotiations opened. The company had broken the union in an earlier strike 30 years ago.

Strike Vote Spurs Pact at John Hancock

A contract settlement spurred by a strike vote was reached by the Insurance Workers and the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. for 6,000 agents all over the nation.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen, who was a John Hancock agent himself in 1948, said agreement was reached a few hours before a July 5 strike deadline after a month of negotiations.

If John Hancock agents approve, the new pact will give them $12 more a week over a three-year period, increased expense allowances and other improvements.

When the old contract expired June 30 management had a $4 increase offer on the table. The union then polled its members, who authorized strike action, 4,173 to 188, while negotiations continued.

The IWIU executive board also voted strike approval and management upped its offer.

Gillen headed an 18-member negotiating committee.

Congress Tackles Legislative Backlog

Major Bills Crowd 2nd Session Agenda

returns July 11 from a week's recess is a crowded one.

Here is the scorecard to date on major legislation of special interest to union families:

MINIMUM WAGE

The outlook is promising for a major expansion of coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, coupled with a gradual increase in the minimum wage to $1.60 an hour. The bill passed by the House on May 26 adds 8 million workers to the 30 million already covered by the law. Most newly-covered workers, including retail, hospital, hotel, restaurant, laundry and construction employes, would be brought in at a $1 minimum next Feb. 1, rising by 15-cent annual steps to $1.60. Farm workers, covered for the first time, would have their wage floor cut off at the $1.30 level. Workers already covered would go from the present $1.25 minimum to $1.40 in February.

The House, by a close vote, adopted a "stretchout" amendment suggested by Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.) which would delay the $1.60 step until Feb. 1, 1969—a year later than the date set in the bill sent to the floor by Powell's own Labor Committee. However a Senate Labor subcommittee, under Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), has patched up that defect, moving the $1.60 date back to Feb. 1, 1968. The subcommittee is expected to complete action on the bill this month.

JOBLESS BENEFITS

A harder battle faces the unemployment compensation standards bill, another major AFL-CIO goal for this session of Congress.

Its weakness is evident in the 374-10 vote it received in the House on June 22. Even hard-core conservatives were willing to vote for a watered-down measure containing a modest expansion of coverage and a provision for 13 weeks of extended federal benefits when unemployment reaches recession levels.

Stripped from the bill by a close vote in the House Ways & Means Committee were the key federal standards sought by the AFL-CIO and the Administration. These included a benefit minimum of 50 percent of lost wages up to a ceiling of two-thirds of the average state wage, an additional 26 weeks of federal benefits for persons with a steady work record, and limits on disqualification penalties a state could impose. The AFL-CIO has urged the Senate to improve the House-passed bill by adding "realistic, meaningful federal standards."

A bill intended to modernize the Federal-State Employment Service passed the Senate but generated little enthusiasm from supporters of a strong, nationally-oriented manpower agency. The modest bill was weakened by an amendment knocking out a ban on referral of farm workers to employers involved in a labor dispute.

SECTION 14(b)

The record of Congress on the two big labor bills has been sharply disappointing. The Senate was prevented from voting on repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, and the House thus far has been denied the right to vote on situs picketing.

The long fight for repeal of 14(b)—which allows states to pass laws prohibiting the union shop—appeared to have been won last year when the repeal bill passed the House. A majority of the Senate was prepared to vote for repeal. But a minority organized by Dirksen successfully used the Senate rules of unlimited debate to prevent a vote. The majority for the bill wasn't big enough to muster the two-thirds needed to break a filibuster and the repeal effort was lost.

ON-SITE PICKETING

In the case of the on-site picketing bill, it is House Labor Committee Chairman Powell who has blocked action. The bill would allow construction workers to picket a multi-employer site in a dispute with a single contractor. The bill has considerable bipartisan support, Administration endorsement, approval by Powell's own committee, and clearance from the Rules Committee. A day before it was scheduled for House action, Powell abruptly notified Speaker John W. McCormack that he had changed his mind and would not call the bill up for consideration.

RAILROAD LABOR

On the plus side, Congress unanimously approved labor-sought legislation to speed grievance procedures on railroads and end a double standard of court review. It amended the Railway Labor Act to make adjustment board decisions final and binding on grievances involving wages, hours and work rules. Previously employers—but not workers—could appeal adverse decisions involving money. The legislation also requires special adjustment boards to be named at the request of either party when there is a backlog of grievances. Some workers previously had to wait more than 10 years for a decision.

In an area of interest to labor because of the union-busting efforts of the Florida East Coast Railway, Congress plugged a loophole in the Bank Holding Co. Act. The Alfred I. du Pont Trust, which controls the struck railroad, a vast industrial empire in Florida and a chain of banks, will have to get rid of either its banking or non-banking properties.

MINE SAFETY

Both the House and Senate have passed an extension of federal mine inspection to all types of mining. Previously only coal mines had to meet federal safety rules.

CIVIL RIGHTS

As in past years, the hard battle for legislation to assure equal rights for Negroes will be fought in the Senate, where a two-thirds majority is needed to end a filibuster.

The House Judiciary Committee agreed to a major compromise in the key fair housing section of the Administration's new civil rights bill—in effect excluding sales of individual homes and limiting coverage to larger apartment houses and new home developments. This was strengthened, however, by provision for administrative enforcement.

Other sections provide safeguards against discrimination in jury selection, give the Justice Dept. greater power to sue for desegregation of schools and public facilities, and strengthen laws prohibiting threats of violence against persons seeking to exercise their rights. The AFL-CIO's position: "Equality of opportunity is possible in America, and we intend to help achieve it."

The House has already passed—by a 299-94 vote on Apr. 27—a labor-supported bill to strengthen equal employment opportunities. It would give the existing Equal Employment Opportunities Commission power comparable to that of the National Labor Relations Board to issue orders to remedy illegal discrimination, subject to enforcement and review in federal appellate courts. The commission's role now is limited to fact-finding and the authority to seek court action if conciliation fails. The bill would also extend fair employment obligations to small employers.

ORGANIZING AND BARGAINING progress was reported to delegates to the Textile Workers Union of America convention in Montreal by Pres. William Pollock. Wage parity between U.S. and Canadian textile plants was made a major TWUA bargaining goal.

D. C. HOME RULE

The long—and thus far unsuccessful—effort to achieve self-government for the District of Columbia has civil rights overtones. The reason: the nation's capital has a Negro majority. The Senate last year passed a meaningful home rule bill. A companion measure was brought to the House floor through a discharge petition, but on the showdown the House adopted a token charter study plan. The House District Committee has refused even to name conferees to try to reconcile the two measures.

CONSUMER AID

The Senate passed several major consumer bills and if the House does likewise this session of Congress will have written an important chapter in legislative history.

A labor-supported truth-in-packaging bill was passed by the Senate, 71-9, on June 9. By closer but still decisive votes, the Senate rejected a series of amendments which would have weakened the bill or transformed it into a price-fixing measure which would have boomeranged against consumers. It is now awaiting hearings in the House Commerce Committee.

An auto safety bill directing the government to set safety standards for all motor vehicles passed the Senate unanimously June 24. The Senate also approved a highway safety bill and a bill to establish federal safety and grading standards for tires.

The truth-in-lending measure, long sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), remains bogged down in an unfriendly committee.

DIRKSEN AMENDMENT

A big plus on the record of Congress was the defeat of the constitutional amendment sought by Sen. Dirksen to evade the Supreme Court's one man, one vote rulings.

For the third year, Dirksen tried to permit one house of a state legislature to be based on factors other than population. Many observers believe that labor's determined opposition to his amendment impelled Dirksen to retaliate with his filibuster against 14(b) repeal.

Dirksen's supporters had mounted a lavishly-financed campaign to drum up backing for the amendment. But when the roll was called on Apr. 20, the Dirksen amendment fell seven votes short of the two-thirds margin needed for a constitutional amendment. With nearly all states now on a one man, one vote basis, the issue appeared dead.

G.I. BILL

Just a few years ago, the AFL-CIO was almost alone among major organizations in its support of the "Cold War GI Bill of Rights" proposed by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) to give present-day veterans educational and housing benefits comparable to those accorded veterans of World War II and Korea.

With the step-up in the Viet Nam war, opposition dwindled and Congress early this year enacted a permanent GI bill, with eligibility retroactive to 1955. All who serve in the armed forces, in peacetime as in war, will be entitled to living allowances of $100 a month for full-time students, with up to $50 additional for dependents.

COLLEGE AID

Other education bills are having slower going, although favorable action is anticipated. The House in May approved a stepped-up three-year extension of federal aid to colleges, with the spending authority going up each year. The $3 billion authorization bill was passed without opposition, with not an echo of the fierce controversy which had surrounded the issue until the breakthrough legislation was passed in 1963. The bill is awaiting Senate action.

SCHOOL AID

Still in committee is the elementary and secondary school aid bill, which the AFL-CIO has urged Congress to expand beyond the Administration's budget request.

Ahead also is a showdown on whether the new Teacher Corps, authorized by Congress last year, is ever to get into action. After a hard fight, Congress early in the year approved a $9.5 million supplemental appropriation to begin the program. But the House deleted funds for it from the regular fiscal 1967 appropriations bill for the Labor and Health, Education & Welfare Depts. It is now up to the Senate to decide whether to restore the money, needed to send teams of specially-trained teachers to areas of greatest need. A stop-gap bill passed by Congress to continue appropriations for government agencies until action is completed on their budgets barred any further steps to begin the Teacher Corps.

Congress approved a labor-endorsed step-up in federal aid to libraries, going somewhat beyond the Administration's proposals.

HEALTH

The House unanimously passed a new program of grants and subsidized loans to train more people as professional assistants to doctors and dentists—including technicians and therapists. The bill also forgives repayment of federal loans for doctors, dentists and optometrists who after graduation practice in rural areas of low-income families.

HOUSING

A tough, important fight is expected when the omnibus housing bill approved by the House Banking Committee reaches the floor. It includes Pres. Johnson's demonstration cities program keyed to rehabilitation of entire neighborhoods of decaying cities through coordinated programs of public transportation, better schools recreational facilities and low-cost housing. Other portions of the bill promote city-suburb planning and "new town" development, and give mortgage guarantees for group health facilities.

The rent supplement program authorized last year narrowly won its first financing test on a supplemental appropriation bill. But final action has not yet been taken on the fiscal 1967 budget.

FOREIGN AID

The first big battle over foreign aid is due in the next few days when the House takes up the foreign aid authorization bill. Its Foreign Affairs Committee approved a bill close to the Administration's $3.4 billion request and accompanied it with a report urging greater emphasis on channeling aid to developing nations through the free trade union movement.

The House vote will just be the first skirmish, however. A sharply divided Senate will have to act, and then the process will begin all over with the appropriations bill.

With little controversy, Congress approved U.S. participation in the Asian Development Bank, which will help developing nations finance self-help programs.

FEDERAL EMPLOYES

A modest pay raise and fringe benefit package for federal employes passed the House 392-1 in April and is certain of Senate approval, probably in the next few days. The cost of the package was held down by the Administration's insistence that the government set an example on wage "guidelines," but the bill adds additional retirement benefits without an increase in the employe contribution. Congress has already approved a labor-supported bill raising the ceiling on compensation to injured federal employes.

Welfare Task Force Urges Wide Reforms

Industrial Union Dept., represented labor.

The council took testimony from some 350 people from 47 states representing the views of welfare, health, civic, religious, education, labor and business organizations.

The importance of the key financing reform, declared the council, is that "it would clearly implement the concept of minimum national standards by placing on the federal government the full responsibility for the additional costs of the policies and levels of benefit it prescribes."

In essence, the federal government would make payments to those states which adopt minimum national standards and which invest a fixed state share related to the state's fiscal capacity and effort. States wishing to move above the national minimum would be encouraged to do so.

The guaranteed income floor was not made specific by the council. It would vary, however, depending on such factors as family size, regional differences and the cost of living.

'Poverty Line' Used

Fauri told a press conference that council members talked in terms of the commonly-accepted "poverty line" of $3,100 a year for a family of four and $1,600 for an individual.

He estimated such an income floor would boost the current federal-state-local welfare outlay from $6 billion annually to $15 billion, assuming other social insurance programs stood unchanged. But, Fauri stressed, this was unlikely. He said improved jobless pay, higher social security benefits, a higher federal minimum wage and broader anti-poverty programs would tend to reduce the welfare bill.

Putting the welfare problem in perspective, the council said in its report that public welfare has a unique role "as the ultimate source of protection against poverty and social deprivation."

Much of the cost of welfare, it stressed, can and should be reduced by full employment, by adequate social insurance and by adequate educational, health and legal programs.

The council said its wide range of reforms rests on these findings:

- The payments for a dependent child run from a low of $8.16 a month in Mississippi to a high of $51.42 in Minnesota.
- The monthly payments for an aged person run from a low of $40.-93 in Mississippi to a high of $123.-73 in Wisconsin.
- Although there are 4 million children under 6 years of age whose mothers work, there are approved day-care centers or family day-care homes for only 310,400 children in the entire nation.
- Despite a "prolonged period of prosperity, there are still more than 34 million Americans living in bleak and separate prisons of poverty." Of this total, 7.5 million are receiving "a precariously low level of assistance."
- Public assistance payments are so low, and vary so widely from state to state, that government, by its own standards and definitions, "is a major source of the poverty upon which it has declared unconditional war."

The council also made these proposals:

- Establishment of a full range of social services in public welfare agencies which are to be available as a matter of right at all times and in convenient locations to all who need them, regardless of their financial status.
- A method or mechanism to assure free legal representation for all who feel they have a cause for complaint against decisions of a public welfare agency, including provisions for an independent appeal system.
- Prompt extension of coverage and liberalization of benefits under social insurance programs.
- Prompt action to enable the Welfare Administration to expand its support of all phases of recruitment, education and training for welfare personnel.
- A greatly expanded social welfare research effort commensurate in size and scope with the national investment in welfare.

VICTORY HANDSHAKE of Homestake gold mine workers around Lead, S. D., signals end of an era for nation's biggest "open shop" mines. Miners chose the Steelworkers, 841-512, in a National Labor Relations Board election, after 60 years of non-union wages and conditions.

Donor Appeal Cites Summer Blood Needs

Union members were urged by AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis to donate blood to the Red Cross before leaving for their summer vacations.

High demands in July and August put a heavy strain on the voluntary blood donor systems the AFL-CIO has endorsed, he pointed out.

"Blood needs are higher in summer," he explained. "Highway travel is up, and the National Safety Council noted that last August was the peak month for deaths on the roads. Injuries are proportionally higher in summer.

"The answer is for everyone who can donate, any healthy person between the ages of 18 and 60, to make an appointment at his Red Cross blood center or community blood bank before going on his vacation."

Perlis added that the nation's commitment in Viet Nam requires the Red Cross to stock adequate supplies of blood plasma to meet all needs.

Gold Miners Go Union, End Open Shop Rule

ized USWA Homestake local is contract proposal drafting and collective bargaining by committees now being chosen.

Nearly half the gold in the United States comes from Lead (it rhymes with speed), a town stamped with company paternalism that pervades the lives of the miners.

In a report detailing some of the handicaps union organizers faced, the Associated Press noted that "Homestake owns and staffs a hospital in Lead. Miners and their families pay neither hospital nor doctor bills. Chances are the land a miner's house stands on is owned by Homestake, and he pays no rent."

When housing became scarce, the company built apartments renting for as little as $43 a month.

Historic Details Given

Homestake owns the waterworks, and residents "pay just $22 a year for their water."

Steel Labor, the union's publication, added some historical details:

Homestake's "hold over the gold ore of the Black Hills, once deeded to the Sioux Indian nation, dates back to the days of Gen. George Custer's last stand at the Little Big Horn River in nearby Wyoming."

The rebirth of unionism, it said, is "certain to cause unrest in the political hiearchy of South Dakota which . . . carries a Homestake brand, as does so much of everything in the state."

But Homestake employes "did not cast ballots for the USWA to avenge a past. They had their eyes focused on the future and what they knew the union could do to change their desperate situation."

The employes "saw a janitor working under a union contract at Kennecott Copper in Utah making more wages than a skilled craftsman at Homestake."

"They looked for a way to halt the unilateral system of company-imposed discipline," Steel Labor said. "They thought about decent pensions, about changing the archaic South Dakota workmen's compensation law that hardly ever pays benefits to the silicosis victims from Homestake.

"Bread and butter did, indeed, make history."

Job Security, Wage Gain Top Oil Contract Goals

Denver, Colo.—The oil bargaining policy committee of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers voted here to seek guarantees of continued employment, wage increases of 36 cents an hour and elimination of inequities between contracts in 1966 negotiations with the oil industry.

Pres. A. F. Grospiron said the proposals reflect the union's concern with sharp workforce reductions due to industry changes. Layoffs can be stopped, at no cost to the companies, if sincere negotiations are conducted on ways of "shaping the available work to the present workforce," he said.

Directly affected are about 90,-000 oil workers under OCAW contracts expiring this year. The proposals made here must be ratified by membership vote in at least three-fourths of the affected groups.

The 17-member policy committee met for 2.5 days and unanimously voted to establish the following bargaining program:

- Provision in each contract that all present regular and permanent employes be guaranteed continued employment at present or higher rates until retirement on adequate pension.
- Wage hikes of 18 cents an hour next Jan. 1 and 18 cents a year later, with contracts terminating no later than Dec. 31, 1968.
- Inclusion in wage increases of 6 cents an hour for medical and hospitalization insurance during the first contract year.
- Elimination of inequities in wages, retirement age and vacations created in 1964 negotiations.

To accomplish this, the committee suggested that firms not already doing so provide optional retirement between 62 and 65, with no actuarial reduction in benefits, and also give paid vacations of two to five weeks. Firms which did not provide general wage hikes in 1964 should grant an additional 2 percent wage increase, the committee proposed.

The OCAW said inequities developed two years ago when one major firm granted optional retirement at age 62 and other oil companies granted a 2 percent wage boost and longer vacations.

GM Unit Pays Back Overtime Of $245,000

Greensboro, N.C.—General Motors Acceptance Corp. has paid $245,000 for back overtime due 211 present and former employes in 15 company offices under the federal wage-hour law.

The payment, made through the secretary of labor, was reported in a stipulation filed by GMAC and the Labor Dept. in U.S. District Court. On the basis of the stipulation, Judge Edwin M. Stanley dismissed a Labor Dept. suit charging GMAC with violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The firm agreed in the statement that it will no longer work any employe more than the standard 40-hour workweek without paying overtime at the premium rate of time-and-one-half called for by law.

Payments to individuals ranged from $22.04 to $4,246, according to the Labor Dept.

Maritime Union Opens Greenville, Miss., Office

New York—Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union has announced the opening of a new NMU office in Greenville, Miss., which he called "the recognized capital of the non-union towing operations." In charge will be Roy Wilson, NMU patrolman.

Farm Labor Imports Drop to Record Low

A record low of 154 foreign seasonal agricultural workers were employed throughout the United States at the end of June, compared with 2,200 last year and more than 65,000 in 1964, the Labor Dept. reported.

The employed are Japanese nationals working in California in dates and strawberries under a U.S.-Japan agreement. Mass importation of foreign farm workers was ended when Public Law 78, which authorized it, expired on Dec. 31, 1964.

NLRB Ruling Upheld Against Nevada Casino

San Francisco — The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here has upheld a National Labor Relations Board order against Harrah's Club on Lake Tahoe in Stateline, Nev.

The court granted enforcement of an NLRB order requiring the gambling casino to stop interfering with the right of its employes to join unions, and to reinstate a worker illegally fired for acting as an unpaid business agent of the Theatrical Stage Employes.

Harrah's argued, with the support of the Nevada Resort Association, that the board should not assert jurisdiction over gambling because it previously had refused to regulate race track operations.

As the court reasoned, the NLRB took jurisdiction because Nevada gambling is "not essentially local" in character, and is a major industry in the state, involving more than 20 million tourists a year and requiring much interstate transportation.

The board did not abuse its discretion and did not unjustly discriminate against gambling, the appeals judges concluded in a case based on charges by IATSE Local 363.

Congress Votes Pay Raise For Government Workers

Negro Youths Bypassed:

Teenage Job Gains Mark June Report

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment rate remained unimproved at 4 percent in June even though a record 2 million teenagers found jobs, the Labor Dept. has reported.

With many other teenagers failing to find work, the ranks of the unemployed rose seasonally by 900,000 to a total of 3.9 million.

The flooding of 2.8 million teenagers into the labor force dominated the job picture for June.

The dramatic job rise for young people—some 550,000 more than seasonal—was attributed by the Labor Dept. to two factors: a late survey week which found most teenagers out of school "and the effectiveness of the campaign to provide summer jobs for youth."

Negro youth, however, failed to share fully in the gains. In fact, the unemployment situation worsened for 18- and 19-year-old Negroes.

Of the May-to-June teenage job rise of 2 million, about 1.7 million jobs were found by white youth and 270,000 by Negro teenagers.

This gain was nearly double the May-to-June rise last year. The teenage job gain then totaled under 1.2 million, with 952,000 white youths and 225,000 Negroes getting jobs.

The teenage job gains over the year were even more dramatic, with their total increase quintupled.

The Labor Dept. said teenage employment totaled 8.3 million in June 1966, about 1.4 million higher than in June a year ago. Of this

NLRB Hits Bargaining Stall by GE

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—General Electric Co. violated the Taft Act when it refused to meet with an eight-union committee representing 120,000 AFL-CIO members, the National Labor Relations Board's regional office here has charged.

NLRB General Counsel Arnold Ordman authorized Regional Dir. Ivan C. McLeod to issue a complaint that GE refused to bargain in good faith with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and other unions in the AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining.

McLeod also was authorized to dismiss a GE complaint that the union coalition was unlawful. As he did so, management issued

STRIKING MACHINISTS maintain their vigil at Washington's National Airport, representing 35,000 mechanics and ground crewmen of five big airlines. Their goal: a fair share of soaring airline profits after lean years when airline poverty pleas kept wages down.

35,000 Machinists Out:

Airline Strike Talks Pushed by Mediators

Negotiations seeking to end a week-long strike by 35,000 Machinists against five major airlines were continuing as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds brought the two sides together after talks had broken off earlier over union charges that a Northwest Airlines directive on housing in Japan for airline personnel had violated an earlier agreement. The directive was withdrawn and negotiations were resumed.

Reynolds said during a break in the negotiations that both sides were trying to find a formula to end the dispute. Union and airline spokesmen indicated that major differences still existed.

The major strike issue, as defined by IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller, was refusal by the five-company management negotiators to give employes a fair share of booming profits.

A three-member emergency board named by Pres. Johnson under the Railway Labor Act recommended, before the walkout started, a 42-month contract with wage increases of 42 cents an hour for top-rated mechanics and 34 cents for others; some vacation and holiday improvements, and a reduction in the number of wage steps.

An IAM wage policy committee rejected the proposals as far short of the need, noting that airline workers have fallen far behind other workers in a period of spiraling profits.

Government negotiators announced the union had agreed to keep military supply lines open during the strike, and the Defense Dept. said it was having no trouble

1.8 Million In Line for July 1 Hike

By David L. Perlman

Congress voted final approval to a labor-endorsed pay and fringe benefit package for 1.8 million salaried federal employes.

The Senate passed the bill unanimously after defeating amendments to postpone the pay raise six months and pass on part of the cost of pension improvements to employes. The House, which had approved the pay-fringe package by a 392-1 vote last April, quickly accepted minor Senate changes and speeded the bill to the White House. It is retroactive to the first pay period in July.

Military Pay Hiked

Congress also cleared a separate bill carrying a 3.2 percent pay raise for the armed services. Although the Administration had not sought the military pay boost, Pres. Johnson bowed to strong congressional sentiment for an increase and signed the bill.

The civilian pay raise was 2.9 percent, but fringes boosted the value of the package above the 3.2 percent "guidepost" figure the Administration had initially proposed. Federal employe unions won a number of improvements in the original bill, including an earlier effective date, bigger raises for lowest-paid workers and additional fringes.

They also had promises—made by leading members of both parties in the House and Senate debates—of bigger "catch-up" pay raises in future years.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions had pressed for bigger increases to fulfill a congressional

Virginia Primary Seen Victory For New South

By Saul Miller

The emergence of a New South, geared to sharp moderation of die-hard southern conservatism, took a giant step forward with the apparent defeat of two of the Old South's major leaders and a very slim victory for a third.

The Virginia Democratic primary elections virtually spelled the end of the organization of former Sen. Harry F. Byrd which had dominated Democratic Party politics in the state for nearly 40 years.

Major victim of the assault on the old-line Dixiecrats was Rep. Howard W. Smith, an 18-term member of the House who as chairman of the House Rules Committee has until fairly recently held life-or-death decisions over legislation.

An extreme conservative on economic, social and race matters, Smith, 83, lost unofficially by 364 votes to George C. Rawlings, Jr., a 44-year-old member of the Virginia House of Delegates from Fredericksburg.

Rawlings' stunning upset of the entrenched Smith, who had not lost an election in 60 years, was paralleled by the unofficial defeat of Sen. A. Willis Robertson, 79, chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, by State Sen. William B. Spong, Jr., of Portsmouth by some-

Senate Urged to Vote Stronger Jobless Aid

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz appealed to the Senate to strengthen the unemployment compensation bill passed by the House.

He urged the Senate Finance Committee to write into the bill federal minimum standards for state jobless benefits which have been sought by the Administration and the AFL-CIO.

As passed by the House, the legislation merely extends coverage of the unemployment compensation program to additional groups of workers and provides an additional 13 weeks of federal benefits when joblessness reaches recession levels.

Benefit ceilings set by the 50 state laws, Wirtz said, are too low to meet the goal of providing most jobless workers with payments equal to half of their lost wages.

To accomplish this, he said, the ceiling on benefits should be gradually moved up to an amount equal

NLRB Affirms Policy Against 'Weep' Film

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled once again that an employer illegally coerced his workers when he forced them to sit in captive audience and view the slanted movie, "And Women Must Weep."

Substantiating charges filed by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers against the Southwire Co., which makes wire cable at Carrollton, Ga., the board quoted a record of 10 illegal firings in previous cases as showing that Southwire has not changed its antiunion policies "nor the unlawful methods it utilizes" in furthering those policies.

New employes are "subjected" to the company's orientation program, which includes the "Weep" movie, said the board. It adds that management over a lengthy period "has repeatedly threatened employes with discharge for engaging in union activities" and in the latest case denied a worker a merit wage increase because he was active on behalf of the union.

Reversing a trial examiner, the board ordered the reinstatement with lost pay of three IUE supporters who were fired—two for refusing to take "lie detector" tests and one who "passed" a test but was fired anyway, allegedly for other reasons.

Reiterating the policy laid down in previous cases, the board called unlawful the showing of the "Weep" movie, a fictional account of a strike portraying unionists as thugs, goons and terrorists. Member Sam Zagoria, the NLRB report said, found it unnecessary to consider the film in finding unfair practices.

$1,000 CHECK from the Hotel & Restaurant Employes was presented to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People at its 57th annual convention. Bishop Stephen G. Spottswood, chairman of the NAACP board of directors, accepts the check from William E. Pollard, staff representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and a member of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

N.Y. Newspaper Dispute Narrowed to Pressmen

New York—Mediation efforts to wrap up the 10-union newspaper merger dispute focused on the Pressmen, the only union still without an agreement with the World Journal Tribune, Inc.

Meanwhile, members of the Newspaper Guild ratified a first contract with the new corporation after a strike that lasted 72 days, and the ITU Mailers also achieved a settlement.

Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Pressmen, at the request of Mayor John V. Lindsay, was scheduled to join the negotiations seeking a final solution to the dispute.

The strike by the Guild, whose contracts had been open since March 31, 1965, stymied the new firm's plans to combine three dailies into two and two Sunday papers into one, giving a new lineup of a morning Herald Tribune, an afternoon World Journal and a Sunday World Journal Tribune. The city's other papers—the Daily News, the Times and the Post—have continued to publish during the dispute.

Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy of the New York Guild local outlined the terms of the new contract to the three units involved at a meeting at Manhattan Center. He called the pact "as good a contract as we have with any other New York daily newspaper and the best we could get under the circumstances."

It was estimated that about 1,100 of the 1,780 members affected by the merger were present, with only about 50 hands raised in opposition to the settlement.

The Guild removed its picket lines following ratification of the agreement, and some members reported to work the next day in the accounting department to expedite payment of severance pay and retroactive paychecks to all members.

Murphy emphasized, however, that a general return to work would not occur until the last union had reached agreement with the publishers.

Jobs at Stake

A major issue between the company and all of the unions has been the number of workers to be retained. The Guild agreement provides jobs for 998 members, 104 more than originally were scheduled by the publishers. A rehiring list, good for two years, has been established for 242 members to be laid off. The remainder elected to resign with severance pay of two weeks for each year of service.

Details of the Mailers' pact were not immediately available, but a spokesman reported that all 189 full time mail room employes would remain with the papers.

Anti-Trust Suit Accuses Pathologists of Gouging

A doctors' association has been charged by the Justice Dept. with gouging patients and forcing up the cost of health insurance through "excessive" fees for laboratory tests.

The federal antitrust suit was filed against the College of American Pathologists, whose 4,500 specialist members dominate the $3 billion-a-year medical laboratory business.

They own some 20,000 commercial medical laboratories, including 6,000 located on hospital premises but run as profit-making enterprises. Some pathologists control large chains of laboratories, according to the Justice Dept.

The government charged that the association and its members conspired to:

- Fix prices "at artificially high levels."
- Purchase supplies and services from hospitals at "artificially low levels."
- Boycott "all commercial laboratories not owned and operated solely for the profit of pathologists."
- Refuse salaried positions with any hospital charging fees for laboratory services unless the "entire profit" from the laboratory operation goes to a pathologist.

The Justice Dept. said the timing of its suit wasn't connected with the inauguration of the medicare program, under which the government will help pay the medical bills of the elderly. However the pathologists' association charged the suit was the start of a "campaign of harrassment" against the medical profession.

The antitrust suit said the doctors' group had been conspiring since 1947 to eliminate competition from laboratories owned by persons other than pathologists, such as chemists or biologists.

Strike Closes Nabisco Plants In 10 Cities

Buena Park, Calif.—A strike of 130 bakers for a first contract at a new National Biscuit Co. plant here has shut down production at nine other big biscuit plants employing 9,000 members of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

The workers here walked out June 25 when the Nabisco firm offered them wages 25 cents an hour below the lowest rate in any other Nabisco shop, ABC Executive Vice Pres. John DeConcini said.

The strikers sent pickets to other plants whose workers indicated support by refusing to cross their lines. The union has contract language stating that members may not be required to cross union picket lines, according to DeConcini.

When anti-picketing injunctions were refused by courts in Chicago and Portland, Ore., management filed suit in four other cities, the ABC official reported.

The other closed plants, which make most of Nabisco's cookies and crackers, are in Atlanta, Buffalo, Chicago, Denver, Fair Lawn, N. J., Houston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Portland.

Two British Unions Complete Merger

London—Affiliates of the British Trades Union Council dropped to 169, lowest in 77 years, when the Society of Moulders & Foundry Workers, with 240 members, merged with the 71,000-member Amalgamated Union of Foundry Workers.

NLRB Complaint Hits Stall by GE

a press release accusing Ordman of "escalating the probability of a national strike in the electrical industry for the first time in history."

Issuance of the complaint merely puts the dispute on the NLRB's hearing schedule. A trial examiner has been assigned, will hold a hearing Aug. 16 and issue recommendations. Then the findings go to the board itself for a decision.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said he "welcomed" Ordman's action but called it "merely the important first step in getting management to the bargaining table."

The issuance of a complaint, he observed, "does not automatically bring GE" to the table nor does it "in itself assure the kind of settlement that IUE members desire." He added:

"No crisis need occur. All GE has to do is to comply with the law . . . and meet with the committee chosen by IUE to represent its members."

IUE and the unions associated with it "want to do everything possible to attain a fair settlement," Jennings said. If GE management shares this goal, there is no reason, he said, "why we can't proceed immediately to schedule negotiations and put collective bargaining to work."

Three Precedents

The NLRB complaint was based on board policy enunciated in three past cases—the American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corp. decision of last Nov. 11, now awaiting a hearing in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; the Standard Oil Co. ruling of 1962, enforced by the same appeals court, and a 1958 ruling in the U.S. Pipe & Foundry Co case, in which review petitions were denied by the 5th Circuit and the U.S. Supreme Court. All give unions the right to choose their own bargaining committees.

The issue erupted again May 4 when GE representatives walked out of a pre-negotiations meeting with the IUE on the ground that representatives of seven other unions at the meeting were not properly a part of the IUE bargaining team.

The IUE filed charges against the big manufacturing firm of refusal to bargain and also asked that GE be enjoined by court order from refusing to recognize the bargaining committee. Unless restrained, the union said, GE management will "frustrate the purposes of the (Taft) Act and produce unnecessary unrest and industrial strife" among employes by prolonging bargaining past the Oct. 2 expiration date of the current IUE-GE contract.

The other members of the union coalition are the Auto Workers, Machinists, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Technical Engineers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers and the Flint Glass Workers. All represent workers employed by GE at various plants.

The coalition was formed at the invitation of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to coordinate bargaining goals and to benefit from a pool of skilled and experienced negotiators.

The technique, called "coordinated bargaining," is viewed by the unions as similar to that used by the corporation itself in moving a team of experienced negotiators from one set of bargaining sessions to another with all the unions it deals with.

Roofers Slate Study of Job Health Hazards

The Roofers and the American Cancer Society have joined forces to determine if long-time inhalation of hot tar and hot pitch fumes on the job constitutes a health hazard.

An evaluation is being made of the health records of 6,139 men who had been union members for at least nine years by the end of 1959 and were 40 years or older.

It has been established that 4,667 were still alive last January and that 821 had died since January 1960. In addition, 651 men who have left the trade are being sought so the records of the group as a whole can be compared with those of the public at large.

The study includes an attempt to determine the cause of death of those who have died, and especially to see if there were an unusual number of deaths from respiratory ailments, such as cancer, emphysema and bronchitis.

The investigation was undertaken at the instigation of Pres. Charles D. Aquadro.

Labor Day Broadcasts Set for AFL-CIO Film

The widely-hailed documentary film, "When the Day's Work is Done" will include a newly-filmed segment when it appears nationally on television during this year's Labor Day holiday period.

The AFL-CIO-produced film, first shown on 150 television stations during the 1964 Labor Day holiday, examines the uses Americans are making of their ever-increasing leisure time, with particular emphasis on union members who utilize their after-work hours for community betterment.

In the new sequence, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne are interviewed by television star Dave Garroway. Beirne, who was recently elected president of United Community Funds & Councils of America, joins Meany in discussing the basic reasons organized labor goes beyond the plant gates to take part in such varied activities as community cultural projects, health facilities, disaster aid and programs for the very young and the very old.

The half-hour film features scenes of union activities in New York, California, New Jersey, West Virginia and Washington, D. C. as well as community projects in Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

Union members, who give a larger percentage of money to charity than any other group of Americans, will find in the film achievements realized by their gifts, as well as the uses being made of labor-donated aids, such as mobile Travelers Aid and Red Cross disaster units.

Arrangements for showing the film are now being made with commercial and educational television stations in areas where there is a heavy concentration of union members. A full schedule of the stations will be carried in the AFL-CIO News prior to Labor Day.

Jail Sentences Hit:

Ottawa Rally Called To Fight Injunctions

Ottawa, Ont.—The sentencing of 26 union members to jail for violating a picket-limiting injunction has prompted a call by the Canadian Labor Congress to a national labor rally here.

CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin called on provincial labor federations and affiliated unions to send delegates here Sept. 27 and 28 for talks on what to do about injunctions, compulsory arbitration, national certification proposals, residual management "rights" and other problems affecting unions in the 1.3-million-member federation.

As the call went out, Ontario Premier John Robarts told the legislature his government will name a royal commission to inquire into the use of injunctions and the "entire area" of laws on picketing.

A CLC executive council meeting scheduled the September conference and urged province-wide demonstrations against injunctions despite the promise of a government-sponsored inquiry. Protest rallies were set for Toronto, Peterborough, London, Brantford and other towns.

Jodoin said that Canadian unions are finding that more and more legal hurdles are being "thrown in the way of collective bargaining." He cited recent court orders in Ontario, and also in British Columbia where 298 injunctions have been issued in three years.

He called compulsory arbitration "completely contrary to free and democratic bargaining" because of its arbitrary imposition of wages and working conditions and declared that it has proved inadequate in reducing work stoppages. Nevertheless, Jodoin noted, "otherwise well-informed people are suggesting it should be tried in Canada."

For these and other reasons, he said, a top-level union conference is needed to "focus attention on these problems and to rally labor support" for changes that would establish more harmony in bargaining.

Pres. Stanley Rose of Machinists Lodge 872, Peterborough, Ont., and three other union leaders recently were given two-month jail sentences by Ontario Chief Justice G. A. Gail. An additional 21 unionists were sentenced to serve 15 days on charges of criminal contempt of court.

All are free on bail pending an appeal to be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada in the fall. They demonstrated last February at Peterborough in protest against an injunction limiting pickets to 12 at Tilco Plastics Ltd., where the Textile Workers Union of America is on strike for a first contract.

The Ontario Labor Federation and the CLC have asked for $500,000 in donations to support a campaign for repeal of unfair injunction laws.

FIRST CONTRACT is signed between the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard and Local 3 of the Technical Engineers, which recently won exclusive recognition for a unit of engineering employes. Seated, from left: A. J. Barton, a management official; Capt. J. J. Stilwell, shipyard commander, and Pres. J. A. Rippman of Local 3. Standing: C. M. Proud and B. L. Herr, management negotiators; C. G. Boyer, Local 3; J. F. Anthony, management; Charles Ilg, Local 3, and Joseph Strano, vice president of the union.

Job Safeguards Feature ILGWU Pact for 15,000

New York—Precedent-setting protections for 15,000 undergarment and negligee workers against job-destroying machinery have been won by the Ladies' Garment Workers in a three-year agreement. The pact also provides wage hikes of 10 percent for all members of the union's Local 62.

Simultaneously the ILGWU reached new contracts with major gains for 8,500 knitgoods workers in Philadelphia, 1,000 women's wear workers in Alabama and 850 coat and suit office employes here.

An overflow meeting of Local 62 members at Manhattan Center ratified the trailblazing pact with four employers' associations in the lingerie, underwear and negligee fields.

Under it the workers will get:

- Wage hikes of 6 percent retroactive to July 1, another 4 percent two years later.
- Notification to the union followed by negotiations, on jobs and earnings affected by the introduction of any new machinery, attachments or equipment, and arbitration by the impartial industry chairman in case of a dispute, with decisions retroactive to the date the new machinery was installed.
- Another new clause guaranteeing that workers in an "inside" shop shall be protected in their full employment rights; that workers in Local 62 contract shops shall have their work volume protected before work is sent to other plants; and equitable sharing by New York shops in any expansion of the employer's business.

The agreement provides that the wage increases shall not be less than $8 for shipping clerks nor less than $6 a week for other workers. Also won was a seventh paid holiday —Good Friday; improved holiday and piece work rates; and provision for contract reopening based on increases in the cost-of-living.

ILGWU Vice Pres. Matthew Schoenwald said the new Local 62 contract is the first to incorporate a new ILGWU policy requiring payment of damages by employers who violate the agreement by sending work to non-union shops.

Highlights of the other pacts:

- An industry-wide contract renewal will give Philadelphia knitgoods workers pay boosts of 8 percent in 1966 and 1968; a hike of 1.5 percent in employer payments into the union's health and welfare fund; and vacation pay improvements.
- An agreement with three South Carolina affiliates of Cotton City Wash Frocks gives workers raises designed to yield an average wage of at least $1.75 an hour for piece workers and an increase of 3 percent for time workers, the latter on Nov. 1.
- Minimums were raised and boosts of $10 a week won in a three-year pact ratified by members of ILGWU Local 99, New York Office & Distribution Employes. Other gains include a cost-of-living provision, a better vacation clause and an increase in employer payments to the health fund—from 3 percent to 4.

Molders Win Vote At Milwaukee Plant

Milwaukee—Employes of the Blackhawk Tanning Co. voted for the Molders in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was 85-43, with 15 challenged ballots on which employes wrote yes and signed their names. The NLRB will rule on the challenges but the decision will not affect the union's victory, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Charles Heymanns said.

Union Accepts Training Role Of Job Corps

Portland, Ore.—Job Corps trainees at the Tongue Point men's center here may be accepted for union apprentice training programs under a new agreement just reached with the Machinists.

Under the agreement announced by the Office of Economic Opportunity, time spent in Job Corps programs may be counted as at least partial credit in trade training programs sponsored by IAM locals in Oregon.

After completing courses at the Job Corps center, the applicant is interviewed by the apprenticeship committee of the union in which he is interested and his training record evaluated.

Center Dir. Doug Olds said a trainee with 1,200 hours of training may, under the agreement, get credit for some or all of those hours in the four-year IAM program. Completion of the apprentice period would clear the way to journeyman status, according to Olds.

The training director said both labor and management were consulted in setting up programs, and union representatives have inspected the center's facilities and training methods.

"We are pleased with our relationship with unions," Olds said. "The credit allowed our graduates under the new agreement gives them a good start in the trade of their choice."

The program was launched with the approval of area and state labor leadership and is proceeding with mutual consultation, according to Olds.

High School Set Snubs 'Judy Bond'

New York—The "Don't Buy Judy Bond" message has come across, loud and clear, to girl students of Hunter College High School.

The Ladies' Garment Workers reported that girls entering their junior year in September voted to buy a union label blouse as their official class blouse after reversing an earlier vote for the non-union product.

Judy Bond blouses have been on the ILGWU's unfair list for more than four years. The union charged the firm "ran away" from a union contract and opened a non-union shop in the South.

A Hunter High student said buying the banned blouse "would be worse than crossing a picket line."

Airline Strike Talks Pushed by Mediators

in meeting vital military commitments in Viet Nam and Europe.

The strike terminated eight months of negotiations with the five airlines—United, Eastern, Trans World, Northwest and National—for renewal of contracts that expired last Dec. 31. The walkout of mechanics and ground crewmen began after the National Mediation Board withdrew its services and the presidential emergency panel issued its report.

In other developments:

- The Transport Workers ended contract talks with American Airlines after failing to reach agreement on improved wages, working hours, pensions and insurance for 12,000 who will be free to strike July 27.
- TWU negotiators rejected contract offers from Pan American Airways as "totally inadequate" and prepared for mediation and a possible strike of 15,000 members in August.
- Non-struck airlines added extra flights and business boomed for trains, intercity buses and rental car agencies.
- Four of the five struck airlines were reported eligible for sharing in the increased profits of unions, the state and the nation. non-struck lines during the IAM strike under a co-insurance arrangement.

are a cost-of-living escalator clause, hospitalization coverage for workers' dependents, and company-paid pensions on all the lines. There are also numerous unsettled local issues, the union said.

A White House spokesman said Pres. Johnson is interested in the dispute, but feels the parties should "work it out themselves" without more direct government intervention.

Among the major national issues that remain unsettled in the IAM dispute, besides wage rates,

Kurko Heads Texas Region Of AFL-CIO

Appointment of Nicholas Kurko as director of AFL-CIO Region 17 —Texas—was announced by Pres. George Meany. The post had been vacant since the death May 30 of Lester Graham.

Kurko, 48, is a veteran staff representative and organizer with 20 years of experience, largely in the South. Since the merger of AFL and CIO he has been assigned to the regional office in Knoxville, Tenn. He and Mrs. Kurko and their four children will move to Ft. Worth.

A member of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Kurko's first organizing assignment in 1946 was to the atomic energy installation at Oak Ridge, Tenn.

In a letter to the Texas AFL-CIO and local central bodies, Meany cited the "organizational challenges that face our movement" in Texas and elsewhere. Complete labor cooperation will, he wrote, "result in the development of organizational programs" benefiting all AFL-CIO

Martin Ward, Sr., Dies, Chicago Union Veteran

Chicago—Martin J. Ward, Sr., a veteran trade unionist whose son Martin is secretary-treasurer of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, died here at the age of 82.

He had been a member of Pipe Fitters Local 597 for 53 years.

Survivors also include two other sons, Francis M. and John T. Ward, and two daughters, Mrs. Mary Sanaghan and Mrs. Katherine Dorgan.

Transport Workers Shift Headquarters

New York — The Transport Workers scheduled a move July 14 to new quarters at 1980 Broadway from their former location, 210 W. 50th St. New telephone number: 873-6000. New postal zone: 10023.

TWU said the new quarters also will house the offices of Local 100, and the union's railroad and air transport divisions.

Youth and Jobs

TWO MILLION youngsters between 14 and 19 found jobs in June, 550,000 more than seasonal expectations, emphasizing both the continuing strength of the national economy and the continuing problem of teenage employment.

For despite the surge of jobs for teenagers in the summer months, 1.9 million were unemployed, about the same as June a year ago.

The teenage job problem needs a good deal further analysis to determine exactly how and where it fits into the national job situation. There is an important distinction to be made between those who seek jobs only in the summer months to fill in the school vacation break and those who are trying to become permanent members of the work force—those who, for example, graduated from high school in the Class of 1966 and are not going on to college or further academic training.

The Labor Dept. figures show an unemployment rate for those in the 16-17 age bracket of 15 percent for June, seasonally adjusted. The rate for those 18 and 19 is 12.3 percent, down substantially from the 15.1 of a year ago.

The ability of the economy to absorb the flood of teenagers, and their contributions in turn as members of the employed labor force in keeping the economy at a high level of activity, are important.

There is no doubt that the current vigor of the economy is bringing more teenagers into the labor force, where in slower and slacker periods they would have sat out the summer. Any slowdown, therefore, would have an immediate effect on jobs for youngsters, both those seeking seasonal work and those looking for permanent employment.

The Labor Dept. figures show also that Negro youths are having a more difficult time in finding jobs, both for the summer and permanently, a problem that has not yielded very much despite economic growth and a somewhat tighter labor market.

The success this year of teenagers in securing more jobs than in the past has kept the overall unemployment rate at 4 percent for the month while the job situation for adult workers showed no improvement.

The teenage employment problem is far from solved despite the rosy June figures, and the question of youngsters and jobs and the effect on the economy needs a great deal more study and analysis if we are to assess our economy realistically.

Philip Pearl

PHILIP PEARL has left an indelible mark on the trade union movement as a newspaperman who chose to devote his talents and abilities to building a link between labor and the public.

He left a job as a White House correspondent in the mid 1930s to become a major spokesman for the former AFL. His was an important voice in decisions on public relations and publications policies in the talks preceding the AFL-CIO merger.

His quiet but skillful guidance and wise counsel will be sorely missed by the trade union movement and especially by those who worked with him.

GOP Primary Results Show Resurgence of Goldwater Wing

THE ULTRA RIGHT-WING Goldwaterites are far from losing their grip on the Republican Party on the basis of primary elections to date.

In almost every contest where a Goldwater-type candidate opposed a moderate or liberal Republican, the right winger has been victorious.

Reports from the primaries show that the Goldwaterites, often using funds left over from the Citizens for Goldwater-Miller in 1964, are better financed and better organized than their more liberal opponents.

Probably nowhere was this more sharply demonstrated than in the Republican gubernatorial race in California.

One-time movie actor Ronald Reagan, a staunch Goldwater supporter in 1964, won an overwhelming victory over a veteran and moderate politician, former San Francisco Mayor George Christopher.

Reagan is now striving to blur the far right image he established in 1964 when he worked closely with many Birchites. Democratic Gov. Pat Brown, seeking a third term, will be fighting this extremism in November.

In the New York State primaries, former Rep. Steven B. Derounian, one of the few New York Republicans to back Goldwater in 1964, defeated a moderate Republican, William J. Casey, by a lopsided count.

Strongly in Derounian's corner were Goldwater, GOP House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford and William J. Buckley, Jr., Conservative Party candidate for New York City mayor and intellectual leader of the right wing. Many moderate leaders, including Sen. Jacob J. Javits, endorsed Casey. In November, Derounian will face Rep. Lester L. Wolff, who defeated him in 1964.

In another New York State primary, former Rep. John R. Pillion was victorious over more liberal Kenneth J. McIllraith. Pillion, an arch conservative, will face labor-backed Rep. Richard D. McCarthy, who defeated him in 1964.

Two years ago, when Democrat Charles Farnsley defeated right wing Republican Gene Snyder in Louisville, Ky., liberal Republicans and Democrats, both, thought that Snyder was out of their hair. However, in the Kentucky redistricting Snyder found himself in another congressional district where he defeated moderate James Thompson in the GOP primary.

Another Goldwaterite who went down to a crashing defeat in 1964 was Rep. George A. Goodling in York, Pa. Local GOP leaders tried to get him to step aside this time for a moderate. He wouldn't and won.

Another conservative who lost out two years ago was former Rep. Peter A. Garland of Maine, defeated by liberal Rep. Stanley R. Tupper. Tupper is retiring and Garland defeated six opponents in the primary.

THE FORMER president of the Young Republicans, who helped turn that organization far right, Donald F. (Buz) Lukens, scored an unexpected victory over an Ohio moderate who had the endorsement of local GOP leaders. This is a heavily Republican district and Lukens and his extremist views are expected to be around Washington for a long time.

Five other arch conservatives, who went down with Goldwater in 1964, are attempting comebacks in primaries still on the calendar. They are Schadeberg of Wisconsin, Chenoweth of Colorado, Meader of Michigan, Wyman of New Hampshire and Harrison of Wyoming.

Only Schadeberg has no primary opposition but they are all well financed and could win. They would face liberal Democrats in the fall.

Many of the right wing candidates are receiving help from groups such as the John Birch Society, Young Americans for Freedom, The Americans for Constitutional Action and numerous other extremist organizations.

The Goldwater conservatives have no intention of relinquishing control of the Republican Party without a fight. (PAI)

U. S. Faces Day of Reckoning On Unpaid Water Pollution Bills

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

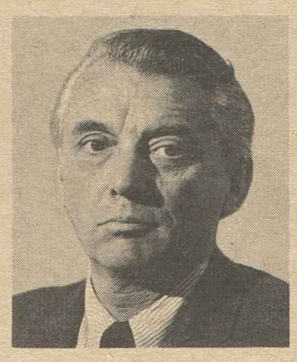
DURING A RECENT hot spell a friend took my wife and me sailing on Chesapeake Bay. A landlubber from dry farming country, I have had a longing for the water as long as I can remember and as a boy partially quenched this thirst by drinking in long draughts of adventure from the sea stories of Charles Kingsley, Richard Harding Davis, Rafael Sabatini and Heaven knows how many others. Somehow I never quite made the transition from fantasy to full-fledged skipper or first mate and I am about as handy aboard a boat as a bricklayer in the cockpit of a Boeing 727. But the excursion swelled like a full spinnaker with promise. It turned out to be a stunning experience but not in the way I had expected at all.



Morgan

The encroachments of our gas-station, motel, neon-sign and naked power-pole civilization have not quite managed to spoil the Revolutionary charms of Annapolis, which is not only the capital of Maryland but the seat of the U.S. Naval Academy and one of the leading pleasure-boat centers of the world as well.

A brisk morning breeze greeted us and we swung away from the dock, down the channel and into the bay with high hopes. Two years before the mast, I figured at that point, would be too short a cruise for me. But after the second beer, the wind dropped and there was little left to do but soak up the sun, the scenery—and the smells.

At first glance the panorama was a kind of saturated Dufy painting, the sharp white sails cutting soft blue sky over dark water, contained by a vast collar of hazy green shore. At one point I counted well over a hundred craft of all kinds—ketches, yawls, sloops, schooners, cabin cruisers, power boats and one absurd vessel which appeared to be a sea-going piece of kleenex mounted on a match stick. There must have been hundreds of other boats beyond the eye's reach on the great bay—floating testimony to the opulence of the Great Society. No longer can the rich claim yachting as their exclusive pleasure. It's a frozen chicken in every galley and an outboard on every trailer these days.

But as we thought to roll over the rail for a midday mid-bay swim, other matter floated into our consciousness: garbage and dead fish. Tin foil, pop bottles, sandwich wrap and thousands upon thousands of dead fish, many with their heads off. The refuse was no mystery. Wanton sailors, amateur and pro alike, were making a kind of Sargasso Sea out of Chesapeake Bay. Through the shocked imagination ran a snorkeler's glimpse of the bottom of the bay steadily filling with broken glass and picnic lunch scraps, not to mention other matter.

The fish, however, could not be so easily explained. One theory of our crew was that midshipmen's mine-testing might have killed them. The headless carcasses seemed to support this reasoning. But a few fish were still thrashing about, as if they were gasping for life.

Later in Washington, a senior researcher of the Fish & Wildlife Service, Raymond Johnson, furnished the answer and it was a shocking one. The fish, members of the herring family, died of lack of oxygen; in other words they suffocated in the poisoned waters of Chesapeake Bay.

This has been going on for at least 14 years; the worst year, by Johnson's check, was 1964, though the lack of wind and rain—conditions prevailing the day we went sailing—greatly reduce the circulation of the already insufficient oxygen supply. The Navy was not guilty. Shock waves from such test explosions as it conducts pass harmlessly through a fish's body. A fish's head decays, first and quickly, explaining the headless ones.

BUT THE REAL headless ones, of course, are we, the American public and our communities. The Potomac River is virtually an open sewer all the way from Harper's Ferry—171 miles upstream—until it empties into the bay. Pres. Johnson wants people swimming in a clean Potomac by 1975. Scientist Johnson says experts estimate it would cost at least $2 billion to cleanse it, and it is not clear how long it would take.

As for Chesapeake Bay, he estimates that at the present rate of pollution, it will be "dead" in less than five years; the striped bass, shad and other fish trying to enter from the Atlantic will be prevented by a "pollution block" from swimming upstream.

For 200 years we have been collecting and leaving unpaid the bills for poisoning every major water system in the United States. A day of reckoning is at hand. Lake Ontario will be dead in five years; Lake Erie is almost dead now. There is a way out, but it's not cheap. It took 15 years and a billion dollars to clean up the Ohio river. Interestingly, only one-fifth of this was federal funds; municipalities and industry produced the rest for sewage treatment, pollution controls, prevention surveillance, et cetera. Life on land, anthropologists tell us, originally emerged from the sea. Poisoning the waters is hardly the way to show our gratitude. What greedy, thoughtless suckers we humans can be.

Shipbuilding Program Pressed To Salvage U.S. Sea Strength

THE SOVIET UNION will have complete control of the high seas and displace the United States as the world's Number One sea power within ten years unless the U.S. changes its maritime program, Pres. Russell K. Berg of the Boilermakers declared.

In an interview on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program on the Mutual broadcasting system, Berg urged Pres. Johnson to take the lead in establishing the kind of shipbuilding program set forth in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

He said that with American ships being built in foreign yards "in normal times," a number of shipyards have closed, and "we have lost the skills" that will be needed in the event of an international crisis.

Meanwhile, Berg noted, the Soviet Union is subsidizing the building of its fleet 100 percent.

The Boilermakers' president was a co-chairman of the recent national conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and Maritime Committee in Washington. The conference supported the President's Maritime Advisory Committee report which recommended keeping U.S. shipyards and the U.S. merchant marine competitive.

"IN MY OPINION and in the opinion of the conference," Berg declared, "the answer to the problem that we are confronted with in the maritime industry rests with Pres. Johnson. He is the only man who can get this off 'dead center.'"

Building ships in foreign ports, he said, means not only the loss of American jobs in shipbuilding and related industries, the loss of skills that would be needed in an emergency, and the loss of taxes, but contributes heavily to deficits in the balance of payments.

Reporters who conducted the interview were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Murray Seeger of Newsweek magazine.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

The following is excerpted from an address by Aubrey J. Wagner, chairman of the board, Tennessee Valley Authority, to the 21st annual valley-wide meeting of TVA Labor-Management Cooperative Committees, Owensboro, Ky.

LABOR'S ASSOCIATION with TVA has been a source of new and growing strength. The dams and steam plants and the chemical fertilizer developments centered at Muscle Shoals have mobilized the natural resources of the region and created a broad new base for industrialization providing hundreds of thousands of new and better jobs at higher pay.

For labor, its association with TVA is a convincing demonstration to the entire South that labor unions and corporate management can cooperate in the interest of both individuals and the public.

We have been parties to grievance procedures which assure each employe fair treatment in an atmosphere of dignity when he believes himself wronged. We have negotiated across the table on wages, working conditions and so-called fringe benefits and found reasonable minds on both sides.

TVA has seen labor union members go far beyond these personal and organizational interests to cooperate earnestly in finding ways to do a job better, safer, faster or cheaper.

I SHOULD NOT imply that TVA and organized labor have reached perfection and eliminated all our differences. The fact is that we do have obstacles. We do have problems to iron out. And when we talk them over, our voices sometimes rise in frustration.

But underlying it all is the fundamental realization that good labor relations is the product of good faith and hard work. TVA knows that its employes are people of ability and integrity. We expect it of them and they more than live up to the expectation. Their interests extend beyond themselves, and their work and their actions contribute to the community and the region as well as to their jobs. They accept responsibility.

Basically, the recognition of labor unions is the method by which the men of labor shoulder responsibility in the success of an enterprise. It is a method of discovering and utilizing the leaders among these men, enabling them to undertake these responsibilities effectively. It is a source of energy, ideas and productivity.

TVA also knows that union recognition means more than just going through the motions of collective bargaining. It means shedding old ideas about management prerogatives and educating both supervisors and employe representatives as equals. It means sharing with unions the broader goals of the enterprise, but realizing too that unions have goals and internal problems to meet.

Strong unions are responsible and therefore better than weak unions. Strong management is prudent and progressive and therefore better than weak management.

THE RESOURCES of labor, when organized in democratic, responsible unions, provide management with stability, reliability and quality of production. For the individual it provides the security of fair dealing at the workbench and in the pay check.

This relationship opens the way for an identity of purpose between labor and management. We of labor and we of TVA have achieved that spirit of identity through the years of working together. If TVA can claim to have influenced the economic revitalization of the Tennessee Valley, labor shares that claim.

Now we have wider horizons within which to work. We have a challenge fully as great as in the past. The continued economic advancement of the new Tennessee Valley and the new South requires continued expansion of this spirit of mutual confidence and mutual responsibility—in private industry and commerce as well as in TVA. This great region cannot begin to realize its potential without the full participation of organized labor, whole-heartedly sought and whole-heartedly given.

"SAVE OUR SHIPS" appeal was voiced by Pres. Russell K. Berg, (center) of the Boilermakers with the warning that construction of U.S. ships abroad is a major factor in the decline of the American merchant marine. He was interviewed on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO program, by Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard newspapers (left) and Murray Seeger of Newsweek magazine.

Congress Urged to Crack Down:

State Plant Piracy Mounts, Federal Subsidies Assailed

Congress should act now to expose the scandal of interstate plant piracy and the end the federal subsidy of the destructive practice, the AFL-CIO has urged.

More states and bigger companies are resorting to the device of tax-free municipal bonds to achieve instant development and easy profits, according to an article in the current issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

Frank Fernbach, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, points out in the article, "Subsidized Plant Migration," that the problem appears to be getting out of hand.

He writes that this new economic "war between the states" has gathered force since 1960. Fifteen more states, making a total of 30, have acted to authorize the issuance of tax-free industrial development bonds. Some states announced they acted reluctantly and in self-defense, he noted.

Fernbach pointed out that industrial bond sales more than doubled to $85 million between 1960 and 1962. In 1965, they totaled $216 million. In the first four months of 1966 alone, these sales ran to $228 million and exceeded last year's total.

Fernbach said these estimates of the Investment Bankers Association are conceded to be understated. A New York investment firm in this field puts last year's sales at about $1 billion.

Perversion of Intent

What has been occurring, Fernbach explains, is a perversion of what was originally a constructive federal tax exemption. The federal government long ago granted state and local governments the right to issue tax-exempt bonds for the purpose of helping them reduce their costs when borrowing to finance public facilities like schools, hospitals and roads.

Because the buyers of such bonds are not required to pay any federal tax on the interest they receive, state and local governments can offer the securities at a low interest rate. The federal government thus forgoes these tax revenues.

"This is clearly a federal subsidy that, in effect, all American taxpayers underwrite," Fernbach said, adding:

"But when the states, their local governments or their specially authorized 'development organizations' misuse these tax-exempt securities to finance the construction of industrial or commercial facilities for sale or rent to profit-making corporations, in reality they are funneling the benefits of cheaper, subsidized tax-exempt financing meant for public purposes into private pockets instead.

"This kind of raid on the federal treasury is a perversion of the intent of the tax-free state and local bonding privilege."

Fernbach cited the Bankers Association arithmetic on a company which might take full advantage of tax-free bonds: If a company signed a 30-year lease on a $4 million municipally-built plant and then bought the bonds which financed it, it would, in effect, enjoy use of the plant rent-free for 30 years and also pile up a $480,000 profit on its $4 million tax-free loan.

Norge Case Cited

Fernbach described the case of the Norge Division of the Borg-Warner Corp. suddenly shutting down its Muskegon, Mich., refrigerator plant in the spring of 1961. No notice was given to Local 404 of the Allied Industrial Workers, which represented the firm's 1,400 plant workers. About 900 of these workers were over 40 years of age and were soon to be cut adrift in what was already a depressed area.

At the same time, a new $7.5 million factory was nearing completion in Greenwood, Ark., some 700 miles away. Financed by tax-free bonds, it was constructed according to the precise specifications of the Norge Division of Borg-Warner, the runaway from Muskegon.

Fernbach listed a string of big corporations which have found it fruitful to join the subsidized plant parade. And apparently no town is too small to industrialize this way. He said Cherokee, Ala., population 1,400, has put up $25 million through tax-free bonds to build a cut-rate plant for Armour. Lewisport, Ky., population 750, has sold $50 million in bonds to finance a tax-free plant for Harvey Aluminum. Champ, Mo., with 14 eligible voters, okayed a $12.5 million bond issue for three runaway plants.

Fernbach said Representatives Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) and Clement Zablocki (D-Wis.) have introduced legislation to end industrial-bond financing. Until these bills are acted on, he said, other steps can be taken.

"The Joint Economic Committee of the Congress could perform a great service," he declared, "by conducting an investigation, including public hearings, on all aspects of plant relocation in the United States. It is high time that Congress and the American people have an opportunity to know all the facts about the murky and unsavory practice of industrial-bond financing."

Strengthen Jobless Aid, Wirtz Appeals to Senate

to two-thirds of the average wage in a state.

Wirtz also criticized the failure of the House bill to protect workers from "unreasonable" disqualification for benefits.

He indicated a willingness, however, to compromise on the Administration's original proposal for an additional 26 weeks of federal benefits for persons with a steady work history who have exhausted their state benefits. But the secretary said a program triggered only by recession-level unemployment would be "inadequate."

It would not, he noted, "meet the unemployment problems created by mass layoffs, as in the case of the Studebaker plant shutdown, or the Republic Aviation plant shutdown."

He suggested the possibility of encouraging states to extend their regular benefits beyond the present norm of 26 weeks through federal payment of half the cost.

Wirtz also called for extension of coverage to workers on large farms, who have "a real need for unemployment insurance protection."

He criticized the financing standards of the House bill, declaring the proposed increase in the taxable wage base from $3,000 to $3,900 in 1960 and to $4,200 in 1972 is too small and too delayed. The Administration has asked a step-up to $6,600 by 1971.

Wirtz acknowledged the problems of arousing Congress to the need for improved unemployment benefits in a period of "a generally prosperous economy."

But he stressed that "even a 4 percent unemployment rate represents a lot of people" and last year an estimated 14.1 million persons experienced some unemployment, while 1.1 million were unemployed long enough to exhaust all the benefits available to them.

He described unemployment compensation as "worth every cent we pay for it. It is the quickest-acting and most automatic response we have yet provided to protect our most precious national resource—our manpower."

Wirtz concluded: "Both our society and our workers need and should have this measure of protection if our war on poverty is to be won and the Great Society is to mean something to those citizens most responsible for creating it."

The AFL-CIO has expressed disappointment with the weakness of the House bill—brought to a vote under a "no amendment" rule—and urged the Senate to add "realistic, meaningful federal standards."

Michigan State AFSCME Pact Covers 2,000

Lansing, Mich. — A precedent-setting first contract that brought significant gains to 2,000 non-teaching employes has been signed by Michigan State University and State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1585.

Thomas J. Fitzpatrick, AFSCME area director, predicted that signing of the agreement following some six months of bargaining will "open the door" to negotiations at other Michigan universities. The University of Michigan still maintains that the law granting bargaining rights to public employes, enacted last year, does not apply to universities.

The new contract sets up 20 labor grades, with pay hikes of 18 cents an hour for the first three grades and raises ranging from 11 cents to 14 cents an hour in the others. Differentials of 8 cents an hour on the second shift and 15 cents on the third were provided.

The full union shop was established, with promotion by seniority, a prohibition against supervisors doing the work of anyone in the bargaining unit, and final and binding arbitration of disputes.

The university agreed to pay an additional $8 monthly for hospitalization, and to grant maternity and union educational leave. Workers transferred to other jobs during university holiday periods will receive their regular pay rates.

AFL-CIO Staffer Named To D.C. School Board

Assistant Dir. John A. Sessions of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has been named a member of the District of Columbia Board of Education.

He was one of three new members appointed by the judges of U.S. District Court to fill vacancies caused by resignations. All three have been identified with liberal groups calling for major changes in Washington's education system. They will serve three-year terms.

Sessions is a vice president of the Washington chapter of Americans for Democratic Action and has been regarded as its authority on educational legislation, new teaching methods and school financing.

He is a member of the Advisory Committee to the D.C. superintendent of schools and of D.C. Citizens for Better Education, and participated in the White House Conference on Education last year.

He joined the AFL-CIO staff in 1961 after serving since 1954 as executive secretary of the Ladies' Garment Workers Union Training Institute.

A 1945 graduate of the University of Michigan, he taught there while earning a master's degree in 1946. He then moved to Cornell University, where he taught courses in creative writing and contemporary literature and received a doctorate in 1951. He is a member of the Newspaper Guild and the American Federation of Teachers, and has written widely on many phases of education.

Virginia Primary Seen Victory For New South

thing over 700 votes of about 432,000 votes cast.

In the third race, Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., who was appointed to his father's seat earlier this year and was seeking the nomination for the four years remaining in the term, turned back a strong challenge by former State Sen. Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria by about 8,000 votes.

All three of the challengers to the Byrd organization were supported by the Virginia AFL-CIO and Negro and civil rights organizations in the state.

Smith, the fifth ranking member of the House, went down to apparent defeat in the newly drawn Eighth District after first ignoring the "boy" challenger and then jumping off in a furious campaign to catch up. Rawlings produced a 2 to 1 majority in the western part of Fairfax County, a new part of the district reflecting northern Virginia's suburban growth, rolling up more than 12,000 of his unofficial 26,885 votes in the area.

Smith's defeat means that the next ranking Democratic member of the Rules Committee is in line for the chairmanship, Rep. William M. Colmer of Mississippi.

Robertson's defeat puts Democratic Sen. John J. Sparkman of Alabama next in line for the chairmanship of Banking and Currency.

In recent years other states in the South have taken on a "new look" of moderation and partial liberalism on economic policies, and with the notable exceptions of Alabama and Mississippi have begun to learn to live with new civil rights legislation.

The Byrd organization held steadfast over the years, however, to the old line approach including "massive" opposition to school integration. Virginians last year began the breakaway process by electing a moderate governor who in a short year has drastically revamped the state's fiscal, education and social welfare policies.

Unemployment Rate Sticks at 4%, Youth Job Gains Bypass Negroes

gain, 1.3 million were white and 60,000 were Negro.

In contrast, the June 1964 to June 1965 teenage job gain totaled 281,000—231,000 white and 50,000 Negro.

Thus the impressive job increase of nearly 1.4 million over the past year was recorded almost entirely by white teenagers, as was noted in a special report on teenage employment by Arthur M. Ross, commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Ross found the jobfinding difficulties of Negro youth "troubling." He speculated that white youth may have advantages through their parents in locating and landing jobs.

With total teenage unemployment rising as expected this time of year to 1.9 million—the same as in June last year—the substantial job gain for this group cut its jobless rate from 13.4 percent in May to 12.3 percent in June.

Ross offered a special analysis of the summer situation of teenagers which showed a general improvement over last year.

In terms of gainful employment, the 16- to 19-year-old group had 43 percent at work in June 1965 and 48 percent this June. Whites gainfully employed improved from 44 percent to 50 percent; Negroes rose from 34 percent to 37 percent.

In the 16-17-year-old group, those at work increased from 35 percent last June to 40 percent this June. White members of this group were 35 percent last year and 42 percent this year; Negroes gained from 28 percent to 32 percent.

In the 18-19-year-old group, 52 percent had jobs last June and 58 percent this June. The white rate moved from 53 percent to 60 percent. The job rate for Negroes was unchanged at about 44 percent.

Ross said that, in terms of unemployment rates, the greatest improvement occurred among 18-19-year-old whites. Their rate fell from 19 percent in June 1965 to 15 percent this June.

"On the other hand," he added, "the unemployment rate for 18-19-year-old Negroes rose from 27 percent in June 1965 to 32 percent in June 1966."

Ross said he expects the July survey to show job gains and lower unemployment rates for all teenagers, white and Negro.

The overall jobless rate of 4 percent stands slightly above the 3.7-3.8 percent rate recorded from February to April, but it is down sharply from the 4.7 percent of a year ago. The seasonally adjusted jobless rate averaged 3.9 percent for the second quarter, compared to 3.8 percent for the first quarter. The Labor Dept. said this slight rise ended nine straight quarters of decline in unemployment.

The jobless rate for non-whites continued about double that of whites. With the white rate holding at 3.5 percent, the non-white jobless rate rose from 7.6 percent in May to 7.9 percent in June.

The white jobless rate edged up from 3.4 percent in the first quarter to 3.5 percent in the second. The non-white rate rose from 7.1 percent in the first quarter to 7.5 percent for the period ending with June.

On the employment side of the picture, the job gain of 2 million pushed total employment to a record 75.7 million in June. Nonfarm industries accounted for 1.1 million of the over-the-month rise while farm jobs rose by 900,000. Both increases topped seasonal expectations.

Non-Farm Jobs Up

The non-farm payroll gains, after seasonal adjustment, were 325,000 between May and June, making a non-farm total of 63.4 million. The job gains came in manufacturing, construction and state and local government.

The Labor Dept. report said payroll employment has risen by 3.1 million since June 1965. The manufacturing sector gained 1.1 million jobs over the year, topping 19 million in June.

There was a slight weakening in the job situation of adult workers after this group scored rapid gains early in the year, the report noted. Unemployment among adult men rose by 100,000 in June, when no change had been expected. Thus their jobless rate moved up from 2.4 percent in May to 2.6 percent in June.

On a quarterly basis, the Labor Dept. observed, the slight increases in the rate and level of unemployment were attributable entirely to women and teenagers. The jobless rates for the prime worker groups —men 25 years and older and the married or breadwinner group— continued to edge downward. The group of men 25 years and older had a 2.2 percent jobless rate—lowest in 13 years—while married men were down to 1.8 percent in the second quarter.

Group Practice Health Plan Enrolls Elderly

New York—Individual medicare beneficiaries in this area who cannot get additional medical and hospital protection through group coverage have been invited to enroll in the Health Insurance Plan (HIP) of Greater New York, a direct service group practice plan.

The bid is a departure from HIP group enrollment policy and is addressed to persons 65 and over who have signed up to pay $3 a month for medical care under Medicare Part B. HIP Pres. James Brindle said acceptance is subject only to approval of a brief health statement.

Two programs are open to the individual members. One combines medicare, doctor care and hospital service. It costs $5.72 a month payable quarterly and eliminates the $50 deductible and the 20 percent co-insurance for medical services and the $40 deductible for hospital services. It provides semi-private hospital care for up to 120 days through Blue Cross.

The other program covers medicare and doctor's care only at a premium of $3.32 monthly.

All who enroll in addition will get services covered by HIP membership but not by medicare, including preventive medicine, physical checkups, eye examinations, hearing tests, immunizations and injectable drugs.

HIP will receive direct payment from the Social Security Administration for covered medical services to its members, Brindle pointed out.

IUD Aide Elected By Housing Group

Ben J. Man, an official of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., has been named secretary-treasurer and principal operating officer for Four Freedoms, Inc.

The union-sponsored organization was set up to provide housing for retired union members and maintains retirement centers in Miami Beach, Seattle, Detroit and Paterson, N.J.

Man, who is assistant to IUD Executive Dir. Jack T. Conway, was elected at a recent meeting of the Four Freedoms board of directors. The board also re-elected Joseph Curran as chairman, William Steinberg as president, and Hoyt Haddock and Harry Stone as vice presidents.

Bernstein Work Set For Kennedy Center

Leonard Bernstein, the versatile orchestra conductor and composer, has accepted a commission to compose a new dramatic work for the 1969 opening of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D. C.

Bernstein termed the commission "the highest honor I have ever been accorded."

The Kennedy center, planned as a national showcase for America's outstanding performers, is now under construction. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is a member of its board of trustees.

Pay Inequities At Army Post Under Fire

Rolla, Mo.—The AFL-CIO and the Laborers are spearheading an effort to end sharp inequities in wage levels of employes doing the same type of work at Fort Leonard Wood here.

The situation was disclosed when the Laborers began organizing among employes of the post exchange, whose wages are not determined by a wage board and who are paid out of profits instead of by appropriated funds.

Union organizers learned that employes of the post laundry, whose pay rates are set by a special wage board, have a starting level of $1.25 an hour—the federal minimum—while other unskilled employes at the base, whose pay is determined by a regular wage board, have minimums of $2 for janitorial work and $2.06 for food service.

Relatively skilled laundry workers with 15 to 17 years' experience are making only $1.68 an hour, union representatives reported, while the starting rate for unskilled workers in the base hospital—many of them doing comparable work—is $2.10 an hour.

Vice Pres. Wilbur Freitag of the Laborers said wage board administrators are not satisfied with the present rate structure, and that "there is considerable pressure to eliminate the special schedule (for laundry workers) since it only creates hardships and cannot be justified in terms of overall employment" at the installation.

Dominican Workers Get New Homes

A second group of Dominican sugar workers moved into new homes in the John F. Kennedy housing project, sponsored by the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

They received titles to the homes from the AFL-CIO Investment Dir. Alexander Bookstaver at ceremonies held in San Pedro de Macoris. A third section of homes is under construction. The project, financed by a $600,000 grant from the Agency for Intl. Development, will house 110 families when completed.

In another area of inter-American labor cooperation, negotiations moved ahead for U.S. unions to finance a 568-family housing development in the new nation of Guyana.

In Georgetown, capital of Guyana—formerly British Guiana—Bookstaver and Atty. Robert Mayer completed preliminary arrangements for mortgage money for a large-scale housing project sponsored by AIFLD and the Trades Union Council of Guyana.

AFL-CIO affiliates are putting up funds for the $2 million loan, which will be guaranteed by the AID.

The single-family units will be built on a 113-acre site.

Painters Open Political Action Conferences

Kansas City, Mo.—The first of a series of regional workshops aimed at more effective local union administration and more intensified political action was held here by the Painters.

More than 200 delegates attended from locals in Missouri, Kansas, Minnesota, Colorado, Iowa, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Oklahoma, New Mexico and Tennessee.

Pres. S. Frank Raftery and international union staff members discussed legislative objectives of primary concern in the coming congressional elections, opportunities for new organization, economic developments, apprenticeship expansion and jurisdiction. The delegates in turn reported on local conditions and problems in question and answer sessions.

Workshops also have been scheduled for Portland, Ore., July 16-17; Los Angeles July 18-20; Toronto, Ont., Aug. 27; Albany, N. Y., Sept. 17-18, and Columbus, O., Sept. 21-23.

commitment in the 1962 salary reform legislation to bring government salaries up to the level of comparable private industry jobs. Before agreeing to support the compromise bill finally enacted, AFL-CIO unions presented a strong case in House and Senate commitee hearings for a 7.5 percent raise.

The bill will allow employes with 30 years of service to retire at age 55 without reduction in pension. Those with 20 years of service will be able to retire at age 60. Previously 30-year employes had to take a 1 percent pension cut for each year they were under 60 and 20-year workers had to wait until 62.

Congress refused to go along with the Administration request to boost the employe payroll deduction for the retirement program and to permit agencies to compel early retirement of some employes.

The retirement gains and a number of other fringes will benefit hourly-paid blue collar workers, as well as white collar and postal employes.

The legislation also raises the government's contribution to health insurance for its employes. It liberalizes overtime benefits, adds a differential for Sunday work falling within an employe's regularly-scheduled workweek, and increases by 25 percent the allowance for employes who wear uniforms on the job.

By a 71-9 vote, the Senate defeated an amendment by Sen. Frank J. Lausche (D-O.) to defer the increase to Jan. 1, 1967—the date originally proposed by the President. It beat, on a 62-18 rollcall, a move by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) to raise the employe contribution to the retirement fund from 6.5 to 7 percent of pay.

In separate legislation, Congress voted a higher expense allowance for families of federal employes who are transferred to jobs in other cities. Besides raising the weight limit on shipment of household goods, it pays for a round-trip for house-hunting at the new location, other necessary costs and up to $632 for miscellaneous expenses.

There were these other developments as the House and Senate resumed work after a July 4th week vacation:

- The Senate unanimously approved a labor-backed expansion of school lunch and school milk programs. The bill authorized funds to help schools in low-income neighborhoods buy lunchroom equipment and set up an experimental program of school breakfasts. Pres. Johnson had proposed a cut in the regular school milk and lunch programs, to limit it to the needy, but Congress has refused to go along. The pilot program of school breakfasts will be given a two-year trial in poverty areas and in rural areas where children have long distances to travel before starting classes.

- A six-year $6 billion program to step up federal, state and local efforts to reduce water pollution cleared the Senate, 90-0. It includes a new river basin approach, under which the federal government would pay 50 percent of sewage disposal and treatment costs, states would put up 30 percent of the funds, and local communities and industries the balance. Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), one of 48 sponsors of the legislation, said the program is needed to make "a minimum start" on nationwide water pollution problems.

- Also unanimously approved by the Senate was an expansion of the 1963 Clean Air Act, with increased funds authorized to combat air pollution.

- The House moved toward a showdown vote on the foreign aid authorization bill. In preliminary tests, the Administration beat back a series of Republican attempts to cut the program and limit the proposed two-year authorization to a single year.

- The House Commerce Committee, in a series of tentative votes, indicated that it will approve an auto safety bill at least as strong as the Senate-passed measure. It approved similar requirements for new cars to meet federal safety standards. And it added a new section looking toward establishment of minimum performance standards for used cars. States would be encouraged to set up their own used car inspection systems. But if they didn't, federal requirements would be established.

2 Unionists on Panel For Study of Draft Laws

Pres. Johnson named Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks and Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers to a 20-member National Advisory Committee on Selective Service. The committee, headed by Burke Marshall, general counsel for Intl. Business Machines, will recommend changes in present draft laws.

Philip Pearl Dies at 62, Veteran Labor Publicist

Philip Pearl, a veteran of nearly 30 years in public relations for the trade union movement, died of a heart ailment in a Silver Spring, Md. hospital on July 9. He was 62.

Pearl was the first director of public relations of the AFL-CIO. His death was mourned by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who said he "was a devoted trade unionist, a fine and decent man and a warm personal friend. The trade union movement and all who knew him personally mourn his untimely death."

From covering the White House in the hectic New Deal days for Universal News Service, Pearl went to the former AFL as its first and only public relations director. In 1955 Meany named him director of public relations for the newly merged AFL-CIO.

He left the federation in 1957 to form his own public relations agency, which later became the Pearl-Silverman Agency and represents a number of major labor unions and AFL-CIO constitutional departments.

Pearl was the founding editor of the AFL News-Reporter in 1951, the federation's first weekly newspaper. The paper was later merged with the CIO News at the time of the AFL-CIO merger.

He was a member of the National Press Club and the American Newspaper Guild.

Born in New York City, Pearl was a reporter for the former New York World before joining Universal News Service.

His survivors are a son, Jonathan; a daughter, Elizabeth; Mrs. Marilyn Miller Pearl, and a sister, Mrs. J. R. Mandelbaum of New York City.

SUPPORT for grape workers' strike and boycott of DiGiorgio products was voiced in this parade on Market St., San Francisco, staged after the city proclaimed "Huelga (Strike) Day." Marchers include members of National Farm Workers Association and AFL-CIO's Agricultural Workers' Organizing Committee. DiGiorgio heads growers blocking union organization, AWOC said.

Striking Grape Workers Parade On San Francisco's 'Huelga Day'

San Francisco—This city proclaimed "Huelga Day" as 1,000 marchers paraded up Market St., July 9, in a demonstration to tell the story of the DiGiorgio boycott and the battle of farm worker organization.

The proclamation was voted by the Board of Supervisors and signed by the acting mayor. It hailed "the effort to achieve economic independence for California's field workers" and the struggle to end rural poverty as exemplified in the Delano story.

The San Francisco march was the first of a series of parades by striking grape workers planned in communities in California and perhaps other states.

Its purpose was to urge the public not to buy products of the huge DiGiorgio corporation, marketed under Treesweet and S & W brands, until the struck argricultural firm makes a satisfactory settlement.

Marchers were led by members of the National Farm Workers Association and the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee which have been on strike since last September against DiGiorgio and other grape growers at Delano in the rich San Joaquin Valley.

Marching with them were members of a number of Bay Area unions, clergymen, nuns, students, civil rights workers—even actors from the NFWA's Teatro Campesino and the San Francisco Mime Troupe.

In the front rank were AWOC Delano Strike Dir. Larry Itliong, NFWA Dir. Cesar Chavez and AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher.

The paraders had a new slogan, "Schenley Si, DiGiorgio No" to add to their longtime rallying cry, "Huelga," the Spanish word for strike.

It pointed to contrasting actions of Schenley Industries, Inc., which has signed an NFWA union contract, and DiGiorgio which staged its own union representation election—with strikers excluded and on two days notice. DiGiorgio announced its election plan while talks were still underway with the unions to set up a consent election.

Labor has charged that some DiGiorgio workers who did not wish to vote were forced to cast ballots, that company representatives accompanied voters into polling places, and that supervisors voted. Gov. Edmund G. Brown (D) has named a former presidential labor adviser, Richard W. Haughton, to investigate the charges.

The marchers moved from the waterfront 12 blocks to Civic Center where 2,000 more joined them in bleachers left over from a Shriners' convention.

Picket Store

After a brief rally, the demonstrators repaired to a nearby Safeway store, still selling DiGiorgio products, and staged an informational picket line to advertise the boycott.

Chavez told the rally that victory over DiGiorgio will mean for the first time that farm workers will have effective unionism.

"This is not a fight against DiGiorgio," he said. "It is a fight against a system which makes a farm worker a second class citizen —perhaps even worse."

Winning collective bargaining rights for farm workers, "the right to sit down face to face with their employers and do something about the problems which have plagued them and their families for years" is the most important battle now facing the labor movement, Kircher said.

While San Francisco was proclaiming "Huelga Day" in tribute to the farm workers fight, officialdom in the San Joaquin Valley home of the big growers was less than happy.

The Delano mayor and the Kern County Board of Supervisors were quoted as denying that the phrase "rural poverty" in the San Francisco board's resolution accurately described their area. The Kern County Chamber of Commerce was reported ready to prepare its own resolutions.

But there was no doubt about nationwide understanding of the strike issues. Chavez read the Civic Center rally wires of support from Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.), UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Pres. Charles Cogen of the American Federation of Teachers, and numerous other individuals and organizations.

Union Awards Civil Rights Scholarship

Chicago — The Packinghouse Workers' Russell Bull Scholarship, given annually to a college or high school student who makes an "outstanding contribution" in the area of civil rights, has been awarded to Mrs. Ann Valliant Springfield, Gravette, Ark., a senior at the University of Arkansas.

The winner of the $1,000 award will receive her bachelor's degree in January and start work immediately for a master's degree.

Among the many civil rights projects in which she was engaged was a program of conducting classes for Negro children to enable them to take their places in integrated schools. She has also worked on voter registration in Alabama and participated in the formation of the Arkansas Committee of Concern, which raised funds and recruited manpower to rebuild bombed or burned Negro churches in Mississippi.

The scholarship honors the memory of the late Russell Bull, Des Moines, Ia., a UPWA district president who was killed in an auto accident several years ago.

Raps House Bill As 'Mere Token'

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the Senate to pass an unemployment insurance bill providing a "realistic floor of protection" for workers who lose their jobs instead of the present "subcellar of neglect and despair."

Testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, Meany termed the unemployment compensation bill passed by the House last month "completely unsatisfactory . . . a mere token measure."

He strongly urged the Senate committee to write into the bill federal standards sought by the Administration. These include higher ceilings on the amount of benefits, at least 26 weeks of state benefits with a federally-financed extension for persons with a steady work history, limits on disqualification, a major expansion of coverage and adequate financing.

By contrast, the House bill is limited to a compromise expansion of coverage and a 13-week program of federal-state benefits which would take effect only during recessions.

Testimony Praised

The AFL-CIO position drew warm praise from Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) and other committee members.

Long noted that Congress sets standards that states must meet for virtually every other federally-financed program and found it "inconsistent" that unemployment insurance be the exception.

He acknowledged that some states, including his own, have used low unemployment tax rates to attract and help business but this, he said, is not right in "justice and equity."

The Senate has gone "a lot fur-

Senate Unit Closes Gap In Wage Bill

A Senate Labor subcommittee has voted 10-0 approval of a minimum wage bill that would guarantee 30 million workers $1.60 an hour by Feb. 1, 1968—a year earlier than the date set in a House-passed bill.

The House last May narrowly adopted a stretchout amendment delaying the $1.60 wage floor until 1969. Labor and the Administration urged the Senate to undo this damage to the bill, which the AFL-CIO estimated would cost low-paid workers nearly $2 billion in lost wages.

The stretchout amendment, which caught supporters of the wage-hour bill by surprise, was suggested on the floor of the House by Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.) as a compromise. It carried only by a narrow 205-194 margin.

The Senate subcommittee made some other changes in the House bill, but the main provisions were the same.

Both versions would bring the 30 million workers now covered by the $1.25 federal minimum to a $1.40

Committee Strengthened:

8 Electrical Unions Reaffirm Solidarity

Eight AFL-CIO unions representing 180,000 General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Electric Corp. workers declared their determination to "continue and strengthen" their coordinated efforts as "the only effective way to secure genuine collective bargaining" in contract talks this year.

Federation Pres. George Meany met with leaders of the unions comprising the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining With GE and Westinghouse for a report on recent developments.

The unions are for the first time coordinating their bargaining goals, though each will handle its own negotiations.

Conference leaders heard a report on the action of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in filing unfair practice charges against GE management for walking out of a pre-negotiation meeting May 4 because the IUE committee included members of the other unions.

U.S. District Judge H. R. Tyler of New York City ordered GE to explain why it should not be enjoined from refusing to bargain and set a July 25 hearing date. The injunction had been requested by the National Labor Relations Board, whose general counsel authorized issuance of a complaint along with dismissal of a GE charge against the unions.

Meany released a statement on the committee's behalf announcing the addition to its ranks of three unions which offered their cooperation—the Carpenters, Plumbers and Steelworkers, all representing some GE and Westinghouse workers.

The committee has designated Aug. 16 as AFL-CIO Unity Day, when members of the cooperating unions will demonstrate their support of committee objectives by wearing a "unity" button.

The committee reported that its members have held a "tremendously successful" series of 17 grass roots meetings around the country and conducted a "vigorous" educational campaign to inform members of the issues involved in contract talks

Higher prices for medical care and food and rising interest rates sent the Consumer Price Index up three-tenths of one percent in June, bringing the six-month rise in living costs to 1.7 percent, the largest six-month increase since 1958.

The living cost rise resulted in a further slight decline in an average factory worker's real earnings. Over the year real wages have dropped two-tenths of one percent despite an increase in average weekly earnings.

Grape Strikers, DiGiorgio Accept Plan for New Representation Vote

Sacramento, Calif.—A major break occurred in the long struggle of California farm workers for union rights as Gov. Edmund G. Brown (D) announced that a new representation election would be held Aug. 30 among DiGiorgio Corp. employes at Delano and Borrego Springs.

The election will be followed by similar votes at three other DiGiorgio locations if the striking National Farm Workers Association makes a "proper showing" of authorization cards, the governor said he was advised by Ronald W. Haughton, veteran arbitrator whom he had named to mediate the dispute.

Haughton's plan to hold a new election superseding results of a company-arranged "quickie" vote was accepted by all parties to the dispute over bargaining rights for grape workers.

Involved are DiGiorgio, spearhead of a growers' organization battling unionism; the NFWA, on strike since last September at Delano and Borrego Springs; the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, also on strike and supporting the NFWA; and the expelled Teamsters.

Haughton was called in by the governor to seek a solution to the dispute when DiGiorgio announced the Teamsters had won an election the company had called on its own with two days' notice. NFWA and AWOC members refused to take part in that balloting and charged that less than half the eligible workers voted.

The AFL-CIO has been supporting the strike and a national boycott of DiGeorgio products, marketed primarily as Treesweet and S & W brands.

The Aug. 30 election will be con-

Court Voids Union-Imposed Loyalty Oath

New York—A "loyalty oath" membership requirement of the unaffiliated Directors Guild of America was invalidated by a federal appellate court here in a unanimous—but carefully qualified—decision.

The court based its decision on the common law of New York, holding that the vagueness of the oath in question made it an unreasonable ground for expulsion or denial of membership. The oath declared in part that the member does not "support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States government by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods."

The decision, by Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard, stressed that the court was "not necessarily" outlawing all forms of loyalty oaths or challenging the right of a union to expel a Communist or a person engaged in subversive activity. But it said the "broad language" of the oath conflicted with "individual integrity" and could discourage persons from espousing "controversial political positions."

The Directors Guild imposed its loyalty requirement in 1949, when the film industry was under attack in congressional investigations. Last year, when a New York organization of 400 directors was merged with the larger group, six members refused to sign the oath on civil liberties grounds. A federal district court denied their request for an injunction against the oath, but the appellate court reversed the denial.

New Union Vote Slated For DiGiorgio Workers

ducted under these terms as laid down by Haughton:

- Workers at Delano and Borrego Springs will vote, under the supervision of the American Arbitration Association, with two observers at each polling place representing each party on the ballot.
- Supervisors and clerical employes will not be permitted to vote.
- Those voting will cast a white ballot if they are field workers, a green ballot for all others. The election result will be determined by the total tally of votes in each of the two units.
- Employes who went on strike at Delano and who signed NFWA cards shall be counted as yes votes for the NFWA on the white ballot.
- Upon acceptance of the recommendations all strike and boycott activities must cease and company cooperation to "carry out the letter and spirit" of the recommendations shall be required. In the event of violations, the arbiter will make a decision enforceable in an appropriate court.

Haughton ruled, and the parties agreed, that if a union is selected in an appropriate bargaining unit, negotiations leading to a contract shall commence "immediately" and continue for 45 days.

If two unions are certified, a common expiration date for the first contract will be required to ensure "stable collective bargaining relationships," the arbiter said, adding:

Binding Arbitration

"Unless the time is extended by mutual agreement, all remaining differences shall be submitted to final and binding arbitration" by Haughton or Sam Kagel of San Francisco, another arbiter.

The award will be retroactive to the date of certification. An unsuccessful union is barred from obtaining another election for a year or from conducting a boycott for a similar period.

Haughton said he was informed July 19 that a layoff of DiGiorgio workers was in process at Delano for a two or three-week period. He requested that such employes be given preference in rehiring and, if unable to return, be allowed to file a mail ballot in the election.

NFWA Dir. Cesar Chavez renewed a demand on DiGiorgio to "comply with the spirit of these recommendations by agreeing to prompt elections" at other locations —Arvin, Yuba City and Marysville, Calif.

Texas Farm Workers Take Up 'Huelga' Cry

The rallying cry of "Huelga"—the Spanish word for strike—has spread from the grape fields of California to the vast fruit farms of the Rio Grande Valley of Texas. And so has labor's support for the right of farm workers to organize, bargain, and earn a decent wage.

Three hundred melon pickers rebelled against their 50 to 85 cents an hour wage rate last month and soon more than 1,000 Mexican-American farm workers in the area had signed up in the National Farm Workers Association—the organization which along with the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee is conducting the California grape strike.

Texas unions helped from the start — with donations of food, clothing, medicine and money in cooperation with the Catholic Bishops' Committee for the Spanish Speaking.

The executive board of the State AFL-CIO has voted to continue and step-up organized labor's support—and to raise a $25,000 fund to help the strike.

In Starr County, where the per capita income is reportedly the lowest in the nation, strikers have been harassed with everything from court injunctions and arrests to the breakup of a strike meeting when a county tractor crew sprayed insecticide on the strikers.

60-Day March

A symbolic 60-day, 400-mile "march" by a delegation of strikers accompanied by two priests and a Baptist minister is under way to help publicize the dispute. It is scheduled to end on Labor Day in Austin, the state capital. Many of the workers who have left the Rio Grande Valley to migrate with the crop harvest will return for the Labor Day event.

The goal of the Mexican-American farm workers is a $1.25 minimum wage. Texas has no state minimum wage and the federal wage floor now excludes farm workers, although the minimum wage bill pending in Congress would bring workers on large farms under limited coverage.

On the three corporate farms where the strike started, workers received 85 cents an hour during the cantaloupe harvest season—50 cents an hour for ordinary field work, when there was work available.

James Gulick Named Acting Maritime Chief

Deputy Maritime Administrator James W. Gulick, a civil servant for 35 years, has been sworn in as acting maritime administrator. He succeeds Nicholas Johnson, who has been appointed to a seven-year term on the Federal Communications Commission.

Canadian Locals Win Salary Status

Kingston, Ont. — Production and maintenance workers at the Aluminum Company of Canada plant here will switch from hourly pay to a weekly salary this October.

Steelworkers Local 343 and Machinists Lodge 54 negotiated the pioneering two-year agreement, which includes other gains valued at better than $20 a week per employe.

The 1,600 workers will continue to receive overtime after eight hours a day and a shift differential.

A feature of the new contract is payment of full salary for one year during sickness or accident.

Maintenance of Way Convention:

Rail Union Parley Pushes Wage Drive

Montreal—The Maintenance of Way Employes' 35th convention has voiced strong support for wage and rules improvements now being sought on U.S. and Canadian railroads and pledged all necessary steps to "secure a fair and just settlement."

The 700 delegates re-elected Pres. Harold C. Crotty and Sec.-Treas. Frank L. Noakes for four-year terms and also returned five vice presidents. Chosen to succeed retiring Vice Presidents George Hudson and J. H. Hadley were J. W. Cope of Kansas City, Mo., and R. R. Painter of Roanoke, Va.

Convention actions updating and revising the union constitution and bylaws included the setting of an age ceiling for candidates for grand lodge office. This ceiling, set on a sliding scale, will drop to age 65 on Jan. 1, 1970:

The delegates also:

- Endorsed a national drive for a 35-hour week and a current campaign for supplemental pensions for railroad employes.
- Commended job security agreements won on U.S. and Canadian railroads and the Canada pension plan, and called for improvements.
- Urged a curb on contracting-out of members' work and repeal of anti-labor laws like "right to work."
- Chose Detroit, home city of the brotherhood, as the locale of the 1970 convention.

Goals for the next four years were pinpointed in resolutions and committee recommendations adopted by the convention. Among them are contract proposals now in negotiation—wage boosts in keeping with rising railroad profitability and worker productivity, improved vacations and holiday leaves, better pay for travel time and away-from-home expenses, and cost of living wage adjustments.

Crotty said the issue of job security remains a pressing problem for members and he pledged to "solidify and expand" the gains recently won for rail workers.

Chairman George E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association told the delegates that "hard cold facts" have discredited the "poverty myth" that management vigorously spread until mounting profits forced a new tack. The industry is now entering a new "golden age," Leighty quoted a top management spokesman as claiming.

Railroad net profits have risen steadily each year since 1961 and will be "well over the $1 billion mark" for a near-record this year, he predicted.

All rail unions are determined, he said, to win for members a "fair share of the profits that result" from their rising productivity.

Major addresses were given also by Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress and John R. Nicholson, Canadian labor minister.

Job Bias Complaints Top 1st Year Forecast

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission announced that it had received more than 8,600 complaints of job discrimination during its first year of operation—more than four times the number anticipated.

It ruled out 2,600 complaints as outside the commission's jurisdiction. Of the remaining 6,000, half were from Negroes charging race discrimination and one-third alleged sex discrimination. Other grounds for federal action include job bias based on religion and national origin.

Some 2,200 complaints were referred to state fair employment agencies for investigation and action, the commission said.

Most of the cases are still in the process of investigation or conciliation, the report noted, and some have already "helped to bring about new employment attitudes and practices in many areas of this nation."

The comission said it was encouraged by "the voluntary cooperation of businessmen and union leaders in going beyond the letter of the law to fulfill its spirit."

Complaint Breakdown

A breakdown of the complaints into major categories showed 22.9 percent dealt with hiring, 20.6 percent with promotions, 15.8 percent with seniority, 13.4 percent with benefits, and 11.1 percent with wage differentials.

During the first year of the federal law's operation, only establishments with 100 or more workers were covered. On July 2, coverage was extended to employers with 75 or more workers. This will raise the number of firms covered from 58,000 to 73,000.

In addition to dealing with complaints, the agency has mounted a technical assistance program to help open up new job opportunities through voluntary action, its report noted.

Rights Clauses Pioneered in Teachers Pact

Inkster, Mich.—A first contract with strong civil rights provisions has been agreed to by Teachers' Local 1068 and the Inkster Board of Education.

The agreement, called by the AFT a model for the nation, sets salaries and working conditions for all Inkster teachers and also calls for:

- Introduction of "integrated elementary textbooks" as basic reading texts and supplemental reading materials "dealing with Negro and other minority group contributions."
- American history books which "cover in depth the contributions" of minority groups in each unit taught, and "comprehensive units in Negro, African, Asian and Latin-American history."
- Total integration of all staffs at the earliest possible date.
- Complete revision of the testing program to "take into account culturally different" pupils.
- Cooperation to set up a community action group to help implement programs which will "racially balance the schools."
- Promotion by the board and the union of open occupancy housing laws for Inkster, a Detroit suburb with a sizable percentage of Negro residents.

Factory Injury Rate Up in First Quarter

The factory work-injury rate edged up during the first quarter of 1966, the Labor Dept's Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. The rate of 12.9 disabling injuries per million hours worked compared with 12.2 for the first quarter of 1965. It was the highest for the quarter since 1953.

IATSE Members Told:

Political Action Key To Legislative Gains

Detroit—More than 1,100 delegates to the biennial convention of the Theatrical Stage Employes were urged to take an active role in 1966 political campaigns to preserve recent legislative gains and win new progress.

IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh, in his keynote address to the convention, declared that "never was there a time of greater need for all of us to think hard and carefully about the political situation. . . ."

He hailed the Johnson Administration's accomplishments in inspiring new liberal legislation as "without parallel since the early days of Franklin D. Roosevelt" and said they "give us great cause to rally behind the President and his legislative team."

"But keeping the team intact will not be easy," he observed. "The party in power always has a tough time in off-year elections and those 59 liberal congressmen who were elected by very narrow margins in 1964 have the additional burden of the problems of the anti-Communist war effort."

Victories in such legislation as medicare, minimum wage and the easing of punitive union bonding requirements under the Landrum-Griffin Act, Walsh said, "cannot offset our disappointment" over some of the failures of Congress. Among these he listed the failure to relax "the unrealistic curb on picketing at construction sites and failure to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act," which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements.

Big Turnout Needed

The only way unions can win these key objectives, he declared, is to get their members, families and friends to the polls on election day to vote for liberal congressmen.

Political action is vital, too, the IATSE president observed, to correct an "intolerable" situation created by state obscenity laws involving projectionists, who make up an important segment of the union's membership.

Walsh reported that since the union's last convention, members have been brought into court in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Tennessee, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri and California under laws requiring projectionists to pass judgment on whether or not a film is morally suitable for public exhibition.

"Most of them have been convicted, and in some instances management has been unwilling to pay their fines," he said. "In every instance the publicity has been most embarrassing to the members and their families."

Walsh said the laws have become a real headache because of relaxing standards in the motion picture industry as to dress, language and dramatic subject matter, and a recent Supreme Court ruling that films may not be censored prior to their public showing.

No Relaxing Now

He explained that before the court ruling an exhibitor could feel safe if a picture had passed a review board, "but now he cannot relax until after the police have come and gone." He noted that arrests for showing allegedly obscene films are on the rise "and in most instances the projectionist gets arrested along with the manager."

The union has taken the position that an employed projectionist, who has no voice in the booking of a film and who could lose his job by refusing to show it, should not be held responsible. Walsh said this argument has been accepted twice by grand juries in Toledo, O., but elsewhere "the tribunals have been less understanding."

One bright spot, he observed, was the union's success in persuading the Connecticut legislature and the governor that licensed projectionists in licensed theaters should be exempt from prosecution under a state law prescribing fines and imprisonment for persons who produce or aid in the production of indecent shows.

Walsh noted that California and Massachusetts locals are engaged in a similar legislative effort and urged other locals around the country to seek such relief through political action.

Wisconsinites Pay Tribute To Schoemann

The public interest is often best served when so-called "pressure groups" make the best possible case for the interests they represent, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann suggested in a speech to the Wisconsin State Society.

Schoemann was guest of honor at a Washington, D.C., luncheon—recipient of the state society's first distinguished citizen's award. He was honored as a Wisconsin native who has enriched his nation and state through leadership in labor, education and civic affairs.

Responding to the award, and laudatory speeches from notables in Congress, government and labor, Schoemann said determination of the public interest is comparable to the judicial process. It requires advocates — special pleaders—to present the best possible case for their point of view before an impartial judgment can be rendered.

The plaque presented to Schoemann recited his accomplishments as a local and a national officer of his union, as a member of the Milwaukee Housing Authority, as a leader in the field of apprentice training, as an AFL-CIO vice president, delegate to international conferences and member of many federal advisory boards.

The Wisconsin congressional delegation added a bipartisan endorsement in a letter congratulating Schoemann as "one of the great leaders of the labor movement" and a crusader for better education, "both academic and vocational." It was signed by Wisconsin's two senators and 10 congressmen.

Airline Talks Pushed, Wirtz Steps Up Role

a vote of the strikers the management proposal currently on the table but cancelled the balloting plan after Wirtz termed it "pointless," noting that there was no firm agreement to be voted on and negotiations would be delayed for a week.

The President urged continuing negotiations at a news conference adding that he was "hopeful that they (the parties) will continue and work around the clock" to reach an agreement. He said the Administration had "taken every legal step we could" and that there are "no legal remedies left."

Wirtz called for continued bargaining to reach an agreement within the framework of recommendations made by a presidential emergency board. He noted that the "framework" of the report left room for bargaining.

The board named by Johnson under the Railway Labor Act recommended a 42-month contract with wage increases of 42 cents an hour for top-rated mechanics and 34 cents for others; some vacation and holiday improvements and a reduction in the number of wage steps.

The IAM wage policy committee rejected the recommendations as far short of the needs of airline workers, noting that they have fallen far behind other workers in a period of spiraling profits.

The union has kept military and defense supply lines open during the strike which came after eight months of negotiations with the five airlines—United, Eastern, Trans World, Northwest and National—for renewal of contracts that expired last Dec. 31.

The President, in answer to a news conference question, said the Administration does not plan to seek legislation at this session of Congress to end the airlines dispute. Johnson had said in earlier messages to Congress that he intended to ask for legislation to deal with national emergency disputes with specific attention to those involving public transportation.

He told reporters that although the Administration has been working on such proposals, "I must frankly say that we have been unsuccessful in getting legislation which is acceptable and which would pass" Congress.

Order to Bargain Hits Michigan School Board

Detroit—The North Dearborn Heights School District has been ruled guilty of refusing to bargain in good faith with its striking teachers and ordered to negotiate with their union on all aspects of working conditions.

The ruling by Robert Pisarski, chief trial examiner for the Michigan Labor Mediation Board, was the first of its kind since the amended Michigan Public Employes Relations Act became effective a year ago. It will "have a national impact," Pres. Charles Cogen of the American Federation of Teachers said.

The union won bargaining rights for the suburban district's 110 teachers in January and struck June 2 in protest over delaying tactics of school officials. Negotiations resumed but were stymied again following Pisarski's decision when the school district said it would appeal the ruling to the full mediation board.

Pres. Rita McGowan of the North Dearborn AFT said Pisarski upheld the right of teachers to evaluate curricula and the size of classes, to appeal discharges or demotions, and to seek changes in methods of rating teaching effectiveness.

The ruling, if allowed to stand, will affirm the legality of the union's strike, Mrs. McGowan said. A state law forbids public employes to strike.

Six teachers' groups walked out before Michigan schools ended their regular sessions for the summer. Four were AFT locals—in Taylor Township, Melvindale, North Dearborn Heights, and Ecorse. Two were affiliates of the National Education Association—in Flint and Crestwood, Mich., which called their walkouts "professional days."

The Ecorse AFT removed its pickets when the school district "hired back" the 190 teachers it had previously fired. Contract negotiations are being conducted almost daily, Michigan Federation of Teachers Pres. Henry Linne said.

Hugh Mullin Dies, Ex-COPE Staffer

Pittsburgh—Hugh Mullin, former COPE Area 2 Director, died recently in Florida. Mullin, 58, retired two years ago after more than 30 years in the labor movement. His COPE region consisted of Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Maryland and West Virginia.

A member of the Fire Fighters, he had been captain of the fire department in his native Pittsburgh, Pa., and had served as auditor of the Pennsylvania AFL and as field man for the AFL Labor's League for Political Education before becoming COPE area director in 1955.

He is survived by his wife, Eleanor.

CPI Rise Laid to Food, Medical Care, Interest

Dept. reported. About 50,000 aircraft workers will get increases along with 21,000 interstate bus drivers and 3,500 other workers.

At 112.9 the index for June was about 2.5 percent higher than a year ago. The index means that consumers in June of this year paid $11.29 for the same market basket of goods and services that cost $10 about eight years ago.

The rise in food prices, four-tenths of one-percent, was in line with seasonal expectations, the report said. Doctors and dentists' fees and health insurance charges rose seven-tenths of one percent, and hospital charges were up six-tenths of one percent.

A 2 percent advance in interest rates in June, especially for mortgages, "reflected a continuing scarcity of funds for new mortgage lending" and a general climb of interest rates, the department said.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics noted that one-half of the increase in the CPI in the past year has been caused by higher charges for consumer services — up 3.7 percent. Food prices were up 3.5 percent over a year ago and apparel prices averaged 2.3 percent higher than in June 1965.

An average factory worker with three dependents took home $99.22 in June after deduction of social security and federal income taxes, unchanged from a month earlier but up about $2.15 over the year.

In real earning power the figures were $87.88 this year and $88.09 a year ago.

Earl McMahon Dies, Chicago Crafts Leader

Chicago — Earl J. McMahon, president of the Chicago Building & Construction Trades Council and the Illinois State Building Trades Conference, died here at 71.

McMahon had been a member of Lathers Local 74 for 52 years. He was also first vice president of the Illinois State AFL-CIO.

Days of Decision

THE LONG SUMMER days of July and August, complete with vacations and other diversions from the routine of daily living, are also the days of political decision.

In the next few weeks registration deadlines for critical primary elections will be slipping by. In the next six weeks nearly half the states will be holding primary elections to determine party candidates for the general elections on Nov. 8.

And given the early registration deadline dates in many states for the November balloting, many voters will find themselves shut out if they don't become eligible to vote by mid-September.

THE PRIMARIES to date have tended to show something less than overwhelming involvement by the voters. Turnouts have fallen off, naturally enough, from the highs of the 1964 presidential year. But the number of voters participating in the primaries has shown little if any increase over the 1962 figures.

To overcome apathy and the natural slowdown in activities that accompany the summer months, properly planned and energetically executed register-and-vote campaigns have been given the highest priority by the trade union movement.

The choice of candidates in the party primaries is crucial to what happens in the November elections. And the November elections will determine the political character of the 90th Congress and the fate of progressive and liberal legislation for the next two years.

It will determine also the governorships of a number of major states, the makeup of state legislatures across the country, many of them being elected for the first time on a basis of fair representation.

THERE IS MUCH at stake in the next 100 days that cannot be solved in the final few hectic days or weeks of a political campaign. First and foremost, the question of whether or not citizens will be eligible to vote and have a voice in the political decisions is being determined now in terms of registration.

Secondly, whether the Republican Party will be controlled by the right-wing Goldwater-allied forces or the more moderate and liberal forces is up for decision. The same question confronts the Democratic Party in many states—will it be the old-line conservatives or will the liberal, progressive forces emerge victorious from the primaries?

If American democracy is to be truly representative then the greatest possible participation in the election progress is essential.

That means informed voters with a knowledge of the candidates and the issues; involved voters who have made a contribution of time or dollars or both; but most of all it means eligible voters, men and women who can walk into a voting booth because their names are clearly inscribed on the registration books as citizens who took the time and made the effort to help make the democratic system work.

'A Reverse Klan':

NAACP's Roy Wilkins Scores Separatism of 'Black Power'

The following is excerpted from an address by Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at the organization's recent convention in Los Angeles.

ALL ABOUT US are alarms and confusions as well as great and challenging developments. Differences of opinion are sharper. For the first time since several organizations began to function where only two had functioned before, there emerges what seems to be a difference in goals.

Heretofore there were some differences in methods and emphasis but none in ultimate goals. The end was always to be the inclusion of the American Negro, without racial discrimination, as a full-fledged equal in all phases of American citizenship.

There has now emerged, first, a strident and threatening challenge to a strategy widely employed by civil rights groups, namely non-violence. One organization which has been meeting in Baltimore has passed a resolution declaring for defense of themselves by Negro citizens if they are attacked.

This position is not new as far as the NAACP is concerned. Historically our association has defended in court those persons who have defended themselves and their homes with firearms.

But neither have we couched a policy of manly resistance in such a way that our members and supporters felt compelled to maintain themselves in an armed state, ready to retaliate instantly and in kind whenever attacked.

We venture the observation that such a publicized posture could serve to stir counterplanning, counteraction and possible conflict. If carried out literally as instant retaliation, in cases adjudged by aggrieved persons to have been grossly unjust, this policy could produce—in extreme situations—lynchings, or in better-sounding phraseology, private vigilante vengeance.

Moreover, in attempting to substitute for derelict law enforcement machinery, the policy entails the risk of a broader, more indiscriminate crackdown by law officers under the ready-made excuse of restoring law and order.

It seems reasonable to assume that proclaimed protective violence is as likely to encourage counterviolence as it is to discourage violent persecution.

But the more serious division in the civil rights movement is one posed by a word formulation that implies clearly a difference in goals.

No matter how endlessly they try to explain it, the term "black power" means antiwhite power. In a racially pluralistic society, the concept, the formation and the exercise of that ethnically tagged power means opposition to other ethnic powers. In the black-and-white relationship, it has to mean that every other ethnic power is the rival and the antagonist of "black power." It has to mean "going it alone." It has to mean separatism.

NOW SEPARATISM, whether on the rarefied debate level of "black power" or on the wishful level of a secessionist Freedom City in Watts, offers a disadvantaged minority little except a chance to shrivel and die.

Ideologically it dictates "up with black and down with white" in precisely the same manner that South Africa reverses that slogan.

It is a reverse Mississippi, a reverse Hitler, a reverse Ku Klux Klan.

If these were evil in our judgment, what virtue can we claim for black over white? If, as some proponents claim, this concept instills pride of race, cannot this pride be taught without preaching hatred or supremacy based on race?

Though it be clarified and clarified again, "black power" in the quick, uncritical and highly emotional adoption it has received from some segments of a beleaguered people, can mean in the end only black death. Even if, through some miracle, it should be enthroned briefly, the human spirit, which knows no color or geography or time, would die a little, leaving for wiser and stronger and more compassionate men the painful beating back to the upper trail.

Era of Social Change Demands New Role, Attitudes of Police

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

A POLICEMAN is underpaid and over-vilified. A cop, as the saying goes, is never around when you need one and yet a community makes more and more demands on the force for its security, not to mention the untangling of its traffic jams.

Morgan

It is fortunate and reassuring that a suspect in the murder of eight Chicago nurses is already in custody. The police assembled what clues they had swiftly and it did not take them long to piece together a description and then an identification of the man they were looking for. Chicago authorities are making it plain that they will bend over backward to stay within the guidelines recently drawn by the Supreme Court to insure the rights of the suspect as a prisoner. A confession, one police officer said, was not necessary because of the weight of the evidence. "Our main concern," the state's attorney said in a formal statement, "is to protect the rights of the accused, along with the corresponding rights of society."

This is playing the game according to the rules of justice. The trouble is those rules are too often fudged. Life is not simple any more—if indeed it ever was—and police responsibilities now go beyond crime detection and crime prevention to demand some knowledge and some understanding of the bewilderingly complicated behavior of people—all kinds of people. At last the country is attempting some kind of organized assault on poverty. At last the federal government has been impelled to try to end the Civil War by legislating protection for a Negro's civil rights so that he can have the equal opportunity and equal rights of citizenship to which he is entitled. But these developments have thrust the policeman into the middle of a social revolution with which he has not been prepared or trained to cope.

Which is another way of saying that the communities of America are not prepared to cope with the phenomena of change they now face. This is more than a little frightening because it means that too few Americans, including those in positions of leadership, understand the significance of these changes.

As the civil rights movement develops, as the war on poverty proceeds, both in halting and controversial fashion, it becomes increasingly clear that this country operates on a double standard—one might say a two-ply double-standard: one for the black man and one for the white man and of course one for the poor and one for the rest of us.

By and large police departments in this country have been and still are the instruments of the power structure—the white power structure. And, on the whole it's woe betide any citizen who is poor and runs afoul of the law, no matter the pigmentation of his skin. We the more fortunate ones must ask ourselves if this isn't really the way we wanted it to be.

WE ARE SHOCKED and even frightened to witness a Negro clamor for his rights, especially when he refuses to be docile any more. We are disturbed and perhaps register a twinge of guilt over extent of this richest nation's neglect of the poor. And yet doesn't part of our alarm stem from a secret belief—not so secret among some—that the Negro citizen is not entitled to full citizenship, to an unspoken conviction that the poor are lazy and thus deserve their lot? If so, what we are really alarmed about is change.

It is reported that Los Angeles Police Chief William H. Parker, who died recently, was one of the most popular officials in that unhappy city. Referring to the stern police grip on the troubled sector of Watts, a Los Angeles publisher called Chief Parker "the white community's savior, their symbol of security." and the Washington Post's Nicholas Von Hoffman reported Parker's own contempt for the civil rights movement. "Hell," the chief said, "the police department isn't here to revitalize society, and I'm critical of this whole social revolution. It has created a cleavage between the races."

That is undoubtly an honest opinion, shared by many. Parker gave his life for his job and he raised the Los Angeles police force out of scandal to respectability. But no community in this land is going to survive and flourish if the function of its police force is mainly to "protect" the comfortable white majority against the minorities, and there is always the danger under such circumstances of the police becoming a kind of law unto themselves.

After the Supreme Court issued its decision in June imposing new curbs on the powers of police to interrogate suspects, Chief Justice Warren—a former prosecuting attorney himself—observed to a friend "that if the police will play the game according to the rules and in the spirit of our Bill of Rights, the public will have greater respect for the law, enforcement will be better, and the dignity of the police themselves will be greatly enhanced." It could be as simple as that.

Impact on Economy Unknown:

Urgent Need Cited for Census Of U.S. Investments Overseas

UNITED STATES corporations have more than $50 billion of private, direct investment overseas, but the American public has no information on the effect this investment has on jobs or on the nation's balance of payments.

Mrs. Elizabeth Jager of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research pointed out that the government has not made an overall census of this investment since 1957 and that appropriations for such purposes have failed in Congress, despite the need for an immediate inquiry into "this vital area."

Interviewed on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO public service program heard on the Mutual broadcasting system, Mrs. Jager emphasized that the AFL-CIO does not oppose such investment.

"In some ways," she said, "it is undoubtedly good that U.S. corporations have participated in the economic upsurge of foreign countries. After World War II, it was essential that American capital go into the war-devastated economies of Europe and help them rebuild themselves. We have felt that this kind of economic development enables the free world to grow stronger."

At the same time, she asserted, "American companies have used foreign investment as an excuse and propaganda weapon to keep American labor from what we think are necessary wage increases."

ONE RESULT, she said, has been that American workers have been put into the position of competing against foreign workers.

She said an investigation of the situation and a census of the amount, kind and location of U.S. overseas investments is necessary to make valid judgments about their good and bad effects. Without this information, she noted, such questions as the effect on the balance of payments cannot be answered.

Reporters interviewing Mrs. Jager were Hobart Rowen, financial writer for the Washington Post, and John Herling, columnist for the National Newspaper Syndicate.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

FOR A GOOD MANY months economists have been sounding the alarm at steadily mounting interest rates which were triggered by the Federal Reserve Bank last December when it raised the discount rate from 4 to 4.5 percent.

Interest rates have risen to their highest level of a generation in some segments of the money market. Basic lending rates in commercial banks are now 5.75 percent and the Federal Reserve is even tightening the screws still more by increasing bank reserve rates.

The bonanza of high interest rates is bearing some bitter fruit. Mortgage money is tight and building has suffered sharply. Installment money is also tight as well as automobile loans. It is impossible to read the nation's financial and commercial publications without seeing clear signs of an even tighter money market with its threat to jobs and the nation's economy in general.

Added to repeated warnings by economists of what may lie ahead is a voice from the House Ways & Means Committee—Rep. Al Ullman, Oregon Democrat, a member of that committee. He has become worried enough to send a personal letter to Pres. Johnson and to issue a sharp call for a change in current "tight money" policies.

Ullman, who has long been a Johnson Administration supporter, said bluntly: "In my judgment, unless corrective action is taken soon, the tight money policies imposed by the Federal Reserve Board and supported by recent actions of your Administration will destroy the economic gains we have made."

Ullman pointed out that if there is danger of an overheated economy, there are other fiscal restraints that can be employed without curtailing the nation's growth. One could be revision of the investment tax credit which has encouraged business investment to an unhealthy point. Another could be curbing of excess profits. Both courses have been proposed by the AFL-CIO.

ULLMAN WROTE a letter along the same lines to Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey emphasizing his "apprehension over runaway interest rates and the apparent impotency of the Administration to cope with the current crisis in monetary policy." As a congressman from the lumber-producing state of Oregon, Ullman expressed particular concern over the effect of housing cutbacks on that industry.

He followed that up with a press release suggesting a presidential conference to combat the money crisis that threatens the nation.

"I urge the President," he said, "to take this opportunity to call a conference at which the leaders of Congress, the members of the Federal Reserve Board, the officials of the Treasury and other interested government agencies, and experts from all segments of the housing and financial communities may discuss the alarming economic situation and develop recommendations for its improvement."

The Oregon congressman then made a speech before the House in which he accused the Administration of "floundering" in monetary policy. "In effect," he said, "the Administration is abdicating to William McChesney Martin the responsibilities for economic policy. This is the same Martin who, as governor of the Federal Reserve Board, led us up and down the boom and bust cycles of the fifties."

This is strong language, yet Ullman is no alarmist. He is a veteran member of Congress and of the Ways & Means Committee, which is the House's most authoritative financial body. He has a reputation for thoughtfulness and, as he himself noted, is a strong supporter of Administration policies that will promote a sustained growth in the economy.

His unusually sharp warning cannot be brushed aside lightly. (PAI)

A FULL-SCALE CENSUS of U.S. investments is needed to determine their impact on the American economy, Elizabeth Jager of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research told reporters John Herling (left) of the National Newspaper Syndicate and Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post as she was interviewed on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program heard on the Mutual broadcasting system.

IUD Director Cites 'Ferment' For Organizing

There is a "clearly recognizable ferment for new organization" in the country, Jack Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told a press conference in Washington.

Conway said that organizing activities of the IUD, in the last six months, have had "fairly substantial success" and that there is a "shift in the climate in the country as a whole."

He said the "ferment" includes such groups as government workers, teachers, professional workers, medical technicians, migratory workers, and the working poor.

The IUD Executive Board, Conway reported, feels that the current structure of the AFL-CIO may have to be changed to cope with such challenges as organizing social workers, medical technicians, and the working poor.

"I personally believe that the AFL-CIO is equipped to meet this situation which has developed," he said.

Conway noted that the IUD has grown since its convention last November until today it has per capita payments on 6.5 million members. The growth, he added, came from new affiliates, step-up in per capita of older affiliates and new growth.

Senate Unit Closes Gap In Minimum Wage Bill

pay floor on Feb. 1, 1967. Coverage would be extended to an additional 8 million workers, including nearly half a million farm workers employed by large agricultural enterprises.

Newly-covered workers would be brought in under a $1 wage floor next Feb. 1. Their minimum would be advanced 15 cents a year—to $1.30 for farm workers and $1.60 for other groups.

The big new groups to be covered include retail employes, laundry workers, employes of hospitals and nursing homes, construction workers, restaurant, hotel and motel workers and taxi employes.

The Senate subcommittee knocked out a House amendment which would have exempted 30,000 farm workers covered by the Sugar Act. On the one hand, it tightened child labor restrictions in agriculture. But it also exempted children under 16 paid on piece-rate for hand-harvest operations from the minimum wage—so long as they are paid the same piece rates as adult workers. And it watered down a provision of the House bill which would have improved overtime protection for seasonal agricultural processing workers.

On the plus side, the Senate subcommittee extended overtime coverage to employes of local transit companies and to some other groups excluded by the House bill. It dropped a House provision for sub-minimum rates to young people and students employed in retail and service establishments.

It added a section gradually extending full minimum wage requirements for handicapped persons in sheltered workshops, with a provision that the secretary of labor can authorize a lesser minimum "in proportion to the worker's productivity."

Bipartisan Pact

The strong bipartisan agreement on the bill was a triumph for Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) in his first major assignment since taking over the chairmanship of the Labor subcommittee after the death of Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.).

Before going to the Senate floor, the bill must be cleared by the full Labor Committee. Most of the members of the full committee, however, are also members of the subcommittee which worked on the legislation.

The only member of the subcommittee absent when the final vote was taken was Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) who earlier had tried unsuccessfully to have the effective date of the $1.60 wage floor postponed until 1970—a year later than the date in the House-passed bill and two years later than the date adopted by the subcommittee.

Helstein Calls for Parley To Curb Price Swings

Chicago—A federally-sponsored conference to seek a policy and program that will ease "needlessly wild oscillations" of the Labor Dept.'s Consumer Price Index was urged by Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers.

Helstein advanced his proposal as UPWA members employed in meat packing received wage increases of 5 cents an hour because of the continuing surge in the CPI.

He called on the Labor Dept. to set up the conference and invite participation by government officials, meat packing unions and employers, farmers and consumers.

Helstein rejoiced that the cost-of-living pay boost, plus an earlier one of 3 cents in January, protected union members in a period of rising prices but he said the price hikes "have eroded the buying power of large groups of citizens" with a resulting "serious effect" on the economy.

The rise in meat prices, he charged, "can be traced directly to economic policies and practices for which the industry must bear a considerable responsibility."

He recalled that two years ago the price of hogs to the farmer was so low he had to lose about $2 per hundredweight. With the incentive gone, he added, production has fallen and "millions of American housewives are now justifiably complaining about bacon selling at a dollar a pound."

"This country should take steps to remove itself from this sort of 19th Century textbook supply-and-demand situation on essential foodstuffs which leads to feast or famine for everyone affected," he said.

"There is no excuse for our inability to develop sound and stable economic policies that will prevent boom-and-bust conditions for the meat producers and up-and-down price conditions for the consumer. We believe that government should exert long overdue leadership to produce sound alternatives to this old-fashioned method of getting meat to the consumer's table at prices that make sense."

N. Y. Dailies, Pressmen Set New Meetings

New York — Negotiations were scheduled to resume July 25 in a new effort to break a contract deadlock which has blocked publication of the merged New York newspapers—the World-Telegram & Sun, the Journal American and the Herald Tribune.

Nine of the unions involved have reached contract agreements, but the new World Journal Tribune company has balked at meeting proposals of the Pressmen, principally for a uniform starting time and a six and a half hour shift on Saturday nights.

Contract talks broke down July 18, but both sides have agreed to return to the bargaining table after a week's recess recommended by David L. Cole, senior mediator in the dispute.

The president of the New York Publishers Association dropped a hint that other papers—the New York Times and the Daily News—might close down in support of the World Journal Tribune management. But most observers consider a news blackout unlikely. The New York Post is no longer a member of the publishers' association and its daily press run during the current dispute is nearly 900,000, more than twice its previous circulation.

Rail Mediation Board Shifts Chairmanship

The National Mediation Board has named member Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., as board chairman for the fiscal year started July 1. Under the Railway Labor Act the chairmanship rotates among the members — O'Neill, Leverett Edwards and Howard G. Gamser.

At GE, Westinghouse:

due to start soon with both big electrical manufacturing firms.

"Everything we have seen," the statement added, "convinces us all the more that our activities speak for the deep-felt desires of the AFL-CIO membership in GE and Westinghouse.

"We applaud the National Labor Relations Board for having dismissed the groundless charges against our unions and for having issued a complaint and requested an injunction from the courts to require GE to bargain in good faith" with the IUE committee.

The statement expressed the hope that "there will be speedy action" on the charges "so that collective bargaining may not be delayed."

It charged, however, that GE in particular has been "intensifying its hysterical campaign" against the cooperating unions. The company, the unions said, "has been attempting to frighten the employes and the public with threats that a strike will take place if we continue to cooperate."

The statement accused GE of "carrying on what appears to be an alliance with the discredited national leadership of the expelled United Electrical Workers" and declared:

"We are confident . . . that all attempts by these corporations to weaken us will surely fail.

"We call again upon GE to drop its strike-mongering, recognize that genuine collective bargaining is an absolute necessity, and join with us in working out fair and equitable settlements" with the cooperating unions.

If the two firms fail to live up to their responsibility to bargain in good faith so as to force a strike, the workers involved are "assured of the full support and cooperation of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates," the statement said.

The committee announced establishment of a communications network to transmit information from the field to committee headquarters. Fifteen regional coordinators will collate and transmit all information.

Member unions of the committee are the IUE, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers and Flint Glass Workers.

Philadelphia Musician Named Aide to Kenin

New York—Charles Musumeci, president of the Philadelphia local of the Musicians for the past 10 years, has been named assistant to AFM Pres. Herman Kenin. Musumeci, a former member of the Philadelphia symphony orchestra, will assume the headquarters duties of Charles Bufalino, who is retiring.

NLRB Victories Hit 63 Percent in May

AFL-CIO unions won 63 percent of the May elections in which they were on the ballot and 31,652 new members, the National Labor Relations Board reported. The victory margin was 4 percentage points above the average for all unions and 1 point below the AFL-CIO average for the 1965 fiscal year, the board said.

Affiliated unions won 344 of the 548 elections in which they participated in May. Voters in units they won totaled 31,652 against 17,471 in units lost by AFL-CIO organizations.

Council Gets Green Light:

Bookbinders Slate Merger Discussions

Toronto—The grassroots sentiment toward merger among printing trades unions and the struggle for victory in the prolonged Kingsport, Tenn., strike dominated the 34th biennial convention of the Bookbinders.

Pres. John Connolly cited the success of the merged Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union and noted that the officers of the Stereotypers & Electroplaters have been instructed by the membership to work out a plan of merger that will be acceptable to both unions.

The executive council of the Bookbinders received a green light from the convention to negotiate with other graphic arts unions on amalgamation. However, any proposed merger would be two years away since it would have to be referred to the next convention and to a membership-wide referendum.

William Hall, executive vice president of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, told the 290 delegates that merger has worked for the two unions and can be measured in increased bargaining power and success at the bargaining table.

Taking their mood in part from the convention site of the Royal York Hotel, which was struck for almost a year before a contract was granted the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, the Bookbinders' delegates pledged total support to the Kingsport strikers. The strike there, where one of every three of the 2,400 printing tradesmen off the job belongs to the Bookbinders, has cost the union more than $3 million in strike benefits in the last 40 months.

Our members "have stood up wonderfully well under the pressure and are entitled to the fullest support," Connolly said in his keynote address.

Although there have been meetings with the educational publishing firm since February, Connolly warned there is still a wide gap preventing settlement. The impact of the AFL-CIO boycott is becoming more evident, he said. The convention unanimously passed a resolution commending AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for leading the boycott drive.

Shorter Hours Urged

The convention was told that the 35-hour workweek is essential in the trade since automation and technical progress mean either shorter hours or fewer jobs. Getting management to agree to the proper manning of new machinery is becoming an increasingly serious problem since employers try to use helpers instead of qualified journeymen.

But, the overall outlook for the industry is prosperous since employment and profits are at an all time high, the officers report said.

Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Claude Jodoin warned the convention that the growing trend toward court injunctions in Canadian labor disputes could spell the end of free trade unions in Canada. He said the injunctions which limit or ban picketing have only one purpose: "Get rid of the union."

He also called for a drive to end intolerable conditions in Canada where one in every five workers subsists below a reasonable standard of living. Every worker is entitled to a reasonable standard of comfort and decency, he said.

Dayton Labor Pushes Fight On Textbooks

Dayton, O.—The labor movement here mounted a major public relations effort to convince the Dayton Board of Education it should not purchase textbooks produced by strikebreakers at the anti-union Kingsport, Tenn., Press, target of a nation-wide "don't buy" drive by the AFL-CIO.

The board was preparing to vote on the purchase of books for the coming school year when a board member objected to the purchase of volumes produced at the Kingsport plant where 1,200 members of five unions have been on strike since March 1963.

Walter L. Martin, a board member and union bookbinder, told the board it should not take sides in the dispute by spending tax money for books produced under low-wage conditions.

Unions representing 200,000 area members rallied behind Martin and sent a 100-member delegation to the next School Board meeting. The unions purchased a full-page ad outlining their position in the Dayton Journal Herald. Signers were the Dayton-Miami Valley AFL-CIO Council, the Dayton Building Trades Council, the Dayton Allied Printing Trades Council and the Dayton Union Label Council.

The board voted, finally, 5-1, to buy the non-union textbooks. Martin voted no, and another member abstained.

STRIKING EMPLOYES of the Florida East Coast Railway picket the Justice Dept. to protest slow pace of courts in their long dispute with FEC. Two busloads of Railroad Trainmen met with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Florida congressmen and urged that Pres. Johnson name an emergency board to hear the dispute.

Wirtz Pledges Aid to Help Speed Action in Long FEC Rail Strike

Striking trainmen from the Florida East Coast Railway, frustrated at every turn by nearly four years of legal battling with FEC operator Edward Ball, took a 1,000-mile bus ride to the White House to lay their case before the President.

Bearing picket signs and leaflets, they picketed the Justice Dept. instead and stayed away from the White House when Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz offered to help them speed up the slow pace of justice.

Members of the Railroad Trainmen, they rode in two chartered buses from Miami, Jacksonville, Fort Pierce and New Smyrna Beach to Washington "because that's where the action is."

They called themselves the "striking Freedom Fighters." They asked for justice for the 250 on-train employes and 2,200 off-train employes of the FEC who have been out of work since January 1963 in their fight with Ball for the same contract terms as those on 192 other U.S. railroads.

"We're here because our bread line was cut off," said one. "Mr. Ball put poverty on all of us."

Seek Jobs

What they want, they told Wirtz and Florida congressmen, is for some power to restore their jobs and return things to status quo while the case creaks slowly through the courts.

They were urged to work through the National Mediation Board which has the power to recommend that the President appoint an emergency board to hear the facts and make settlement proposals.

The strikers were accompanied on their Capitol rounds by Deputy BRT Pres. R. C. Moore and J. R. Snyder of the union's legislative staff. Energetic aid also was given by Rep. Claude Pepper, Rep. Robert Sikes and Rep. Charles E. Bennett, Florida Democrats.

Meeting with state congressmen, the strikers told their story one by one. Seniors among them included Sam R. Clark, assistant general yardmaster in Miami with 41 years of service, and C. M. Bowman, a conductor with 42 years' seniority before the strike.

From the strike's start, trainmen and members of four other on-train unions declined to cross picket lines of the non-operating unions. Called to work again last year, they were fired when they refused to sign "yellow dog" contracts containing none of the former contract protections, they said.

The strikers picketed the Justice Dept. when they failed to get a hearing there on their plea that the department file a supporting brief in a suit against the FEC by the city of Miami.

The union men won a brief victory when the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a Miami Federal Court ruling that the strikers could not picket FEC's Jacksonville terminal. But the victory had no immediate results because the no-picketing order was maintained until the U.S. Supreme Court holds hearings Oct. 10 and hands down a final decision.

Strikes Spur County Action On Bargaining

Los Angeles—It took two strikes by social workers, but Los Angeles County has begun moving towards a procedure for dealing with unions representing its employes.

The county's Board of Supervisors voted unanimously to direct the preparation of an ordinance spelling out bargaining rights of the 43,000 county employes.

Areas Covered

Union recognition, methods of resolving disagreements, dues checkoff and other areas of employe-management relations will be covered by the ordinance.

Lack of union recognition and collective bargaining led to a strike by some 1,400 of the county's 2,500 social workers. The strike, called by Social Workers Local 535 of the Building Service Employes, was ended after 17 days on the basis of a promise by the county to bargain with the union.

The employes walked out a second time, however, when the county gave what amounted to a bonus to social workers who stayed on the job in the form of a retroactive pay increase covering the period of the strike. The union is challenging the bonus in court.

The Los Angeles AFL-CIO, which strongly supported the striking social workers, helped work out a settlement of the dispute.

One byproduct of the strike has been the division of the county's archaic Charities Dept. into three more cohesive departments.

The most important result, Local 535 Strike Chairman Anthony Saravente said, is that the county has changed its "entire stance on collective bargaining."

Johnson 'Concerned' by Tight Housing Credit

President Johnson declared the Administration is "seriously concerned with the plight of the home builder" and is "distressed" at the increased costs that are involved in high interest rates.

But he told reporters at a press conference that "the best thing that can be done" is congressional action on an Administration recommendation that a temporary ceiling be placed on interest rates that banks and savings and loan associations pay to smaller depositors.

The legislation proposed by Treasury Sec. Henry Fowler would not generally affect interest rates paid to larger depositors. It would allow varying interest rates at different levels of deposits in an attempt to control shifting of funds.

Earlier, the government reported that new housing starts had fallen to a five-year low for the month and builders have scheduled an "emergency" meeting to lobby for more housing credit.

The Administration interest rate proposal to the House Banking & Currency Committee was turned down last month with the committee indicating that the Federal Reserve Board should act on the matter, the President told reporters.

The President had told an earlier press conference that he had urged Congress to stay within the Administration's $112.8 billion spending budget for fiscal 1967, warning that additional expenditures would seriously increase the federal deficit and add to inflationary pressures.

The President held a news conference immediately after a meeting with top Democratic and Republican members of congressional appropriation committees to brief reporters on his plea to the key Hill leaders.

Congress to date has voted to spend about $1 billion more in the next 12 months for non-war connected programs including education, veterans benefits, federal pay increases and other programs and could possibly run the total "add-ons," in the President's words, to between $5 billion and $6 billion.

The President told newsmen he had outlined these alternatives to the congressional leaders: price and wage controls which "few, if any, recommend;" reducing already projected spending on non-military programs which would be "exceedingly difficult;" or raising taxes to avoid an increase in the federal deficit.

The President stressed that he had made no decisions on a possible tax increase and would probably make none for some time until he has a chance to review what Congress does and knows more precisely the needs of the Viet Nam war.

He announced also that the federal deficit for fiscal 1966, which ended June 30, was $2.3 billion, the smallest deficit in six years. The Administration in January had estimated the deficit at $6.4 billion but higher than expected revenues cut back the size of the deficit, reflecting the high level of economic activity.

Hits 'Token' House Bill:

Meany Urges Senate to Set Jobless Aid Protection Floor

ther than the House" in a number of social welfare bills, Long remarked, and he predicted that it would do the same on unemployment compensation.

Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.) asked Meany whether his criticism of the House bill meant that labor would oppose it if it reached the floor of the Senate unchanged.

Meany said that would be his "inclination" at the moment, in the belief that passage of an inadequate bill would tend to forestall congressional consideration of the issue for some time thereafter. He drew the analogy — with which Anderson agreed—of the position of medicare supporters who in 1964 opposed a bill merely raising social security cash benefits. A year later, both medicare and higher benefits were enacted. Committee members stressed, however, their belief that the Senate will improve on the House bill.

Human Terms

The AFL-CIO president described in human as well as statistical terms what inadequate unemployment insurance means to the families of workers who lose their jobs.

"They use up their savings," Meany related. "They borrow money. They move to cheaper housing or move in with somebody else.

"They sell what they can. They ask for help from friends and relatives. Some of them, if they can bring themselves to it and many cannot, will ask for help from public or private welfare or assistance agencies. In short, they are forced to do the very things that an unemployment insurance program is supposed to prevent."

Meany observed that the tendency of Congress to pass stopgap measures to alleviate suffering during recessions while ignoring the need for a major overhaul in the system is "like the farmer who won't repair his tractor in the winter since he does not need it until the spring."

There is a pressing problem today, Meany stressed, with 820,000 persons drawing benefits each week, 17,000 exhausting their benefits while still unemployed, and millions of workers not eligible for protection because their employers are not under the law.

"Businesses are dying and being born every day," he noted. "Plants that have stood for generations are suddenly closed down, even in good times. Competitors are bought out, mergers negotiated."

Because of employer pressures to keep tax rates down, Meany charged, state benefits as a percentage of lost wages have dropped below the level of 1939, when two-thirds of the workforce was able to recover half of lost wages during periods of unemployment.

"In every state," he emphasized, "the maximum benefit in relation to wages is lower today than it was in 1939."

The Administration proposal would raise the benefit ceiling high enough so that most workers would once again be able to collect 50 percent of regular wages.

Meany said a requirement that states provide 26 weeks of benefits is needed not because all states are deficient, as is the case on amount of benefits, "but because a few states are so far behind the others."

Without state standards on duration, he noted, the federal government would be helping to finance benefits after 26 weeks in some states and after only 13 weeks in others.

He urged the Senate committee also to incorporate the Administratiton proposal to limit disqualification penalties imposed by the states to six weeks. "To deny the worker benefits for a longer period" because he voluntarily quit his job or was discharged for misconduct "is to punish him for the slackness of the labor market, rather than for his actions," Meany declared.

Labor would like to see the original proposal for 26 weeks of extended federal benefits kept in the bill, he said. But he saw the possibility of a compromise with the House version through a provision for 13 weeks of federal benefits plus an additional 13 weeks of benefits during recession periods.

Meany told the Finance Committee that appeals by both Republican and Democratic administrations to states to improve their programs have largely gone unheeded.

Federal standards are needed, he urged, because "many states consciously pursue a policy of underfinancing as part of an industrial development program to attract new industry through low payroll taxes. . . . If unemployment insurance is to be insulated from interstate competition, either the tax rates must be standardized or there must be a minimum standard applied to benefits."

Meany rejected "false cries of 'federalization,'" declaring:

"The AFL-CIO is not asking that the federal government take over the basic program that should apply to the first 26 weeks of unemployment. . . . All we ask is that the federal government no longer allow monies raised by the federal unemployment tax to go for state benefits payments unless that state program does a creditable job. This is not federalization. It is fiscal responsibility in intergovernmental relations."

Meany was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Raymond Munts, acting social security director.

RESTORATION of minimum federal standards on state unemployment compensation benefits and duration was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee. Meany, shown with Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, called the House bill without such standards "completely unsatisfactory."

Political Crossfire Hits Foreign Aid Measure

Foreign aid, civil rights and poverty legislation were in the congressional spotlight last week—amid unusual potential developments.

The annual foreign aid battle followed a different script this year. The House was cast in the role of supporting the Administration, while the Senate let loose a political crossfire at the aid bill.

Chief controversy in the House was over a proposed two-year authorization for aid programs, with a five-year lease for development loans and the Alliance for Progress. The effect would be to eliminate the year-by-year consideration of the aid program by the House Foreign Affairs and Senate Foreign Relations committees, although the programs would still be scrutinized in the annual appropriations process. The Administration originally sought a five-year authorization for the entire program.

A Republican move to cut the authorization to one year and cut back development loans was narrowly beaten — 193-191. The House then passed the bill intact, 237-146.

The Senate was still considering the measure as the AFL-CIO went to press. But it had already voted down, 48-35, a two-year authorization for the aid program. Senators opposed to the U.S. role in Viet Nam joined with conservatives from both parties to oppose the two-year authorization.

The Senate also slashed $250 million from the development loan program and doubled the 1 percent interest charge applying to the first 10 years of the 40-year loan.

The civil rights bill, including a compromised but still controversial fair housing section, is expected to reach the House floor July 25. The Judiciary Committee is using the "21-day rule" to bypass a Rules Committee bottleneck.

Poverty Bill Postponed

A $1.75 billion extension of the Economic Opportunity Act—the basic anti-poverty program—was deferred by the House leadership until the first week in August.

One reason was the controversy over the unusual action of the House Rules Committee in issuing a strong attack on House Labor Committee Chairman Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.) for failing to attend hearings on the rule.

The Rules Committee coupled its blast with approval of a rule allowing some other member of the Labor Committee to call up the bill. The vote on the rule, which would precede House action on the bill, threatened to bring about an alliance of Republicans opposed to the poverty program and Democratic committee chairmen fearful of a precedent that could weaken their powers.

In other developments:

● Pres. Johnson signed the federal employe pay raise bill, but told congressional leaders he did so reluctantly because it was retroactive to July 1, six months earlier than the Administration had proposed.

● An AFL-CIO statement to a Senate Education subcommittee urged approval of House-passed legislation stepping up the college aid program and continuing the National Defense Education Act's student loan program—in addition to the subsidized college loan program enacted last year. Both are needed, the federation said.

● AFL-CIO maritime unions joined in supporting legislation for "an independent and autonomous Maritime Administration," separate both from the Commerce Dept., where it is presently located, and from the proposed new Dept. of Transportation. Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall testified on behalf of all AFL-CIO maritime unions.

Congress Urged to Boost Vocational School Aid

A proposal to expand federal aid to vocational education was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO at congressional hearings.

Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin urged a House Education & Labor subcommittee to approve a bill by Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.) that would:

● Raise the authorization for federal grants to state vocational programs from the present $225 million a year to $400 million.

● Earmark $30 million for work-study programs to keep youngsters from dropping out of school, and $25 million for experimental residential vocational schools, authorized in 1963 but never financed.

Rogin urged the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), to insert a provision requiring payment of at least the federal minimum wage under the work-study program.

Citing the accomplishments of the 1963 Vocational Education Act, Rogin noted that the number of high school students taking vocational education increased by 800,000 from 1963 to 1965 to a total of 2.8 million students, one-fourth of the total high school enrollment. The number of adults participating in vocational education programs rose by 500,000 to 2.4 million. And the number of area vocational schools has increased by 50 percent.

He stressed that "school systems must recognize that vocational high schools cannot remain 'dumping grounds' for slow learners but must become the training ground for preparing our young people for work and for the occupations that are actually available on the labor market."

Rogin suggested also that "job placement must become a meaningful function of the school. . . . When the vocational student graduates, his school must assist him in finding a job in the occupation for which he has been trained."

Conway on Board Of Housing Unit

Jack T. Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., has been elected to the board of trustees of the Foundation for Cooperative Housing, which sponsors non-profit open-occupancy housing for middle and lower income families.

Incumbent board members include AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan and Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee.

Bid To Bust Airlines Strike Draws Strong Labor Fire

Coast Farm Unions Join In Merger

San Francisco—The two unions which have worked side by side to organize California grape workers will appear on the ballot as a merged AFL-CIO affiliate in union representation elections among DiGiorgio Corp. farm workers.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, who announced the unity action at a press conference here, said it formalizes the close ties at the striker-worker level that exist between members of the hitherto unaffiliated National Farm Workers Association and the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee.

Federation Pres. George Meany wired approval of the linking of the two groups on the representation ballots and said the formal request of the merged units for an AFL-CIO charter will be acted on at the Aug. 22 meeting of the federation's Executive Council.

Flanking Kircher as he announced the merger plan were Cesar Chavez, director of the NFWA; Larry Itliong, the AWOC strike director, and Exec. Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California State AFL-CIO.

Opposing the merged AFL-CIO organizations in the Aug. 30th elections at two DiGiorgio locations will be the Teamster Farm Workers Union. Elections at other locations are expected to follow.

Kircher and Chavez reported the move towards formal merger was greeted with enthusiasm by members of both groups, who have walked side by side on picket lines

Key Votes Nearing on Rights Bill

The House moved towards a series of key votes on the hotly-contested 1966 civil rights bill, including a modified ban on discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Civil rights supporters won an initial victory when the House voted 200-180 to bypass the Rules Committee and take up the bill directly from the Judiciary Committee.

It thus rejected arguments by Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) and Republican leaders that the procedure was too hasty an application of the 21-day rule enacted at the start of the 89th Congress. It also turned down

Meany Tells Guild:

Right to Strike Basic To a Free Society

There is "no such thing as a free society" if workers are not free to strike, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 33rd annual convention of the Newspaper Guild.

Affirming the right of airline mechanics to strike for better terms from five profitable airlines, Meany said:

"I get somewhat upset by politicians who pay lip service to the idea of a free society but then, when by normal, natural processes collective bargaining results in a strike, they call it sinful."

He said any experienced union leader prefers not to have a strike, but "if you go to the bargaining table without the right to shut the employer down, you go there naked and helpless, without any weapons whatsoever."

Meany challenged Senate proposals to order the 35,000 airport workers back to their jobs during continued bargaining culminating in "some sort of federal commission" settling the terms of the next contract. No employer will bargain, Meany continued, if he knows the federal government is going to break a strike.

The result of strike-halting bills introduced into the Senate has been "no bargaining since last Friday afternoon," Meany observed, asking: "Why should they offer anything more when a veteran and experienced senator is going to pull their chestnuts out of the fire?"

He made it clear he was talking about Sen. Wayne Morse, Oregon Democrat, whom he called "our erstwhile friend," adding "how he can set himself up as a champion of labor and then become hysterical about a strike I can't understand."

Meany told delegates and their families at the annual convention banquet: "If there is no right to strike, collective bargaining doesn't mean anything."

IAM, Wirtz Deny Any Emergency

By Eugene A. Kelly

Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists warned the Senate Labor Committee that any law designed to break a strike of airline mechanics would impair the welfare of the nation and the exercise of free collective bargaining.

The IAM president appeared for the union at a hearing called to determine whether the strike against five airlines threatens the national "health, safety and defense" and should be halted by congressional action. He cited evidence to prove that no such threat exists and urged that labor and management negotiators be free to settle the dispute by bargaining.

The committee nevertheless by an 11-5 vote approved a resolution giving Pres. Johnson authority to direct the strikers to return to work for a 60-day period and to extend this for two more 60-day periods if negotiations remained deadlocked. The action came just before the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The committee called Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz for a second round of questioning. In his first appearance, Wirtz told the committee the strike had not brought the country to an "emergency stage" and urged it to delay any strike-ending legislation.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany also urged the Senate to reject "ill-conceived proposals" and thus enable the parties to bargain "unfettered by government decrees," al-

Senate Unit Approves Jobless Aid Standards

A closely-divided Senate Finance Committee approved an unemployment insurance bill setting for the first time federal standards on both amount and duration of jobless benefits.

It wrote into a toothless House-passed bill these major improvements:

- States must pay jobless workers 50 percent of their lost wages up to a ceiling of at least 50 percent of the average weekly wage in the state.
- Benefits must cover at least 26 weeks of unemployment for workers who were employed at least 20 weeks during a one-year base period.

The Senate committee standards fell short in a number of areas of the legislation sought by the Administration and the AFL-CIO. The labor-supported bill would have gradually raised the benefit ceiling to two-thirds of the average state wage. And it would have limited disqualification periods a state could impose—which the Senate bill does not.

In coverage, the Senate bill is inferior to the House-passed measure, which would have brought an additional 3.5 million workers under protection. By eliminating a House provision requiring coverage of establishments with one or more em-

Meany Asks Rollback In Bank Interest Rate

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged Congress to roll back bank interest rates and curb the fierce competition for funds which has inflated the cost of borrowing money, forced up prices and thrown the home-building industry into a slump.

In a letter to Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) of the House Banking Committee, Meany said labor considers the "upward spiral" of interest rates "fraught with danger" to the nation's economy.

The Banking Committee took a step in the direction of checking the money squeeze by approving emergency one-year legislation setting a maximum interest rate of 4.5 percent that commercial banks can pay on time deposits of less than $100,000. Higher rates paid by commercial banks on "certificates of deposit" have drained funds from savings and loan associations—the chief source of home mortgage money.

Meany reminded Patman that more than a month has passed since the House Banking Committee formally called on the Federal Reserve Board to "act within 30 days to put an end to this excessive interest rate competition." But the FRB, Meany stressed, "has done virtually nothing."

Home mortgage costs have shot up and are still rising, Meany noted, while the number of new housing starts is down 18 percent from a year ago and at the lowest level since 1961.

"Yet this slump comes at a time

Contract Goals Reviewed for Yardmasters

Chicago—An outline of the Railroad Yardmasters' bargaining goals over the coming four years highlighted the keynote address of Pres. Ralph H. Wachowiak at the opening session of the union's 29th convention here.

He also reviewed wage and work rule improvements won since the last convention in 1962, reported on current movements for wage increases and discussed the union shop contract achieved on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad.

Wachowiak's report and that of Sec.-Treas. W. A. Snyder on financial matters were approved by the more than 100 delegates.

All three members of the Railroad Retirement Board spoke—Chairman Howard W. Habermeyer; A. E. Lyon, the labor member, and Thomas M. Healy, the carrier member.

Lyon's administrative assistant, Bill Barber, described recent changes in railroad retirement benefits, and representatives of the Travelers Insurance Co. detailed the health and welfare program the company administers for the union and the railroads.

Several proposed changes in the union constitution were to be acted on at later sessions of the convention.

ANGLO-AMERICAN ties in the trade union movement are expressed as Sir Tom O'Brien, general secretary of the British National Association of Theatrical & Kine Employes (NATKE), presents Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Theatrical Stage Employes the gold badge of the NATKE, a rare honor accorded Walsh by mandate of the NATKE convention last May.

and marched together to rally nationwide support for the Delano grape strikers.

The formal step towards merger was hastened, Kircher said, by the desire to ensure that DiGiorgio grape workers know that the two groups are not competitive and that the full support of the entire AFL-CIO is behind the joint organizing effort.

The union leaders made it clear they expected the merger to spur the big job of organizing farm workers throughout the nation and bring them long-denied rights of collective bargaining, social insurance, decent wages and union protection.

"First we will finish the job in Delano," said Chavez, "then there will be organizing drives like the campaigns we already have underway with substantial progress in Texas and in other parts of California.

"Prior to this, we have had a joint project by two unions. The difference now will be that we will be one union with organic unity."

The merger, Pitts said, "represents unity of the labor movement for all the things we have been attempting to do over the years for the farm workers. I am sure this will bring about justice for them and it will bring about recognition by many growers that here is a potent organization which offers a way to solve labor-management problems."

Exact mechanics of the merger have yet to be worked out and no name has yet been selected. The application before the AFL-CIO is for an organizing committee charter.

The initial strength, in workers under contract and the much larger number who have signed authorization cards, runs into many thousands, Kircher told the press conference.

Once in business, the union will have the huge job of organizing the hundreds of thousands of farm workers who have been left out in labor's march toward decent living standards and dignity.

The united efforts of the merged group, Itliong said, "will immensely strengthen the ability of the AFL-CIO to organize farm workers."

The merger agreement came after many conferences of leaders of the two groups with Kircher and representatives of the California labor movement.

NFWA Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta told reporters that NFWA has made important organizing strides among the melon and truck crop workers around Rio Grande City, Tex.

Eight smaller farm operators, have signed NFWA contracts and one large grower has agreed to recognize NFWA as employe bargaining agent, she disclosed.

CWA Sets Strike Vote, Raps 'Pitiful' Bell Offer

New York—The Communications Workers set into motion the machinery for a strike vote in its nationwide unit of Western Electric installation employes as the union's contract with the Bell System affiliate expired.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, announcing approval by the union's executive board of the strike vote call, accused Bell management of "playing a cheap and tawdry game with the economic fortunes of the hundreds of thousands of people on their payroll."

He charged that after four weeks of negotiations with Western Electric aimed at setting a pattern for other CWA units in the Bell System, the company made its first wage offer only 27 hours before the expiration of the contract.

This, he said, was a "pitifully inadequate" proposal amounting to about 5 cents an hour. Subsequent offers were so low that all chances for a settlement before the agreement ran out were "torpedoed," he said.

"The record of these negotiations," Beirne declared, "permits no interpretation except that Western Electric management wished to force us to order a strike vote."

The union represents about 23,000 Western Electric installers across the country. Beirne said the results of the strike balloting would be known by Aug. 20 and predicted the membership would approve "whatever legal steps are necessary to halt these foolish activities and policies of Western Electric management."

The CWA, he reported, had received "no offer at all" on four major points it considers basic—"improvement of the Bell pension plan, company payment for all health and hospitalization expenses under the contract, vacation improvement, and security for the union."

Citing record Bell System profits of some $2 billion annually, he declared that employes of Western Electric and other Bell affiliates "deserve something much better than the ridiculous offer we have before us."

LPIU Pacts Spur Plan for Early Pensions

New York—Six locals of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, representing nearly 20 percent of the membership have negotiated agreements embodying the employer-paid early retirement program the union adopted in January, Pres. Kenneth J. Brown reported.

The program provides for financing by employer contributions increasing in three years to 3 percent of straight time earnings. Benefits, to be negotiated, will begin at that time.

Chicago Local 245 set the pace by achieving the program in May. Since then it has been negotiated by Philadelphia Local 14L, Kansas City Local 235; St. Paul-Minneapolis Local 229, Bridgeton, N. J., Local 207 and Wilmington, Del., Local 58L.

The Local 229 pact covers photoengravers in the rotogravure division of the Brown & Bigelow Co. as well as lithographers, while the other agreements all cover lithographers.

ILGWU Chosen At Georgia Mills

Cartersville, Ga.—The Ladies' Garment Workers overcame a vigorous anti-union campaign, including the distribution of handbills the union called libelous, to win bargaining rights at the E-Z Mills here. The National Labor Relations Board posted the results as 569 for the ILGWU, 240 opposed.

Union Regional Dir. Martin Morand said the union has sued for $850,000 libel damages and, if it collects, will donate the full amount to Cartersville churches and charities designated by union members at the mills.

IATSE Backs King Bill:

Film Labeling Urged To Curb 'Runaways'

Detroit—Full support for federal legislation aimed at curbing "runaway" activities of American film producers was voted unanimously by delegates to the 48th biennial convention of the Theatrical Stage Employes & Moving Picture Machine Operators.

The resolution directed IATSE officers to "actively" support a bill introduced by Rep. Cecil R. King (D. Calif.) which would require on-screen labeling of a motion picture's country of origin.

"Runaway activities, which continue to displace thousands of American motion picture technicians and craftsmen, are expanding into the television industry because the practice has met no effective resistence from the U.S. government," the resolution stated.

It pointed out that loopholes in existing customs laws permit foreign-produced TV films to be exhibited and exploited without being clearly labeled with their country of origin.

Hollywood delegates reported that their members have been particularly hard hit by the growing practice.

"The runaway situation in Hollywood is more critical today than it ever has been in the history of the motion picture industry," said Donald P. Haggerty of Local 683. "The July 1st trades show that there are 55 American-financed motion pictures in production and 40 of these are being produced in Europe, which leaves the balance of 15 motion pictures being shot throughout the entire United States."

He added that eight of the pictures were being shot in Hollywood at the same time 21 American-financed pictures were being shot in England.

Job Losses Aired

A. T. Dennison of Local 728 said there were 2,800 members in the local in 1946, whereas today it has a working membership of less than 1,000.

Albert K. Erickson of Local 727 showed delegates the June 3 edition of a Hollywood trade paper which headlined the fact that production has hit a 10-year high.

"On that day of this tremendous production upsurge in the world," he said, Local 727 had 100 of its members out of work. Some of them had been unemployed since January. In other words, they had not worked one day in six months."

Delegates also supported a resolution to seek exemption of projectionists from criminal prosecution for their role in screening pictures judged obscene.

"This Alliance should exercise all means at its command to expedite and facilitate the enactment of legislation to fully protect projectionists who are being unnecessarily prosecuted for allegedly violating the so-called obscenity laws of several states."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, addressing the convention, said the federation will wage an all-out campaign this year to see that its friends in Congress are re-elected.

"Without our full support," he said, "many of the new congressmen we count as friends will have tough battles to keep their seats this year because it is a non-presidential election year."

Among other actions, the convention approved a 25-cent increase raising the quarterly per capita payments to the international union from $4.50 to $4.75.

Pres. Richard A. Walsh and all other officers were re-elected to two year terms. The only contested election was for the post of eighth vice president. Roy R. Ruben, incumbent, won re-election over James Schulkey of Detroit Local 812 by a vote of 703 to 217.

Briton Hits 'Work'

American "right-to-work" laws were assailed by Sir Tom O'Brien, general secretary of the British National Association of Theatrical & Kine Employes, who told the delegates that the concept is symptomatic of the "disease of nonunionism."

"Workers who take advantage of all the benefits and social achievements of trade union movements and still refuse to join their unions are parasitical frauds," he declared.

"They are leeches on the trade union body. Their selfishness and greed are beyond contempt. They are really industrial traitors.

"And for government and employers to protect these non-unionists by invoking the principle of the 'right-to-work' is to turn a moral obligation upside down."

O'Brien said the right to work involves its own obligations and duties, and "one of them is certainly not the right to rob their fellow workers of support."

He said the "right-to-work" movement is just another reason for active participation by labor in politics.

"For anyone seriously to argue that modern trade unionism should not concern itself with politics is to live in a fool's paradise," he declared.

JOSEPH L. AMES

J. L. Ames Fills Chapman Post For AFSCME

Joseph L. Ames of St. Louis has been named to succeed Gordon W. Chapman as secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Chapman, who has been associated with the union since its founding in 1936, stepped down for reasons of health. The board created the post of secretary-treasurer emeritus and Chapman will continue to assist the union as a consultant.

Ames, 41, has been an international representative of the AFSCME, secretary-treasurer of its St. Louis local, president of its Missouri State Council, and a national vice president. He resigned the latter post in May to come to Washington as assistant to AFSCME Pres. Jerry Wurf.

Chapman, 59, first became secretary-treasurer in 1937 and had since held the post except for an interval when he served as a consultant to the State Dept. He had been reelected to a new two-year post by acclamation at the union's convention in April.

Schnitzler Hails State Body:

Mississippi Labor Builds New Spirit

Jackson, Miss.—The growing feeling among Mississippi workers that they do not have to accept "industrial plantationism" was hailed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in a speech at the Mississippi AFL-CIO convention here.

He praised the state labor body for its leadership in helping establish a climate in which "fear has lessened a little" and welcomed the "growing desire" of Mississippians to reject the principle of one set of standards for the worker and another for his employer.

"It is clear that the Mississippi worker is realizing that it is up to him if this state is to escape from its curse as the nation's sweatshop," Schnitzler went on.

"The Mississippi worker is realizing that state laws aren't going to help him. He's learning that the local powers aren't going to help him, and each new industry wants only his labor—and that only so long as it is at the lowest price in the nation.

"We in the labor movement know, and the Mississippi worker is rapidly finding out, that only through united action, only through unions of his own choosing, only through collective bargaining and strong contracts will this state be lifted out of industrial plantationism."

Schnitzler warned that employers realize the workers' "growing economic awareness" and to combat it probably will resort to their tradition "of pitting worker against worker, and most particularly black worker against white worker."

He predicted that discrimination and racism, "a favorite anti-union weapon" of employers throughout the country, will be used intensively, and urged the delegates not to be confused by emotional outcries about states rights or "black power."

'Black Power' Disputed

"The fact is," he said, "that 'black power' does not, in my opinion, represent the true expression of the civil rights movement in America. I say this not as an apology or to explain away what is obviously the sincere and total belief of some persons in the civil rights movement.

"I say this because the vast majority of those in the civil rights movement—and I consider myself one of this group—do not agree with this concept any more than the vast majority of those in the labor movement believe that our future lies in the socialization of industry in America."

Schnitzler recalled that civil rights groups have given strong support to labor's legislative goals. And, he noted, the same forces that have sought to sell so-called "right-to-work" laws as a fair employment practice are also those which practice discrimination in hiring.

If these forces succeed, he warned, the state can continue to be "the economic ghetto, the industrial plantation that runaway employers want it to remain."

"But I and the AFL-CIO are betting that this time it is going to be different," he declared. "I am convinced that the labor movement of Mississippi today and those who will become a part of the labor movement in the months ahead are not going to allow themselves to be diverted or stopped.

"Organized labor—with the support of the citizenry in this state—can be the instrument to achieve goals that have so long eluded the average worker and his family. Mississippi needs a strong organized labor movement; equally important, America needs a strong Mississippi."

Schnitzler described as "tragic" the state's record on minimum wage legislation and opposition to funds for education, anti-poverty programs, medical care and "virtually all people-to-people programs" that involve federal aid.

U. S. Subsidies Welcomed

The opposition to Uncle Sam's money for the great mass of people is not based on "fundamental thriftiness, rugged individualism or resistance to federal encroachment," he noted, because most of the state's landholders take U.S. subsidies "without a murmur of dissent."

He pointed out that "last year $723 million in federal funds came into Mississippi—more than twice the amount of federal taxes paid by the state's citizens—and that a large part of it went as subsidies to big landholders.

"The tragedy," he declared, "is that the worker and his family receive very little—even by the trickle-down system of economics practiced here. All of this is no longer lost on the citizen of Mississippi."

FIRST TEAM of Turkish women union members to visit the United States called at AFL-CIO headquarters and was briefed by Henry Rutz (at head of table), of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs. The team is spending six weeks in this country visiting union headquarters and plants which employ women.

Nabisco Strike Wins Contract At New Plant

Buena Park, Calif.—The 130 workers at the National Biscuit Co. plant here won their first union contract—and 9,000 fellow-members of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers at Nabisco plants around the country resumed making cookies and crackers.

The two-week strike at the new Buena Park plant brought a minimum pay hike of 17.5 cents an hour—with many workers receiving additional 5-to-15-cent increases on classification adjustments

When the contract expires Aug. 31, 1967, the Buena Park workers will negotiate jointly with other ABC locals on a national agreement—a major union demand.

Production was halted at the other nine Nabisco bakeries represented by the ABC when pickets from Buena Park appeared and workers refused to cross the line. The shutdown extended to Atlanta, Buffalo, Chicago, Denver, Houston, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Fairlawn, N. J., and Portland, Ore.

Rights Backers Win First Test in House

an attempt to have the bill sent back to the Judiciary Committee on a technicality.

Twenty Republicans joined 180 Democrats to bring the bill to the floor; 75 Democrats and 105 Republicans opposed the move.

The omnibus measure includes anti-discrimination safeguards for selection of state and federal juries. It also gives the Justice Dept. authority to sue to desegregate schools and public facilities without waiting for a written complaint of discrimination. And it strengthens laws prohibiting interference by threats or force with the exercise of constitutional rights.

It was the housing section, however, which was the focal point of the legislative battle.

Housing Clause Modified

The Judiciary Committee modified the original bill to exempt the sale of single family homes and rentals of apartments in buildings of less than five dwelling units from the anti-discrimination section. Interpretations differed as to whether the exemption on home sales extended also to a real estate agent commissioned to sell the home, or merely to an individual not using an agent.

The House leadership indicated it would accept an amendment specifically exempting a real estate agent acting at the request of the home owner, although civil rights leaders protested that this would perpetuate suburban segregation walls.

If the bill passes the House with its fair housing provision included, it is expected to face a southern-led filibuster.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen, who helped gather the two-thirds majority needed to limit debate on two previous civil rights bills, has expressed his opposition to any federal ban on discrimination in housing.

Asked by a reporter whether he would join a filibuster against the housing provision, Dirksen suggested that the questioner ask instead whether he would "resist" a filibuster.

'A Loud Sonorous No'

"The answer to that is a loud, sonorous no," Dirksen said.

The AFL-CIO and legislative teams of its affiliates, along with church, Negro and civic groups in the Leadership Conference for Civil Rights, worked at reinforcing support for the legislation on Capitol Hill. It was the same coalition which had successfully pushed the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act, with the exception of the "black power" Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee which has abandoned the legislative effort as a "sham."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), dean of the House in length of service, spoke up at the opening of the weeklong debate in answer to arguments that previous civil rights legislation had not ended disorder and turmoil.

"We are not like lords of the manor, conferring a favor," Celler said. "We are guaranteeing the rights of people. If you were to talk to a man from outer space, could you hear yourself say that a man's rights on this earth depend on the color of his skin?"

Glass & Ceramic Union To Seek Annual Salary

Toronto—The Glass & Ceramic Workers will push ahead for a guaranteed annual salary to put the union's production and maintenance members on the same stabilized economic plane as executives. The resolution on the guaranteed annual salary came at the union's 17th constitutional convention.

The delegates also called for a new kind of dynamic and creative cooperation between governments at the federal, state and city levels to rebuild decaying urban areas.

"We must build a second America within 35 years," said the resolution. "Physical decay of our cities is reflected in school dropouts, delinquency, rising crime rates and social disorganization. The discriminated-against, the old and the poor are increasingly concentrated in humiliating, degrading and ugly core city ghettos."

The delegates also underscored the need for the free labor movement to lead the way in showing that cities can be rebuilt and made into communities where people want to live. The call to battle against the real enemies of humanity—poverty, hunger and disease—was sounded by both Ralph Reiser, international president, and Pres. Claude Jodoin, of the Canadian Labor Congress.

"The great challenge before the human family is to work together to build a rational and responsible world where all people can live in peace so we can harness the technological revolution to man's peaceful purposes," said Reiser.

Jodoin urged emphatic support for a stronger United Nations because "international cooperation is a must if we are to ever attain world peace. Only when we achieve this can we look forward to a bright future."

The 200 delegates solidly endorsed the forecast of AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler that labor will participate actively in the 1966 congressional elections.

'We Are Not Fools'

"Certainly we were disappointed at some of the developments in this session," Schnitzler said. "But we are not fools, and to ignore the election would be to turn over Congress to our enemies by default."

He urged delegates to stop thinking that the failure of labor's prime bills in Congress was caused by the letdown of "our friends," citing instead hard work by "our enemies."

The big work on constitutional amendments was devoted to streamlining election procedures at the international and local levels to make them less cumbersome.

Third Try Wins Green Bay Plant

Green Bay, Wis.—The United Textile Workers of America was chosen by employes at the Diana Mfg. Co. here in the third National Labor Relations Board election since 1962. They voted for the UTWA, 138-88.

A negotiating committee will be elected and contract proposals drafted for an early start on bargaining, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Charles Heymanns said.

A 1962 election at the same plant was lost, 36-97, and a 1965 election by a margin of 90-108.

4-Day Strike Resolves 4 Years of Frustration

South Paris, Me.—Workers at the Paris Mfg. Co. put an end to nearly four years of legalistic frustration by throwing a picket line around the plant here and four days later winning an initial contract.

Management had previously used every legal avenue to avoid a contract since the Furniture Workers won a National Labor Relations Board election, 100-48, in October 1962.

The settlement included, among other things, wage increases of 15 cents an hour in three equal steps by next Feb. 1, union shop and dues checkoff, and paid holidays and vacations.

After the UFWA's labor board election victory, the union engaged in a year of fruitless attempts to negotiate an acceptable first contract. Then followed filing of unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB, issuance of a formal complaint, hearings and an examiner's report, the company's appeal to the full board, and a decision upholding the examiner.

Management's refusal to comply with the decision forced the board to seek a court enforcement order, which sent the parties back to the bargaining table for another unsuccessful round of bargaining.

Finally, the workers called a strike that surprised townsmen by its militance and effectiveness. The contract signing was the final chapter.

A Right to Strike

THE PUSH IN Congress to break the Machinists' strike against five of the nation's 11 major airlines raises a serious question about the implications of such an action in terms of the future effectiveness of the Railway Labor Act.

The law, which covers airlines and their workers as well as the rails, does not prohibit strikes. It provides elaborate machinery, if free collective bargaining has not produced agreement between employers and employes, for fact-finding, mediation and settlement recommendations by a specially-appointed presidential board.

The careful avoidance of a ban on strikes was not accidental. In theory at least a union retains the right to strike—some place along the line—if all the machinery has been used and no agreement has been reached even after renewed bargaining. This basic principle can be undermined if precedents pile up for special legislation whenever collective bargaining fails to produce immediate agreements.

"If you go to the bargaining table without the right to shut the employer down, you go there naked and helpless," said AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a speech to the Newspaper Guild convention.

"If there is no right to strike, then there is no free collective bargaining. It doesn't mean anything."

Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists freely acknowledged in testimony before the Senate Labor Committee that the strike had been an inconvenience to some members of the public.

But even in the Senate the specter of national emergency, of danger to the public health and safety, was no longer proclaimed. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz flatly denied any present "emergency."

Siemiller pointed out that six major airlines and 13 "feeder" lines were not affected and the lines were advertising that some of their flights had taken off with empty seats. Machinists continue to service all planes for Dept. of Defense needs.

So we have a situation in which the Machinists fulfilled all obligations under the Railway Labor Act. There was bargaining, fact-finding, and then came settlement recommendations from a regularly appointed emergency board.

To the workers these terms were not satisfactory—and they struck, perfectly legally, for legitimate economic goals.

But they found the airlines strangely reluctant to resume any meaningful bargaining. Why? It became clear that Congress might be willing to pass a special law solving all their problems for them.

"Looking at it from the selfish viewpoint of employers, they would be crazy to bargain," Meany told the Guild convention. "Why should they offer anything" to their mechanics if Congress seems prepared "to pull their chestnuts out of the fire?"

Cries arose on Capitol Hill that the strikers' demands were "outrageous . . . inflationary . . . unreasonable." While the Senate Labor Committee discussed the request by Wirtz that action be postponed to give collective bargaining a "last clear chance" to work, the spokesman for the airlines would not bargain. The carriers wanted special legislation forcing the workers back to their jobs at their old rates for 180 days more of maneuvering. The end of the line would be another special law—and new barriers to collective bargaining.

Workers still have a right to strike. That is, provided Congress doesn't pass a special law saying that in a specific case they don't.

In 50th Year:

National Parks Prove Magnet For Rising Tide of Vacationers

The following is excerpted from "The National Heritage," an article on the National Park Service appearing in the July 1966 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

EACH YEAR since the end of World War II, the national, state and community parks, the national forests, historic monuments and memorials, seashores, camping areas, recreation spots, both public and private have been bursting at the seams as the actual rush of vacationers far outruns the boldest forecasts.

More and more Americans are now able to satisfy their desire to see, to learn about and—perhaps more important—to understand the heritage of their country.

The labor movement has contributed substantially toward enabling millions of people to enjoy vacations. And labor's efforts to negotiate better vacation clauses for its own members have led to similar benefits for non-union families.

While the lush and plush vacation resorts offer the finest in everything, if the pocketbook can stand it, there are trips and vacations for the modest budget. Practically, however, because motels, hotels and restaurants are expensive for a family on vacation, there has been a fantastic boom in family camping.

From Memorial Day on to Labor Day, nearly all available campsites become teeming tent cities. Most campsites are run on a first-come, first-served basis. Publicly-operated camps often have a 14-day limit.

While most state and city governments recognize this problem and are expanding their facilities each year, there is one agency of the government that is bending all efforts to solve it.

This is the National Park Service, a division of the Dept. of the Interior.

Celebrating its 50th anniversary this year, NPS has as its major and exclusive responsibility the administration and maintenance of some 232 diverse areas, including 32 national parks, 143 historical areas and six national seashores, stretching from coast to coast and into Alaska, Hawaii, the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico.

Early in this golden anniversary year, the service announced the opening of 2,108 new camping sites in 77 areas of the NPS where camping is permitted to accommodate the expected increase in the number of campers taking to the road during 1966. The new sites will increase the total number of campsites operated by the NPS to 29,890.

That the national parks and monuments are magnets for travel is on the record. Only a few years ago, 40 million persons visited the parks annually. In 1955, with visits of 55 million, analysts predicted 80 million by 1966. Yet NPS records show that over 121 million people actually visited the parks in 1965.

More than 137 million persons are expected to visit these parks in 1966.

The responsibility of administering 26 million acres of real estate is the full-time chore of 5,702 specially trained professionals, plus 5,614 seasonal employes.

The National Park Service was established Aug. 25, 1916, to manage the national parks and monuments established by Congress and by executive action of the President.

IN THE MAINTENANCE and operation of the nation's resources, the NPS cooperates with other groups and agencies. But the most vital cooperative effort must come from the visitors themselves. The few who wantonly or thoughtlessly desecrate the sites would leave only desolation for those who will follow.

There is concern also with the deterioration along coastal and inland waterways, where private ownership has held sway for decades. Dilapidated docks, buildings and structures of a bygone era are eyesores and a desecration of the land. Now that the conscience of the nation has been stirred and something is being done federally, statewise and locally to clean up the pollution in waterways and coastal areas, the public can have greater and freer access to such areas.

Action along these lines is currently taking form in legislation before Congress to set aside sand dunes and coastal areas and preserve them free of the stigma of human exploitation.

The more than 137 million people expected to visit areas of the NPS this year will, it is believed, develop a fringe benefit in the field of conservation undreamed of previously. As they see the grandeur of their own country and realize the areas set aside by NPS and other agencies are theirs to use and enjoy, they may become educated to the need for more and more such areas to serve those millions who will follow.

The vast armies of today's vacation travelers can be the stimuli of a grass roots public opinion in helping to shape the nation's policies on the preservation of the nation's beauties and natural resources.

Morgan Says:

Plan for National Data Center Seen New Assault on Privacy

By Edward P. Morgan

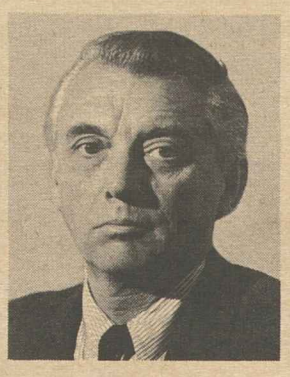
ECONOMY and efficiency are bywords of the materialistic American dream.

They are the touchstones in the foundations of success, the keystones in the arches of progress. And now they threaten, after a fashion—and a sinister fashion at that—to collapse an individual's world about him and leave him as nothing but a squashed statistic in the rubble.



Morgan

At least that is the fear of some people, including Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher (D-N.J.), who has been conducting a House Government Operations subcommittee investigation of government's alleged invasion of privacy.

The subcommittee's inquiries so far have divulged some shockingly arrogant practices—including probes of the sex life of prospective stenographers—and have produced some heartening promises.

In starting a new phase of hearings, Gallagher announced that many federal departments and agencies have either abandoned the use of objectionably intimate personality tests, put them on a voluntary basis or greatly modified their use. Also government contractors are being urged to use the same restraint the Civil Service Commission now employs with such testing of federal personnel. And the Census Bureau, he said, has adopted new procedures to protect the privacy of farmers, their families and hired hands in answering questions on the farm census.

But the federal government has already collected such massive data on American citizens that creation of a national data center, or what Gallagher calls a central dossier bank, has been suggested for the swift interchange of information. This is the subject which now holds the subcommittee somewhat anxiously transfixed. One of its first witnesses, possibly outdoing the committeemen's own anxiety, was Vance Packard, author of "The Hidden Persuaders," "The Naked Society," and other books about the threat to individual freedoms.

"In recent years," he said, "we have seen an enormous growth in techniques for observing, assessing, controlling, keeping track of and exchanging information about people . . . We have the hidden tape recorders, the lie detectors, the personality assessors and the bureaucratic investigators."

And their roles have been vastly simplified by the proliferation of records, the ingestion and regurgitation of these data by computers. Records on individual Americans, he said, now number in the billions.

Under the pressures alone of more economy and efficiency in government—without any big brother motivations at the outset—it was natural, logical and inevitable that federal agencies would look around for ways to pool their data on people.

It is not generally known but the Johnson Administration is using computers to aid in the discovery of talent for federal jobs. The Budget Bureau has a committee studying the feasibility of a computerized government data center, plucking information from separate files at 20 different government offices, the Internal Revenue Service, the Census Bureau and the Social Security Administration among them.

SOCIOLOGIST Packard saw the grim prospect here not of a deliberately totalitarian minded type with its eye on everything everywhere, as in George Orwell's "1984," but of a "relentless bureaucrat obsessed with efficiency" leading us into "that ultimate of horrors, a humanity in the chains of (a computer's) plastic tape." He opposed a national data center without assurances that individual identities would be separated from the data.

Gallagher, however, rejoined darkly that cost-conscious bureaucrats might settle for what he called "quick and dirty computer systems"—quickly put together without safeguarding the individual's privacy, because experience at the Pentagon showed that such safeguards increased the cost of the system from three to 10 times.

Packard observed that people are "increasingly and rightly" resentful of being treated as computer-controlled numbers.

"This resentment," he added, "is believed to be a factor in the student unrest at the vast state universities, where the student's exams may be machine-graded and his ID number is often printed twice as large as his name."

"What we are looking for," said Gallagher at the outset of the session, "is a sense of balance. We do not want to deprive ourselves of the rewards of science; we simply want to make sure that human dignity and civil liberties remain intact."

They are not entirely intact at the moment and whether a computer can be taught to be tender with them remains to be seen, especially when man himself can't seem to learn to be reasonable with his fellow-man.

Defends Housing Compromise:

Celler Presses '66 Rights Bill To End Loopholes, Extend Gains

REP. EMANUEL CELLER (D-N.Y.) declared that the 1966 Civil Rights bill is urgently needed because of loopholes discovered in previously-enacted legislation on the subject.

The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, where the measure originated, pointed out that the job to be done in civil rights is too big to be taken care of in one bill.

Speaking on the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, broadcast nationally by the ABC radio network, Celler said:

"Civil rights must be protected in all walks of American life and the struggle for the maintenance and preservation of these rights has been arduous and difficult. It was not expected that we could give complete relief with one bill. We had to approach this gigantic war against intolerance gradually. I am hopeful that this will be the last bill."

The New York congressman said he did not like the compromises made in Title IV, the housing section, but, "as chairman of the committee, I felt that in order to get the bill through, it was necessary to compromise. Sometimes, in this life, we know it is better to bend than to break."

TO THE OBJECTION that the prices of homes are depreciated when non-white families move into an all-white neighborhood, Cellar pointed out that the contrary is true:

"The prices of houses go up, not down, because the Negroes are willing to pay high prices for those houses.

"We have had real estate operators come to the committee and tell us they feel that Title IV will act as a shield. They would have a protection in the sense that they can say, 'The bill says that we must not discriminate, and we therefore will not'."

On the provisions in the bill that would seek to end discrimination in federal and state court juries, Celler said, "In some counties in the South, the Negro population may be as high as 70 percent, yet the percentage of Negro jurors on a panel only 1 to 5 percent. You could hardly expect that a Negro defendant appearing before a jury which is so one-sided could get a fair trial."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE POTENTIAL FOR REFORM of the House Rules Committee following the unhorsing of Chairman Howard W. Smith in his own 8th Virginia Congressional District Democratic primary is broad and attractive. A clear chance lies ahead to transform the committee into an instrument of the leadership, which is what it should be, rather than a self-constituted independent barony claiming the right to delay and destroy leadership programs.

The new chairman presumptive for the 90th Congress, under the sacred seniority rules, is Rep. William M. Colmer of Mississippi. His voting record is almost the same as Smith's—to wit, negative, obstructionist, stubbornly hostile to the Democratic Party national programs. But he isn't "Judge" Smith.

It is impossible to think of him as exhibiting Smith's versatility and ingenuity in manipulating the committee, Smith's tactical and parliamentary skills on the floor. Seventy-six years old, Colmer is pedestrian.

The committee can be transformed, in any case, by leadership selection of a new Democratic member to fill the vacancy created by Smith's departure.

The technical party division on the committee has been 10 Democrats and five Republicans. But since Smith and Colmer on most issues voted with the Republicans, the effective leadership majority has been eight to seven, subject to reversal when one of the other Democrats felt tempted to turn maverick.

Designation of a dependable Democratic liberal, an Administration loyalist, would raise the effective leadership majority to nine to six.

ONE WAY to achieve this is for the Democratic caucus next January to break away from the even-stephen tradition of dividing Rules Committee members equally between Southerners and Democratic House members from all other sections.

This system made sense when it was instituted. Democrats from the South and the other areas were often evenly balanced; sometimes the Southerners furnished the majority of all party members in the House.

This is no longer true—and hasn't been for years. Southern Democratic membership has been eroded by the election of Republicans in a developing two-party system. Even earlier the Mountain States, the Far West, New England and the Midwest began electing Democratic members outnumbering the Southerners by substantial margins. The margin right now is more than two to one.

There is no reason the North, West and East should not have six Democratic Rules Committee members to four for the South. There is ample talent available from major states not now represented in the committee roster.

ANOTHER POSSIBILITY would be for the Democratic leadership to take the bold step of reconstituting the committee in form and function.

The Rules Committee got the way it is because Smith, and before him other Southern Democrats, simply usurped power lying unused in a vacuum.

The famous George Norris revolution against a "czar-like" Speaker was not intended to make the Rules Committee the arbiter of events in place of official majority party leadership.

Assuming the continued election of a majority of House Democrats from the North, West and East, assuming a continued loss of strength by Southerners to Goldwater-type Republicans, the Democratic caucus would have the power as well as the right to initiate drastic revisions in the rules under which the committee operates.

In advancing either line of reform, the re-election of the 50-plus freshman Democrats in the Class of '64 is extremely important. The leadership needs them in the party caucus.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACTION by Congress is needed to close loopholes in existing laws, Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) of the House Judiciary Committee said on As We See It, the AFL-CIO public service radio program. Celler was interviewed by Harry Flannery of the AFL-CIO public relations staff.

Senate Group Sets Standards On Jobless Aid

ployes, the number added was reduced to 2.3 million.

The Senate committee retained the House provision for an additional 13 weeks of compensation during recession periods for persons who have exhausted their state benefits. But the committee voted to make these additional benefits entirely federally-financed. The House bill would have required states to pay half the cost.

The taxable wage base for the program would be gradually raised to $4,800 under the Senate bill, as compared with $3,000 under present law and $4,200 in the House bill. The Administration proposal would have boosted it to $6,600.

After the committee had completed its work on the bill, a motion to scrap the changes and substitute the House-passed bill was defeated 9-8, with Chairman Russell B. Long (La.) leading the majority that included Democratic Senators Anderson (N.M.), Douglas (Ill.), Gore (Tenn.), McCarthy (Minn.), Hartke (Ind.), Fulbright (Ark.), Ribicoff (Conn.) and Metcalf (Mont.). Then the committee voted 13-4 to report the legislation to the Senate.

The new standards would not automatically apply. States would have to change their laws to conform. But if they failed to do so, they would not be entitled to the heavy rebate they now receive from the federal unemployment insurance tax.

Texas AFL-CIO Names Legislative Director

Austin, Tex.—Pres. Harry Hubbard, Jr., of the Sabine Area AFL-CIO Council, has been named legislative director of the Texas AFL-CIO, effective Sept. 1. Hubbard has worked at the Texas-U.S. Chemical Co. plant in Port Neches and is president of Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 4-228 there.

LABOR'S PARTNERSHIP with the United Fund in New Haven, Conn., made possible this seashore summer day camp. Chatting with some young guests are Dante J. Bartolino, chairman of the Community Services Committee of the New Haven Central Labor Council; Andrea Succo, business representative of Carpenters Local 79, and Frank J. Fallon, labor staff member with the United Fund.

N.Y. Medical Aid Law Highlights Legislature

New York—Passage of New York's new medical assistance law providing almost total tax-paid health care for an estimated 7 million low-income persons was a high point of labor-backed achievements at the six-month session of the state legislature.

For example, a family of four with one wage earner, with $6,000 income after taxes, half that amount of savings and a maximum $1,000 face value of life insurance for each person, would be eligible under the new law for tax-paid hospital, medical, surgical, dental and optometric care, drugs, plasma, X-rays, dentures, eyeglasses and many other needs after paying an initial $60 to $70 toward such costs.

With a split legislature, the New York State AFL-CIO saw a score or more of bills on its program passed by the overwhelmingly Democratic Assembly but quietly killed by being held in committee in the Republican-dominated Senate.

A major disappointment was the Senate refusal to bring to a vote, after it was reported out, a bill to update workmen's compensation benefits still tied to wages of up to 40 years ago.

A similar bill had received overwhelming bipartisan approval a year ago, only to be vetoed by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller on grounds of alleged inadequate financing. This objection was fully met by the 1966 draft of the bill, State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett noted as he pleaded unsuccessfully for passage on behalf of disabled workers and the widows and children of those killed on the job.

On the plus side were enactment of the $1.50 state minimum wage, approved despite vetoes of two such bills a year ago; admission that the state's public worker labor relations law was a failure through passage and signing of bills exempting transit, welfare and ferry workers from any of the punishment mandated by the law, and a measure prohibiting firing of a worker because of a single wage garnishment.

Different bills to ban use of the so-called lie detectors by employers to screen workers were passed by each house of the legislature, but became victims of inter-party conflict. An anti-professional strikebreaker measure was reported out but was never allowed to come to a vote in the Senate.

Among more than 30 other labor-endorsed measures that became law—others still await signature or veto—were bills that give labor relations rights to employes of non-profit restaurants and hotels, return to Longshoremen and their employers the right to limit inflow of casuals to waterfront jobs and assure a guaranteed annual wage to permanent workers, apply workmen's compensation coverage to farm workers, extend the home-work industry ban to include mailing operations, create a major construction fund for expansion of the New York City University, and provide a fairer share of state education aid for city school systems.

Defense Dept. Orders 'Truth-in-Lending'

The Defense Dept. has ordered businessmen who loan money or finance merchandise with military personnel to state clearly and accurately the amount of the loan, the cost of financing the annual interest rate and the annual interest in dollars and cents.

The directive knocks down arguments of opponents of "truth-in-lending" that interest cannot be stated in annual terms. Attached is a simple table, the first of its kind in government, which gives an easy formula for figuring the amount. Lenders will have to use the table or more precise figures if they want to deal with servicemen and their families.

Enforcement of the order is up to each post commander and includes revocation of licenses for anyone who fails to comply, advertises or deals in an unfair or misleading manner, or fails to sign a full disclosure certificate on each deal.

Protections Listed

Off-base businesses can be labeled "off limits" to all military personnel if the Armed Forces can prove that reports of "usurious, fraudulent, misleading or deceptive" deals are true.

The military no longer will help lenders collect debts if it finds that exorbitant charges and other unreasonable obligations are involved. The order also warns against helping collect loans made without a clear previous statement of all finance charges.

The directive went into effect July 1 and should end the victimization of servicemen who, because of low pay and transient living patterns, have been most likely to look for easy credit.

Under the standards of fairness required by the military, attorney's fees are prohibited in loan agreements unless a suit is filed. In such cases, the fee cannot exceed 10 percent of the debt and the debtor will not have to pay fees for a lawyer employed by the lender.

The order also nails those who peddle shoddy goods and then sell the credit contract to a collection agency. Both the original seller and the holder of the debt will be held responsible for any inferior merchandise or other defect in the transaction.

Late charges in excess of 5 percent of the payment or $5, whichever is less, are prohibited, as is the practice of charging more than once on any single late payment.

Borrowers are given the right to terminate the deal any time before the merchandise is delivered unless it is specially made.

The department is preparing a pamphlet for distribution to every man and woman in uniform in the world explaining the directive, offering advice on wise credit buying practices and including a copy of the credit computation table.

Separate Talks Ordered:

Court Backs Printers In Bargaining Stand

New York—The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that newspapers belonging to the Publishers Association of New York City must bargain individually with Local 6 of the Typographical Union.

A three-judge panel unanimously upheld a 1965 order of the National Labor Relations Board requiring each publisher to bargain separately with the printers. It found that each publisher had engaged in an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain for separate contracts. The court noted that the association had rejected a formal request by the printers for such bargaining on July 21, 1964.

Pres. John J. Gaherin of the Publishers Association said the decision would be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. But Local 6 Pres. Bertram A. Powers commented:

"This decision was the logical conclusion in view of the publishers withdrawing from group bargaining whenever it suited their purposes. If they can withdraw from a group procedure, so can we."

Of the 10 unions in the industry, only the Newspaper Guild has in the past bargained with the city's publishers on a separate contract basis.

The Court of Appeals decision had no immediate effect on the current bargaining between the Publishers Association and Local 2 of the Printing Pressmen, last remaining negotiations in the three-months long strike against the World Journal Tribune, Inc., the new corporation formed by the merger of the World-Telegram & Sun, the Journal American and the Herald Tribune. But it could have an effect on the next round of negotiations for renewal of the new contracts due to expire Mar. 30, 1967.

Powers Optimistic

"With this decision," Powers explained, "we will now have the opportunity to explore the individual problems of each publisher, and we believe that separate negotiations will enhance prospects of successful collective bargaining in the newspaper industry."

Named in the federal court decision were Hearst Consolidated Publications, Inc.; Newspaper Enterprises, Inc.; Long Island Daily Press Publishing Co., Inc.; New York World Telegram Corp.; News Syndicate Co., Inc., and the New York Times Co.

In its decision, written by Judge J. Joseph Smith, the court voiced concern about possible effects of its verdict, but said Congress should iron out "any inequities which result."

"While the question is not wholly free from doubt," the decision said, "we conclude that the board was correct in determining that the Congress did not intend to instruct it to require an unwilling union to continue in the consensual relationship if it unequivocally withdrew its consent."

Doubts Expressed

A concurring opinion by Judge Irving R. Kaufman expressed the fear that the decision might actually worsen the problems between the New York publishers and the union, but agreed that the basic issue as to whether there should be individual bargaining by each publisher or collective bargaining through an association was one for Congress to decide.

Some progress was reported as the publishers and the Pressmen continued efforts to resolve their differences in the current merger dispute. Local Pres. W. J. Kennedy said the talks had produced better understanding and more hope.

Gaherin denied that the World Journal Tribune had asked the other papers still in publication—the Times, the News, the Long Island Press and the Long Island Star-Journal—to close down, as they had done in the last two strikes. The New York Post is no longer a member of the association.

Klan Repudiated In UFWA Victory

Union, Miss.—Company opposition and Ku Klux Klan harassment both were repudiated by workers at Cleveland Industries here who voted for the Furniture Workers, 85-42, in a National Labor Relations Board election.

Klan members concentrated on spreading racist rumors and preventing the UFWA from finding a hall where all members could meet, a union spokesman said. That problem was solved by outdoor meetings on a field owned by one of the workers.

The UFWA reported that management held in-plant meetings at which employes were told the union could not help them and that a vote for the UFWA was the same as a vote for the NAACP. Workers responded by wearing union buttons on the job.

Absence of Emergency Stressed:

Move To Bust Airlines Strike Draws Strong Labor Fire

lowing free men to "settle their differences in the atmosphere of liberty which our constitution stoutly proclaims."

"There is no other way, consistent with our American ideal of a free society, to settle this strike," Meany declared in a statement.

A "hasty legislative shortcut devised under pressure in an atmosphere of political expediency" would, he said, constitute "a blow against all free workers and the institution of free collective bargaining in America."

Steelworkers' Pres. I. W. Abel announced that his union's executive board has voted full support for the 35,000 striking airline workers and opposed any action that would freeze workers to old contract terms "while encouraging management to refrain from realistic collective bargaining."

Executive Dir. Jack Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. expressed concern about federal intervention in the strike, saying "it can only result in delaying a fair settlement."

A message of support for the strikers came from the Railway Labor Executives' Association, which pointed out that the Machinists have "complied with every provision of the law and are conducting a legal and orderly strike. They have the right to strike."

The walkout of mechanics and ground crewmen of five airlines—United, Northwest, Eastern, Trans World and United—began July 8 after 10 months of negotiations.

The Transport Workers Union meanwhile reported that it had failed to reach contract agreement with American Airlines and that 12,000 airport workers were preparing to strike. Pres. Johnson promptly created an emergency board, an action which under existing law bars a strike for 60 days.

Siemiller started his Senate committee testimony by saying "this is a legal strike for legitimate economic objectives. It is also a peaceful and orderly strike" reflecting credit on the "trade union discipline" of IAM members in the 231 locations where pickets are stationed.

The dispute has grounded 61 percent of major airline services, Siemiller said, but he cited a government report showing that less than 6 percent of intercity passenger travel is by domestic airlines and that less than one-tenth of 1 percent of domestic intercity freight traffic is by air.

No Perils to Defense

"We know of no situation where the health of the nation or any single community in it has been endangered. Nor is national defense imperiled," he said.

Noting that all Defense Dept. military flights have been serviced, Siemiller declared: "We do not believe that the right to strike can be recognized only in cases where a strike is ineffective or where no one will be inconvenienced."

While Benito Mussolini became famous for "making the Italian railroads run on time," Siemiller said, "I doubt this is a system many Americans would care to live under."

He said: "We believe that the right to strike is basic to Western freedom. The right to withhold one's services in support of what a man considers to be a fair and equitable settlement is a right inherent" in American policy.

Wirtz told the committee, headed by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), that the strike has not brought the country to an emergency stage. He asked the committee not to act at this time on a proposal by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) for a return to work and continued bargaining and voiced outright opposition to another bill providing for compulsory arbitration. He urged that "free collective bargaining be given a last clear chance."

Morse urged immediate committee action on his proposed bill to order the strikers back to their jobs for six months while bargaining continues under special federal mediation machinery. Morse explained that mediators named by the President would have authority to specify which party to the bargaining refused to "accept a fair settlement."

The committee chose, at least temporarily, to refer the issue to the White House.

The Oregon senator first proposed federal operation of the airlines and a return to work while bargaining continued. When objections were voiced he amended the bill by striking out a section calling the impasse a "national emergency" and saying instead that it threatens "substantially to interrupt interstate commerce."

The Machinists called the Morse bill "direct intervention on the side of management." A union statement pointed to the "extraordinary profits" of the carriers in the last three years. Some of the strikers, it said, earn "less per hour than Greyhound bus mechanics, longshoremen, top-skilled steelworkers, carpenters on a construction site or a presser in one of the better shops."

William J. Curtin, chief negotiator for the struck lines, testified that the strike has created a "national transportation crisis worthy of prompt resolution, even if it takes extraordinary means."

The strike is seriously damaging defense transportation, mail delivery, incomes of airline employes and is causing a general disruption of U.S. business, Curtin said.

Meany Sees Strike Ban As Curb on Freedom

tions in November, he said "this is where we can use our influence, to put in people with compassion for others."

Labor, in its desire to secure for all workers a share of the wealth they have produced, will "fight for it on the picket line, the economic front and the political front," he declared.

"We will find out who our friends are when they run for office and when the chips are down. In that effort, I am convinced the Guild is going to play its part."

The AFL-CIO president recalled the early struggles of newspapermen to gain recognition for their union—over the publishers' argument that they were "professionals" and didn't belong in unions.

"I was a plumber," Meany said, "and I don't know what the social standing of a plumber was in those days, but the economic standard of a plumber was a hell of a lot better than any newspaperman I knew."

He said the Guild has raised the standards of all newspaper employes it has organized and also raised the standards of journalistic ethics to the extent it was possible to do so.

Meany said he wished publishers had been equally diligent.

"Their standards were not high in those days and I am sorry to say that their standards are not high today," he observed. As an example of ethical lapse, Meany cited identical editorials appearing in newspapers throughout the nation opposing repeal of Taft-Hartley's Section 14(b) — "all written by the paid publicity agents of the National Right to Work Committee."

Highlights of the convention banquet included the labor songs of Joe Glazer, filmed recollections of the late Heywood Broun, founder of the Guild, and the ovation given to the Bureau of National Affairs strikers who came off the picket line to the banquet hall—courtesy of the Cleveland delegation. A group of Cleveland delegates gave up their banquet tickets to the strikers and took their place on the picket line.

When the convention opened, the 250 delegates received recommendations from ANG officers for a more vigorous organizing and bargaining program. After committee reports, delegates were to vote on goals including substantial increases in wages, increased efforts to abolish wage discrimination against women, protection against dismissals due to automation and other technical methods, and more inter-union cooperation.

$292 Top Minimum

The officers reported that the prosperity of the newspaper industry, and the forecasts for even greater profits in the future, justify convention action in seeking wage minimums of $292 a week for employes in key classifications, $146 for any adult classification.

Newspaper profits are pyramiding, with profit ratios up to 23 percent of revenue, they said. In the past year the Guild made its greatest wage gains in two decades, the report noted. The defense fund passed the $1 million mark for the first time and dues-paying membership was at an all-time high.

ANG Pres. Arthur Rosenstock urged that Congress strengthen anti-merger legislation to stop the "ruthless plundering of our free press."

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson noted the failure of many journalism college graduates to enter the newspaper field and called for a united effort to "raise minimums to a competitive position with other media."

Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., cited recent mergers, work stoppages and job losses as indicative of the continuing need for maintaining the union's defense fund at a high level.

Charge of 'Intimidation' Follows Air Base Firing

The American Federation of Government Employes has filed an unfair labor practice charge against and Air Force officer for what it termed an "outrageous" attempt to intimidate union members.

The AFGE charge, filed with the Secretary of the Air Force, is based on an attempt to fire Lawrence Stone, president of the union's Andrews Air Force Base local and head of a council of AFGE lodges in the Defense Dept.

Stone was told he would be fired just two days after his local had won a representation election for a unit of 1,100 workers and one day after he filed charges of harassment of union members against several management officials.

AFGE Pres. John F. Griner described the alleged grounds for firing Stone as "frivolous" and "an obvious subterfuge."

Stone's supervisor—a lieutenant colonel—listed two grounds for dismissal in the formal firing notice.

One allegation is that Stone—a $15,000-a-year engineer with 20 years of federal service—had overclaimed $3.70 on a travel expense voucher. The other allegation was that he had not received permission from his supervisor to leave his job to attend a Pentagon meeting on union-management problems with the Air Force's civilian personnel director.

In its unfair labor practice charge, based on the union recognition policy spelled out in presidential executive order, the AFGE said the real intent of the dismissal action was to:

- "Discourage union membership by demonstrating to employes the results of militant activities, and
- "Discipline a union officer for filing a complaint."

At a news conference, Stone termed the action against him "a case pure and simple of union busting." If it stands, he warned, "the government's labor-management program won't be worth the paper it's written on."

Stone, a veteran of two wars and a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve, said Air Force investigators "put me in a back room for about an hour for interrogation" on the expense voucher which he said resulted when a secretary typed in the wrong departure time for a trip.

In addition to filing the unfair labor practice charge, the AFGE is contesting the proposed dismissal through Air Force and Civil Service Commission appeal channels.

FREEDOM TO STRIKE is essential to a free society, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told delegates to the 33rd annual convention of the Newspaper Guild. He is shown addressing the convention banquet.

Quebec Unionist Named To CLC Organizing Post

Ottawa, Ont.—Phillipe Vaillancourt, formerly Canadian Labor Congress education director in Quebec, has been named an assistant national organization director.

After Stormy Debate:

Foreign Aid Funds Slashed by Senate

The Senate passed a battered version of the Administration's foreign aid bill and a conference committee will try to reconcile it with a more generous House-passed bill.

The Senate bill authorizes $2 billion for economic assistance to less fortunate nations, but boosts the interest rate underdeveloped nations must pay on long-term loans.

A separate Senate bill authorized $792 million for military assistance programs—$100 million below the White House request.

Economic Aid Cut

While the House bill was close to the Administration's budget request, the Senate cut the economic aid package by $409 million. It also limited the aid authorization to one year, except the Alliance for Progress in Latin America, which was given a two-year extension. The President had asked a five-year authorization for all economic programs. The House approved five years for the Alliance and two years for other economic programs.

During a stormy seven-day debate, the Senate adopted 26 amendments to the bill—most of which added restrictions to the program. The nation's basic commitment to the principle of foreign aid was reaffirmed, however, in a 66-27 vote for final passage. On this, 48 Democrats and 18 Republicans supported the bill; 15 Democrats and 12 Republicans voted against it.

The House had lumped economic and military aid into a single package, but the Senate divided the programs. The $100 million slash was voted, 55-37, despite a warning by Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara that the need had increased, rather than decreased since the budget was drawn up.

After Congress has completed action on the authorization bill, it will take up the appropriation for the aid program. The authorization bill merely sets a ceiling on the money that can be appropriated.

In another action, the House Commerce Committee, at one stage embroiled in sharp controversy over auto safety legislation, emerged with unanimous approval of a bill directing establishment of federal safety standards for new and used cars and tires.

The committee combined in a single bill separate auto and tire legislation passed by the Senate, and strengthened some of the provisions.

The first auto standards would apply to the 1968 model year and would be based on safety requirements the government has set for cars it buys for its own use. Additional standards would be imposed a year later. The committee voted to create a 13-member advisory council, with five representatives of the auto manufacturing industry, three state or local government members, and five public representatives.

The tire regulations call for standards for original equipment tires and a grading system to end the present confusion over the relative merits and capabilities of different "lines" of tires.

Despite its involvement in the airlines dispute, the Senate Labor Committee continued to work in closed session on a minimum wage bill approved by the subcommittee. The subcommittee bill would set the date for the present $1.25 wage floor to reach the $1.60 level as Feb. 1, 1968—a year earlier than the date set in the House-passed bill.

The House Labor Committee approved a $5.7 billion, two-year extension of federal aid programs for grade and high schools. It authorized up to $2.2 billion for the current fiscal year, rising to nearly $3.6 billion the second year. The bill includes funds for continued "impact" grants to schools attended by children of servicemen and federal civilian employes, ignoring Administration efforts to end the program.

UNION LABEL of Ladies' Garment Workers will be in Luci Baines Johnson's wedding gown when she is married Aug. 6 to Patrick J. Nugent in Washington. Here Sally Kowalski (left) and Rose Tomei, members of the union's Local 281 in the plant of the Robert Leonard Corp., Lowell, Mass., lay out sections of white lace before sewing them together for the nuptial gown. Dresses of the 13 attendants also are being completed at the Leonard plant and will carry the union label.

Potters Vote Rule Changes On Elections

Miami Beach, Fla.—Election machinery in locals of the Operative Potters was streamlined in a series of amendments to the constitution by delegates to the union's 72nd convention here.

The changes make it possible for a plurality to choose a winner instead of the majority required in the past for election as delegate to a convention or a wage conference. The old practice frequently required time-consuming runoffs.

The more than 200 delegates, representing nearly 100 locals with about 17,000 members, called for a $2 per hour federal minimum wage and doubletime after 35 hours a week. A companion resolution urged state and provincial legislative bodies to establish wage floors equal to those set by the federal governments of the United States and Canada.

The convention in addition called for the repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act and unanimously voted to continue active support of COPE.

The delegates also acted to step up the union's continuing campaign to promote the sale of union-made products its members manufacture.

Policy resolutions adopted at the AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco last December were endorsed.

Speakers were Mayor Elliott Roosevelt of Miami Beach, who welcomed the delegates, and Rep. Rudolph N. Marginot of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Pres. E. L. Wheatley and Sec.-Treas. Charles F. Jordan were re-elected at the 1965 convention to terms that run until 1969.

Two Democrats Set For Arkansas Runoff

Little Rock, Ark.—Right-winger Jim Johnson and former State Atty. Gen. Frank Holt will face each other in a runoff primary Aug. 9 for the Democratic nomination for governor of Arkansas.

Johnson and Holt ran first and second in a field of seven candidates seeking the nomination to succeed six-term Gov. Orval Faubus, who did not run again.

The Republican candidate will be Winthrop Rockefeller, former state industrial development chairman who ran a strong race against Faubus two years ago and is expected to prove a formidable candidate again.

In other Democratic primaries, all three incumbent House members seeking renomination, plus Sen. John L. McClellan, won easy victories. The House incumbents include Representatives E. C. Gathings, Chairman Wilbur D. Mills of the Ways & Means Committee, and J. W. Trimble, a member of the powerful Rules Committee.

In the 4th District long occupied by former Rep. Oren Harris, who resigned last February after being appointed as a federal judge, two young attorneys—State Rep. David Pryor of Camden and Richard Arnold of Texarkana, a newcomer—will meet in a runoff for the Democratic nomination.

Arnold's second-place finish in a field of five knocked out Charles L. Honey, a former aide both to Harris and Sen. J. W. Fulbright, rated a favorite in advance.

2 GOP Nominees

Republicans will field candidates only in the 4th District, where party leaders designated a farmer-engineer, Lynn Lowe, and Trimble's 3rd District, where the GOP state chairman, John Paul Hammerschmidt, was selected.

In the fierce battle for nomination for governor, Johnson and Holt together polled about half the total vote, with former Rep. Brook Hays in third place and the ballots well splintered among the other four candidates.

Johnson, a supporter of Republican Presidential nominee Barry Goldwater in 1964, campaigned violently against the federal government, for private property rights and what he called "constitutional government" and against the "money changers" in the state capitol.

As a state senator he made himself a segregationist spokesman following the Supreme Court's school desegregation decisions and ran unsuccessfully against Faubus for governor in 1956. He rode a wave of angry feelings into a State Supreme Court nomination in 1958, and in the first primary July 26 pulled heavy support in southern and eastern Arkansas where racial feeling has always been most intense.

Holt, also a former Supreme Court justice as well as former attorney general, coldly refused to engage in personality attacks and rejected discussion of race as an issue. His runoff primary position was assured when he ran well ahead in populous Pulaski County, where Hays had been rated strongest.

Congress Urged to Curb Spiraling Bank Interest

when there should be a sharp rise in building homes and community facilities to meet the crying need to rebuild the cities of the nation," Meany said.

He noted that a 1-point rise in the interest rate on a $20,000, 25-year mortgage adds more than $3,600 in interest costs, adding: "For the vast majority of American wage and salary earners, $3,600 represents well over one-half year's earnings."

Meany urged Congress to consider as "a matter of immediate and pressing concern" these proposals:

- "A rollback of interest rates to more reasonable levels. It would be appropriate . . . to consider an interest rate ceiling of 4.5 percent on time deposits of all types.
- "A congressional resolution demanding the Federal Reserve exercise its authority—through the purchase of government securities and regulation of reserve requirements—to stabilize the money market and maintain reasonable interest rates.
- "A curb on the business investment boom, through repeal of the 7 percent tax credit on investment in new equipment, which would make more funds available for housing and other economic activities.
- "A measure to provide a gradual and orderly end to the issuance of certificates of deposits.
- "An immediate review of the effect on the money market of the issuance by the federal government of participation certificates." [These are shares in portfolios of government loans, sold to private investors under a no-risk arrangement.]
- "Development of effective coordination and cooperation among the various federal agencies, including the Federal Reserve System, that are in the money and credit areas."

Meany strongly urged that Congress itself direct the necessary steps to lower interest rates rather than expand the authority of the Federal Reserve Board. "Past actions" of the FRB and its failure to use its existing power effectively, Meany said, are arguments against granting it broader authority.

Ex-AFGE Aide Gets Consumer Unit Post

The Consumers Information Committee on Resources & Energy has announced the appointment of George E. Meagher as its new executive director. Meagher has been legislative director of the American Federation of Government Employes and previously had served on the staff of the late Sen. Olin D. Johnston (D-S.C.)

Buying Power Of Workers Drops

Rising consumer prices drove down factory workers' purchasing power by about 25 cents a week in June although net spendable earnings were unchanged from May, the Labor Dept. reported.

"Real" spendable earnings, representing actual purchasing power, slid from $81.13 a week in May to $80.91 for a worker with no dependents, and from $88.12 to $87.88 for one with three dependents, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

After-tax earnings remained at $91.35 and $99.22, respectively, or about $2.15 higher than in June 1965. The factory workweek, which usually rises during the month, was unchanged at 41.5 hours, as were hourly earnings at $2.70.

IBEW Upheld On Procedure For Discipline

Carson City, Nev.—The Nevada Supreme Court has upheld the right of a union to hold hearings on disciplinary charges against members before a state court may intervene.

Affirming a lower court ruling, the Supreme Court ruled that a hearing committee named by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers had the authority under the union constitution to take evidence against 43 members of Reno Local 401 who had been accused of encouraging "wildcat" work stoppages contrary to union policy.

The committee was holding hearings in Reno when some of the accused members asked for a court injunction to halt the hearings. The state's top court said the complainants could not show that they were being irreparably injured by the proceedings.

IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman said the ruling "recognizes the value of having union tribunals decide internal disputes" and also "confirms the fairness of IBEW procedures."

The hearings are slated to resume Aug. 22.

2nd Quarter Profits Zoom 13 Percent

Unit Labor Costs Stay Unchanged

Corporate profits zoomed upward in the second quarter of 1966—at a time when unit labor costs were virtually static—with price increases causing most of the climb.

Profits tallied out at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of more than $83 billion before taxes, or about 13 percent higher than for the same period in 1965, according to the quarterly survey of Business Week magazine.

The rise was chalked up in the face of lower profits than last year in two industry bellwethers, steel and autos.

Rise 'Remarkable'

The new level was less than 1 percent higher than in the first 1966 quarter, the magazine notes. But it adds that most economists are inclined to call the first quarter performance "remarkable" in that it showed a jump of 12 percent over the 1965 first-quarter annual rate of $74.5 billion and was 5 percent more than the $78.1 billion annual rate set in the final three months of 1965.

The reports "reveal a clear-cut case of profit inflation," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger charged. "Prices have been rising while the cost of labor per unit has barely moved," he said.

"The growing spread between the prices of industrial goods and unit labor costs is now greater than at any time since mid-1951, according to government figures. As a result, profit margins have continued to widen and the total volume of profits has been soaring, while improvements in wages and salaries lag far behind."

Cost Stability Cited

Business Week cites the unit labor costs to which Goldfinger refers, commenting on their "remarkable stability."

The Census Bureau's unit labor cost index for June, it points out, was 99.3 percent of the 1957-59 base of 100, in contrast to 99 percent in June 1965. It adds that the bureau's index showing ratio of price to unit labor costs was 106.4 percent of the 1957-59 base, compared to 103.9 percent in June 1965 and 106 percent in December.

"The record is clear for all who wish to look at the facts," Goldfinger commented.

"In the first half of 1966, it looks as though profits were up 11 percent or more than a year ago, while dividend payments to stockholders were up 14 percent.

"In contrast, wages, salaries and fringe benefits increased only

Senate Clears Bill to Send Striking Machinists Back

Meany Hits 'Punitive' Measures

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Senate approved a resolution ordering Machinists back to their jobs on five struck airlines despite a strong warning from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that any such measure would "force free men to work against their will for the profit of private investors." Meany declared the AFL-CIO was "unalterably opposed" to such a bill.

Senate passage of the resolution, 54 to 33, followed by minutes a 51 to 36 vote approving an amendment offered by Sen. Wayne Morse and backed by the Senate leadership, under which both Congress and the President would compel the 35,000 strikers to return to work.

In its final form, as sent to the House, the measure calls for:

- A 30-day back to work order, effective when and if the measure becomes law.
- A 60-day extension of the order, at the President's option, to be triggered by his appointment of a special panel to mediate the dispute.
- Another extension of 90 days by prolonging the life of the panel, if the mediators themselves so advise and again at the President's option.

The vote on the amendment followed Senate rejection, 66 to 21, of a motion by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) to defer action until Aug. 10 to allow time for a new ratification vote by the strikers.

Adoption of the resolution followed four days of debate during which a number of senators voiced strong opposition to any form of strikebreaking legislation.

Morse and other members of the Senate Labor Committee had re-

Final Tests Near:

House in Hard Fight On New Rights Bill

A closely-divided House fought for days on the 1966 civil rights bill with opponents centering their fire on the section to ban race discrimination in housing and with final action probably postponed beyond another weekend.

An unusual coalition of Southern Democrats and Republicans formed in an attempt to block a clarifying and "softening" amendment the leadership said was essential to passage of the housing section and was beaten by only one vote.

The coalition then prepared to back another amendment that would strike out the housing section completely and leave the bill without any provision on discrimination in housing.

In long sessions of preliminary actions the House waded through dozens of proposed amendments, with opponents staging a delaying action by quorum calls and other devices.

The legislative leaders who devised the bill were the same—Democratic Chairman Emanuel Celler (N. Y.) of the Judiciary Committee and Republican Rep William M. McCulloch (O.), the ranking minority member — who cooperated in framing earlier civil rights bills.

House Republicans, however, were resisting McCulloch on some issues, with GOP Floor Leader Gerald R. Ford, Jr. (Mich.) leading the attack on the housing provisions as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The first test vote on the housing section came on an amendment, sponsored by Rep. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.), to spell out the exact terms of a Judiciary Committee provision exempting the owners of single homes and small apartment buildings from the anti-discrimination section.

Both Celler and McCulloch said the clarifying amendment was nec-

Williams Wins Easily; Smylie Out in Idaho

G. Mennen Williams, six times governor of Michigan but more recently an assistant secretary of state, took a long step on the political comeback trail winning an impressive victory over Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh of Detroit for Democratic nomination for the Senate.

Another veteran political leader, Republican Gov. Robert E. Smylie of Idaho, suffered a shocking defeat, however, in his bid for a fourth-term nomination, losing to State Sen. Donald W. Samuelson.

The implications of Smylie's disaster could be national in scope. Smylie took the lead, following the overwhelming 1964 defeat of Republican Barry Goldwater by Pres. Johnson, in demanding a stronger voice for Republican governors in his party's councils and was elected chairman of the newly organized GOP Governors' Association.

A recognized moderate, who has often had substantial labor backing in his campaigns, he was beaten badly by Samuelson, a conservative with powerful right-wing support.

In Kansas both Gov. William H. Avery and Sen. James B. Pearson won renomination in the Republican primary, Pearson turning back

Senate Urged to Keep Jobless Aid Bill Intact

The Senate started action on the unemployment compensation bill reported by the Finance Committee as its first order of business following the airlines controversy and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for passage of the committee bill without "weakening amendments."

The committee version "does not include all the improvements" needed to modernize and improve the 30-year-old unemployment insurance system, Meany noted, but the improvements it does embody have "high and urgent priority."

The existing unemployment insurance systems in the states "are inadequate, unfair and discriminatory," he declared. Half the unemployed receive no benefits at all and, in the total, only $1 out of $5 lost by workers through joblessness is compensated for.

Technical Engineers Step Up Organizing

St. Louis, Mo.—The opportunities for organizing among federal employes opened up under Pres. Kennedy's executive order on union recognition were stressed by delegates to the 37th convention of the Technical Engineers.

Officers and staff members were directed to step up recruiting activities in U.S. installations in all parts of the country. The "substantial" agreements negotiated in shipyards in which the union has achieved bargaining status have enabled the locals, it was pointed out, to increase their membership and add strength for future bargaining.

White Collar Prospects

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. in a convention speech cited opportunities for organizing among professional and white collar workers both in and outside federal employe ranks.

After extended discussion of the organizing potential, the approximately 80 delegates voted to increase per capita payments to the national union by 25 cents to $1.25 a month. If the proposal is approved in a membership referendum, the proceeds will be used mainly for membership campaigns.

The convention voted unanimously to change the name of the union from the American Federation of Technical Engineers to the American Federation of Professional & Technical Engineers, subject to AFL-CIO approval.

The delegates were brought up to date on changes in the labor laws since the last convention two years ago by Herbert Thatcher, Washington labor lawyer whose clients include the Technical Engineers.

The convention unanimously endorsed the united front of eight unions, including the AFTE, formed to coordinate bargaining with General Electric and Westinghouse.

Pres. Russell M. Stephens and Sec.-Treas. James Woodside were re-elected without opposition.

Also named to new terms were the following vice presidents: Edmund Noetzl, Northeast; Rodney Bower, Atlantic states; Maurice Wheeler, Midwest; Albert G. Ross, Far West; Albert Resolute, federal employes, and Grant Timmins, Canada.

The 1968 convention will be held in the Philadelphia area.

Mississippi AFL-CIO Votes Organizing Drive

Jackson, Miss.—A concerted organizing drive aimed at broadening the base of trade unionism in Mississippi was unanimously approved by delegates to the State AFL-CIO convention here.

Preliminary plans were laid at an all-day post-convention session at which AFL-CIO Assistant Organizing Dir. Alan Kistler met with state labor leaders. Representatives of several unions undertook to secure aid from their internationals, and another meeting was set for Oct. 29 and 30 in Jackson.

Pres. Claude Ramsay and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Knight were re-elected by acclamation and for the first time the convention elected a Negro member of the executive board—Robert Woodson, assistant business agent of Carpenters Local 3031, Jackson, an industrial local with the membership about equally divided between whites and Negroes.

In other actions the convention condemned extremism of both right and left; endorsed AFL-CIO convention policy resolutions on the National Labor Relations Act, including repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act; supported the Johnson Administration's course in Viet Nam, and backed the anti-poverty program and truth-in-packaging and truth-in-lending legislation.

Speakers included E. T. Kehrer, southern representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Hodding Carter III, chairman of the biracial Mississippi Young Democrats; State Treas. William Winter, who is regarded as a potential Democratic candidate for governor, and State Superintendent of Education J. M. Tubb.

vived their moves to impose such a measure following the overwhelming rejection by the strikers of a tentative settlement reached in negotiations at the White House.

Meany, in telegrams to all senators emphasized that no national emergency existed and that there had been no evidence of any delay in moving defense material.

A vote for any strikebreaking measure "can only be considered as antilabor in character and a retaliation against the Machinists, who acted as free men have every right to act," Meany said, adding:

"I urge you to vote against any punitive measure and allow the parties to end this perfectly legal strike in a legal manner through the negotiation of an acceptable agreement."

Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the striking union also sent telegrams to all senators urging that before any vote they check their morning newspapers for the six-month profit report of Trans World Airlines.

Profits Soar

TWA profits in the first half of the year jumped 22 percent over 1965 profits and other struck lines were holding back profit statements, Siemiller declared. He urged also that the Senate investigate whether the airlines "can afford to increase their offer and get this strike settled now." Strike-bound Eastern Airlines later reported a 12 percent profit increase in 1966's first half.

The executive board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers called on Congress to avoid "one-sided, restrictive legislation" but instead to exert its "enormous influence" on both labor and management to "reach a prompt and equitable agreement with the help of government officials" through free collective bargaining.

Noting that the strike has been "legal, peaceful and orderly," the IUE board said Congress "cannot in good conscience engage" in strikebreaking activity against employes and put its "enormous power on the side of management." It added:

"Rising airline industry profits and productivity have nearly doubled, while rising prices and living costs have cut deeply into airline employes' paychecks."

Nine-Month Talks

The walkout of mechanics and ground crew members began July 8 after nearly nine months of negotiations by the IAM and management of five major airlines out of the 11 in commercial service—United, Eastern, Northwest, Trans World and National.

Earlier, Pres. Johnson had appointed an emergency board whose proposals for settling the contract dispute were rejected by union negotiators.

The President called the parties to the White House July 29 for intensified bargaining. They reached an agreement which the strikers themselves rejected in a secret ballot vote by a margin of nearly 3 to 1 out of some 24,000 ballots cast.

The Senate then began debating proposals to declare an emergency, to force the strikers back to work, to give the President authority to end the walkout, and other measures.

It rejected, 81-6, a proposal by Sen. Frank J. Lausche (D-O.) to order the strikers back to their jobs and impose compulsory arbitration if the strike were not settled within 180 days. Supporting Lausche were Senators Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.), Spessard L. Holland (D-Fla.), John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), George A. Smathers (D-Fla.) and John J. Williams (R-Del.).

Finally, after another day of debate, the Senate approved the back-to-work resolution as amended by the "compromise" worked out by Morse and the Senate leadership.

House consideration of the measure was to begin in the Commerce Committee, whose chairman Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.) said hearings would begin promptly.

Housing Group Expands Board

New York—The United Housing Foundation, 15-year-old organization set up to promote low-cost co-operative housing, has expanded its board of directors from 15 to 20 members.

Added to the board are Max Kanner, vice president of the ILGWU Houses; Seymour Klanfer, vice president of the Amalgamated Housing Corp.; Albert Shanker, president of the New York local of the Teachers; Abraham Shocket, a director of the East River Housing Corp., and Sec.-Treas. Alfred Smoke of the Hatters. Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky is president of the housing foundation.

Remarks of Senators Opposing Strike Bills

Excerpts from speeches by senators opposing any legislation to order Machinists back to work on five struck airlines:

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.)—"I think any step of this kind should only be taken with the most convincing evidence that such action to require, to force, to compel, to dictate to workers that they go back to work against their will—that such actions are justified by a clear national emergency.

"The right to strike is organized labor's most vital right . . . Members of Congress are seriously inconvenienced. So are business leaders. But does this honestly require such drastic action as federal dictation to require workers to break a strike? That is the question.

"As far as I am concerned, there has been no pressure. Organized labor certainly has not exerted any undue pressure. . . . It is clear . . . that this country is not in an emergency that would require this kind of emergency legislation.."

Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.)—"It is not just this simple instance of the airline strike now. . . . It is the precedent we would be establishing and deepening.

"It seems to me that we have to ask ourselves the central question: Is this the kind of impending national disaster that requires the substantive action of this body? So far, nobody has been willing to say that it is.

"It seems to me that we would do well to abide our sense of pique for the moment, to let our sense of being inconvenienced take its place in proper perspective to our sense of a much larger national obligation, and that is in the retention of the fundamental principle of collective bargaining.

"For that reason . . . I hope that we take the long view on this, rather than the short one, and think twice before we inject this body into a dispute that is clearly—up until now, at least—within the bounds of normal . . . differences of opinion."

Sen. E. L. Bartlett (D-Alaska)—"I believe it would be a tragic mistake for us to intervene. . . . If the strikers are forced back to work, nothing will be solved. They will go back grudgingly and unwillingly. They will not be happy and management will not be happy. Another crisis may soon confront us."

Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.)—"If there is anybody from Louisiana who cannot get on an airplane, call my office. We have not yet failed to get a single person on an airplane. Eastern Airlines is not operating, but Delta is . . . So Eastern is not making any money but Delta is.

"There is no national emergency. The President will not say that there is. . . nor the Secretary of Labor, nor the Committee on Labor. . "

Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.)—"There has been no showing in this chamber, or in the record, that there is a national emergency. If Congress is going to be involved every time a segment of an industry . . . or of our population is inconvenienced, this will be a very busy Senate.

"Let us vote down both resolutions, and when someone comes in to show there is a national emergency, and there is danger to the health and welfare of the citizens . . . then we can consider this other legislation."

Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.)—"The price we will pay for damage to our collective bargaining system will be far greater than any temporary gain from a politically forced settlement." (Text on Page 4).

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) at a news conference: "I will vote against any form of government interference in the bargaining process. I don't feel this is a national emergency. The truly worrisome thing is that each time the government takes a hand in labor negotiations, it must concern itself with profits and wages. I am made uncomfortable by government-fixed wages and profits."

Labor Costs Static:

Quarterly Profits Continue to Soar

9 percent. And this is on top of a profit rise of 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after taxes between 1960 and 1965. On the other hand, wages, salaries and fringe benefits increased merely 33 percent in those five years.

"If there is inflation in the United States, it is profit inflation."

Business Week observes that if most forecasters are right, "corporations will continue to rake in chips at the present record level for the balance of the year," with predictions of total before-tax profits ranging from 10 to 11 percent higher than last year's $75.7 billion.

'Less Than Full Share'

The magazine says that some industries, notably autos, "appear to be getting less than their full share of the wealth." But it quotes an unidentified economist as saying that 1965 was not an ordinary year for autos and "by normal standards, the industry is not doing half so bad."

What worries industry now, the magazine says, is whether it can expand production without running up production costs. It adds:

"In the second quarter, however, business showed a surprising ability to keep profit margins under control. Higher production costs apparently were more than offset by rising volume, greater efficiency, and the ability to pass any higher costs of production on to the consumer without his complaining. The key to the higher profits was, as one bank economist puts it, 'higher selling prices more than anything else.' "

The second-quarter profits parade was led by Polaroid, according to a table of 51 "blue chips" listed by Business Week, with a gain of 98.9 percent over the comparable three months of 1965.

Other firms leading the way included Boeing Aircraft, with profits up 59.9 percent; Intl. Paper, 49.9 percent; Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical, 54.1 percent, and Safeway Stores, the big supermarket chain, 52.3 percent. Only seven of the 51 firms showed lower earnings.

Business Week visualizes a possible "serious problem" next year, "when a number of major labor contracts come up for renewal."

It also cites the views of some economists that soaring profits will encourage Congress to hike corporate taxes to finance both the war in Viet Nam and domestic programs.

Tight money also could "be a headache," it adds, as financing for new plants and equipment becomes harder to find.

The article lists one "particularly encouraging factor," quoting the National Industrial Conference Board as reporting that plans for future capital spending are still growing faster than the actual spending.

"While admittedly there are questions to be answered about the trend of corporate profits," the magazine winds up, "there's little to suggest a turning point."

IUE Offers Contract Terms to GE, Asks Bargaining to Begin Aug. 15

ion's executive board has voted "to accept $8 million of the many millions offered by various segments of the labor movement to back up IUE's resources with all that may be required for successful collective bargaining with GE and Westinghouse."

Additional millions are available if needed, Jennings said, adding the funds were offered without any discussion about repayment.

Callahan said in a letter to GE's chief negotiator, Philip Moore, that with both union and management proposals on the table, "we will have the maximum of time to mark out the major areas of difference and begin to narrow or eliminate them to reach a settlement by Oct. 2," the date on which IUE intends to terminate its contract, it told GE.

What is needed more than ever, Callahan said, "is willingness to examine issues with a sense of responsibility to all concerned and a determination, through bargaining, to resolve disputed questions."

The IUE did not make its proposal terms public. It is one member of an eight-union coalition formed to coordinate bargaining toward these goals in 1966 negotiations with GE and Westinghouse:

- A substantial wage increase along with an end to geographic salary differentials and a cost of living escalator provision.
- Holiday and vacation improvements on a par with those in other basic industries.
- Better income and employment security such as adequate layoff pay and other means of maintaining and increasing employment.
- A full union shop, an improved arbitration clause, and provisions for dealing with problems caused by automation.
- Substantial increases in pension and insurance programs, particularly in pension minimums and early retirement clauses, to bring them up to major industry standards.

The eight-union agreement to abandon the long-time single-union approach in favor of a joint program of improvements has AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's strong backing. While all the unions agreed to coordinate their bargaining goals, it was understood that each would handle its own negotiations.

GE representatives walked out of a pre-negotiation meeting with the IUE May 4 alleging that representatives of the seven other unions that also attended were not a part of the IUE bargaining team.

The IUE filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board and a U.S. District Court judge has ordered GE to explain why it should not be enjoined from refusal to bargain. The IUE expects a ruling before Aug. 15.

In his letter to Moore, Callahan responded to a GE request that negotiations begin without IUE committee members from other unions by observing: "Since you refused to meet, the matter is now before the courts. The court should be given an opportunity" to act on the NLRB's request for an injunction to "require you to meet with the committee selected by the IUE."

Grievance Pile-up Spurs Canadian Nickel Strike

Toronto, Ont.—All operations of the giant Intl. Nickel Co. in Sudbury, Ont., and Port Colborne, Ont., have been shut down by a walkout of 16,000 members of the Steelworkers.

The refusal to work resulted from a buildup of grievances and came as negotiators were seeking a new contract for about 14,500 workers represented by Local 6500 in Sudbury and 1,500 represented Local 6200 in the Port Colborne refinery.

The employes had rejected one company offer and authorized a strike when the firm increased the rising number of penalties for minor infractions it had been imposing in recent months.

Finally, when a shift boss ordered several Sudbury miners to the surface after they had opened lunch boxes before starting work—a practice of 20 years' standing—about 400 fellow-workers immediately walked out. In less than 24 hours all the firm's Sudbury operations were tied up. Port Colborne employes walked out a week later.

The union in bargaining for a new contract is seeking wage increases large enough to match rates equal to those paid for comparable work under USWA contracts in the United States, introduction of the cooperative wage study program and a supplementary unemployment benefit plan, improved pensions, vacations, welfare coverage, job training and safety protection, and higher bonus earnings.

In other parts of Canada the USWA:

- Scored an important breakthrough in the iron ore industry in Northeastern Quebec and Labrador by winning wage rates 15 to 26 cents an hour higher than for comparable jobs in the U.S.

Pacts End Strikes

New three-year agreements ended strikes by 1,800 employes of the Iron Ore Co. in Labrador City and Schefferville, Que., and 1,500 working for the Quebec Cartier Mining Co., Port Cartier and Gagon, Que.

- Made an advance in the long fight for some form of union security at Noranda Mines, Ltd., gold mining operations near Timmins, Ont., by negotiating a voluntary revocable checkoff of union dues. Noranda, which also agreed to 26 cents in wage increases in two installments during an 18-month contract, was the last Timmins area holdout against the checkoff.
- Also won the dues checkoff and wage increases ranging from 33 to 45 cents an hour in a new three-year agreement with Noranda's Geco copper subsidiary in Manitouwadge which introduced shift premiums of 5 and 10 cents.
- Scored another breakthrough in the base metals industry—an extended vacation plan—in a new pact between Local 5757 and the Sheritt-Gordon Mines, Lynn Lake, Man. Workers with five years of seniority will get three additional weeks every five years. Wages were hiked by 5 per cent with an additional 5 cents an hour for those paid $2.69 an hour or more.

International Secretariat Elects Teachers' Officials

Chicago—Election of two U.S. union members to posts with the Intl. Federation of Free Teachers' Unions was anounced here by the American Federation of Teachers. AFT Vice Pres. James O'Meara was elected an IFFTU vice president. AFT Legislative Rep. Carl J. Megel was elected to the executive council.

Factory Hirings Show June Rise

Factory hirings and recalls in June rose slightly more than seasonally to 65 per 1,000 workers, while layoffs were unchanged at 9 per 1,000, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Both were at their most favorable levels since the end of the Korean fighting and reflect a strong employment situation, the BLS said. The quit rate dropped from 25 to 24 per 1,000 workers between May and June, and was at the low point for the year.

Hirings and recalls were greater than seasonal in primary metals, machinery, fabricated metals, rubber and textiles. Layoffs were 3 per 1,000 workers or less in ordnance, primary metals, machinery, instruments and petroleum.

65 Unionists to Train As Poverty Fighters

The Office of Economic Opportunity has approved a grant of $51,734 to Pennsylvania State University to train 65 selected union officials as neighborhood leaders in community action programs.

The project was developed by the university's Dept. of Labor Education and the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO. The participants will be selected from among labor leaders who have shown competence in community leadership, and will include volunteer chairmen of central body community service committees and officers of unions in low-wage industries.

The Dept. of Labor Education will conduct a one-week residential and training institute on the campus at State College, and will cooperate with the State AFL-CIO in recruiting the trainees.

The program will be developed with the aid of an advisory committee which will include representatives of labor bodies within the state and of the National AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver, in a letter to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, expressed himself as "very pleased" at the AFL-CIO interest in the program. The Pennsylvania program, with a comparable one at the University of West Virginia, are part of "an OEO-AFL-CIO effort to aid the poor in all major Appalachian states," he added.

"These and other programs indicate a movement in AFL-CIO beyond the invaluable political and legislative support it has always given progressive programs," Shriver said.

"This further step is taking some responsibility for the actual operation of programs you fought to establish. This kind of labor-government partnership holds greater promise for the solution of basic problems than either the Administration or the AFL-CIO would have alone."

UAW Wins Vote At Philco Plant

Lawndale, Calif. — Representation rights at a new electronics plant here were won by the Auto Workers in a National Labor Relations Board election, 258-245. The victory at the Ford Philco Aeronutronics plant will stimulate organizing activities at other company facilities, the UAW said.

Dir. William L. Gilbert of the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee hailed the work of the UAW and in-plant committees in the face of "tough opposition."

The Profits Boom

SECOND-QUARTER reports on corporation profits reveal the continued booming surge that business generally is enjoying. And reports on unit labor costs, on the ratio of prices to unit labor costs and on the steady upward creep of consumer prices reveal other facts about the economic situation.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics report for June called attention to the impact of rising prices on the purchasing power of workers.

There was no decrease from May to June in the number of dollars—"take-home" pay—available for spending by the average factory worker, after deductions for income taxes, social security contributions and other things had been made.

The same number of dollars, however, didn't buy as much.

"Real" spendable earnings, representing actual purchasing power, dropped by 25 cents a week.

The profit situation is very different.

As AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger points out, in connection with a story on profits in the news columns of the AFL-CIO News, the indicated figures are that in the first six months of the current year profits zoomed 11 percent or more above 1965 levels and dividend payments to stockholders rose 14 percent.

"This is on top of a profit rise of 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after taxes between 1960 and 1965," he comments.

The increase for wages, salaries and fringe benefits was only 33 percent for the comparable five years and the increase for the first six months of this year only 9 percent, he added.

THE PUBLIC would never know it from newspaper scare talk about the "inflationary" threat that might be created by increased wages, but that isn't the "inflation" we've got, if any. "If there is inflation in the United States, it is profit inflation," says Goldfinger. "The cost of labor per unit of production has barely moved."

An analysis of profits by the authoritative business magazine, Business Week, confirms this on the basis of Census Bureau figures.

Taking 1957-59 as the base period of 100, the unit labor cost index in June of 1965 was 99 and in June of this year was 99.3 percent.

Looking at what Business Week calls the "important" statistic of the ratio of prices of things produced to unit labor costs, the upward trend is in prices. The price-unit labor ratio was 103.9 percent in June of 1965, 106 percent in December and 106.4 percent in June of 1966. "Unit prices have been rising faster than unit labor costs," observes Business Week.

In this kind of situation, business inevitably begins to worry lest Congress see what is happening and thinks about raising corporate taxes and unions see what is happening and ask wage hikes.

These worries are cropping up, reports the magazine. But even the business prognosticators acknowledge that the profits picture for the rest of 1966 looks as rosy for the second half as the realities of higher profits for the first half.

At least we are not hearing much these days from business spokesmen about an alleged "profits squeeze," a phrase they dropped on every possible occasion only a few years ago.

"If there is inflation in the United States, it is profit inflation," to quote Goldfinger again—and the figures prove it.

Senator Nelson Assails Haste To 'Pass a Law' Ending Strike

Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) consistently refused in the Senate Labor Committee to support any of the resolutions offered to force airline mechanics back to work on five struck airlines in the absence of an acceptable new contract. On Aug. 3 he took the Senate floor to oppose the pending Clark proposal, reported by the committee, to "authorize" the President to order the strikers back to work. Excerpts from his speech follow:

I HAVE PARTICIPATED from the beginning in the deliberations of the Labor Committee on the intricate issues of the dispute and the broad ramifications of congressional intervention.

I am mindful of the fact that the whole American power structure and opinion leadership is almost unanimous in its insistence that Congress "pass a law."

Nevertheless, I am unable to support this measure. I think the price we will pay for the damage to our collective bargaining system will be far greater than any temporary gain from a politically forced settlement at this juncture.

This is a dramatic dispute. It has caught public attention. It has inconvenienced many people and it has caused many others to suffer economic hardship. This is certainly a matter of genuine concern and we deplore it. Yet put in perspective the struck airlines account for 3.6 percent of the total intercity passenger miles traveled via the nation's transportation system and about one-twentieth of 1 percent of the total freight movements. Part of this 3.6 percent is being carried now by other airlines, buses, trains and automobiles. The secretary of labor testified last week and on Monday [Aug. 1] of this week that there was not a national crisis in our transportation system.

This is not to say that there is not great public inconvenience and frustration as well as economic damage.

If strikes of this magnitude demand governmental interventions at this stage, where then do we draw the line and what are the implications for the whole system of free collective bargaining? This dispute has not run its full natural course; the opportunities for a negotiated settlement have not been exhausted. When the employes voted down the settlement agreed to by their national leadership they acted as free men expressing their honest conviction that the settlement was not fair.

Honorable men may differ on the question of whether or not it was fair "under all the circumstances"—i.e., the status of the economy, the problem of inflation and many other peripheral implications unrelated to the question of whether he is getting paid a fair return for his labor. If there were no Viet Nam and if the economy were not running too hot already, the merits of the employe's position would be viewed more objectively and fairly than it has been.

I oppose congressional intervention now because, as I indicated, the possibilities of settlement have not been exhausted.

At our Monday [Aug. 1] hearing and executive session, I urged a further exploration of settlement possibilities and an early report to the Labor Committee. The main reasons for rejection of the agreement by the employes should be explored and negotiations to resolve the problem should be further pursued. If the cost of resolution is not reasonable or the parties come to a stalemate, then they should report to the committee. Congress may then act in its discretion.

AFTER DAYS OF INTENSIVE HEARINGS and committee discussions, I cannot avoid the conclusion that the heart of the problem is not really the transportation interruption, or the genuine merits of the contract dispute but rather the much broader questions of inflation, wage-price guidelines and other contract disputes that will follow this one. This strike is simply the victim of other broad policy considerations.

The hard reality is that we are engaged in a major war and are now experiencing the inflationary pressures, dislocations and inequities that logically follow. This is the first time any country has been rich enough to attempt the production of a major war out of one pocket and a Great Society out of the other.

The result of it all is that prices are going up, profits are soaring to new heights and the rising cost of living is biting deeply into real wages and fixed incomes. Wage guidelines have worked with considerable effectiveness but price guidelines have all too often been only an invitation to raise prices to enhance profits. Examples of shameless profiteering throughout the economy are multitudinous. I think it cannot be expected that one portion of our nation will stand by to sacrifice while another profiteers.

Effective wage, price and profit measures that spread the burden equally will have to be adopted for the duration of this problem if we are to avoid a major crisis in the foreseeable future.

Morgan Says:

California State Official Links Right Wing, Religious Bigots

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

ABOUT A YEAR AGO a working California politician named Alan Cranston made a speech about the dangers of right-wing extremists. The public reaction was extraordinary. He was deluged with mail, telegrams, phone calls and literature. He says he didn't make a precise count but he encountered a "great deal" of sentiment both for and against his views.

Morgan

Among the replies of the antis he and his staff picked up a thread they had not been more than vaguely aware of before: intertwined strands of racial hatred and religious prejudice. They decided to research the situation further, especially as it involved the John Birch Society, because the correspondence mentioned it more consistently than other group, and propaganda from it or about it persistently reflected these collateral characteristics of a sinister twist on religion and race.

Cranston, running for reelection as state controller, did an unusual thing for a public official. He deliberately and publicly denounced the radical right in general and the Birch Society and its founder, Robert Welch, in particular.

Cranston is the man who was defeated in the Democratic primary in 1964 by ex-White House News Sec. Pierre Salinger for nomination to the U.S. Senate seat of the late Clair Engle. But despite the Johnson landslide, Salinger was beaten by a conservative Republican and political novice, the former Hollywood luminary, George Murphy, with vigorous and enthusiastic right-wing support. Cranston, a liberal Democrat, apparently still has higher political ambitions than the unglamorous but important controllership.

But an open challenge to the radical right, which may be stronger in California than in any other state with the possible exception of Texas, is hardly the most cautious political strategy, for either short- or long-term objectives. In Sacramento, Cranston released a 26-page "white paper" branding the John Birch Society as anti-Jewish, anti-Catholic, anti-Negro and a "seed-bed of neo-fascism."

Asked what was behind his decision and his timing, Cranston replied that he thought it was important to reveal his accumulated evidence. He said that while Welch's dictatorial methods and the authoritarian atmosphere of secrecy in which his society was run were well known, he was not aware that anybody had emphasized before its disturbing parallel manifestations of racial and religious hatred. He doubted that many members of the society themselves were aware of these accents. He said he had no quarrel with the Birch group's "stated aim of anti-communism." But he added his research showed a consistent cross-fertilization of views, propaganda and charges between the society and out-and-out hate groups.

"If anyone believes that our nation is in the grip of a monstrous Communist conspiracy," Cranston said, ". . . it is a small step further to imagine Jews, Negroes, Catholics or what-have-you behind the conspiracy.

"THE ONLY significant difference between so-called 'harmless' groups such as Gerald L. K. Smith's Christian Nationalist Crusade is that Welch publicly blames everything he finds evil in the world on the Communists while Smith . . . publicly blames it on Communist Jews. On virtually all else, from fluoridation to Eisenhower, they agree."

Other points in the Cranston paper: a recent University of California survey reveals that about one-third of the U.S. populace is markedly anti-Semitic. He suggests hostility toward Negroes may be greater. He implies such hatreds are a background to the Birch Society's "astonishing growth" to nearly 100,000 members, with plans to spend $12 million this year. The report claims "abundant evidence" of a "dual membership in the Birch Society and white supremacy groups . . . especially in the South."

Cranston insisted his paper was not connected with Gov. Edmund D. (Pat) Brown's re-election campaign or the strategy to link Brown's Republican opponent, ex-actor Ronald Reagan, with the radical right.

Cranston said, at a reporter's suggestion, that he would send Reagan a copy of his research. It makes interesting reading.

Bargaining Unity Called Key To GE, Westinghouse Gains

SOLID UNITY among electrical industry unions in approaching new contract goals will end the long-standing employer practice of playing one union off against another, a top officer of one of the unions has predicted.

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, an AFL-CIO vice president, said that the eight unions bargaining with General Electric and Westinghouse have "recognized that the only way they can overcome the difficulties they have in this industry is by joining together" in a cooperative effort.

"We don't intend to waver," Keenan declared, despite solid employer opposition. The union group's determination "is quite a shock to the corporations that we have to bargain with," who thought "we could never get this kind of unity." His statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, a weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual radio network.

Noting the up-coming 75th anniversary of the IBEW, Keenan explained that the union's newly-established Founders' Scholarship program, named in honor of the union's early officers, will enable members "who have served their apprenticeships and have worked at the trade for one year" to study electrical engineering at a college of their choice.

"WE HAVE a great number of members who have gone through an apprentice program after they had finished high school," he said, pointing out that "many of these fellows stay in the industry" and "some of them go to management." Such a scholarship program also "will do the industry some good," he said, in that "many of these people will pass on to management with some knowledge of a trade union and how it functions."

The IBEW's Founders' Scholarships are among the most recent additions to the more than $1.5 million in college scholarships offered each year by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates.

Reporters questioning Keenan on the AFL-CIO produced program were Alan Adams of Business Week magazine and Duane Emme of Labor newspaper.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THERE ISN'T anything in the northern and western primary elections thus far to justify an over-hasty conclusion that the Goldwaterites are making an overwhelming comeback in the Republican Party. Some Goldwater victories have occurred, but they are spotty. There is considerable evidence that a political revolution is brewing in one section—the South—and that the beneficiaries may be Goldwater-type Republicans.

Gov. Robert E. Smylie of Idaho suffered a shattering defeat in the Aug. 2 GOP primary, and his victorious opponent, State Sen. Donald W. Samuelson, is an unchallengeable conservative who had right-wing backing.

A fever chart of Idaho Republican voters would be required, however, to pin down the reasons for what happened. Smylie was seeking an unprecedented fourth term as governor; the tradition in sparsely populated mountain states, as it was on the prairies in Abraham Lincoln's day, is to "pass the jobs around." Smylie, as a responsible state executive, felt compelled to sponsor a state sales tax, and the proposal is sufficiently unpopular so that it is going to referendum on the November ballot.

Smylie would undoubtedly have preferred to run this year for nomination to the U. S. Senate. But he himself appointed the Republican incumbent, Sen. Len B. Jordan, to fill a vacancy in 1962, and the situation was awkward.

He took his pitcher to the well once too often in seeking another term as governor after 12 years in the office. He had the burden of the normal animosities and abrasions arising from long exposure in public office. And then—besides—he suffered the right-wing hatred.

Smylie's defeat is being coupled in the news stories with Ronald Reagan's recent victory in the California Republican primary for governor. The Goldwater wing of the GOP, it is suggested, has won two contests out of two.

But the Republican candidate for the Senate in Oregon, Gov. Mark O. Hatfield, is not a Goldwater man. Neither is Gov. George Romney of Michigan, running for a third term that he hopes will lead to the GOP presidential nomination in 1968. Neither is Gov. Rockefeller of New York.

Two Goldwater supporters ran for Republican nomination in Michigan congressional districts. They lost.

THE SOUTH is another matter: the whole 11-state area of the Old Confederacy is in political convulsion. Republicans are quite genuinely on the march to power in what was once a one-party Democratic oligarchy—and they are Goldwater Republicans.

Wherever a Democratic candidate can be labeled as supporting Pres. Johnson, or as having supported the late Pres. Kennedy, or as taking a liberal and modern-minded approach to public issues, he may find himself facing a hard GOP challenge.

Thus, in Georgia, the Republican candidate for governor is Rep. Howard H. Calloway, elected just two years ago in the Goldwater surge. The prospective Democratic nominee is former Gov. Ellis Arnall, whose record is liberal, and Calloway's chances are considered enhanced by that fact.

In Florida, Mayor Robert King High of Miami defeated Gov. Haydon Burns for the Democratic nomination for the statehouse and Burns has refused to endorse him for election. The Republican nominee, Claude R. Kirk, Jr., says he wants Goldwater and former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon to help campaign for him. He calls High "the Kennedys' candidate."

Ironically, two Goldwater veterans in Alabama—Rep. James D. Martin and John Grenier, who are running for governor and the Senate, respectively—find themselves robbed of any such campaign material. Gov. George Wallace is as hostile to Pres. Johnson and "the Kennedys", publicly, as anyone could be, and he got his wife, Mrs. Lurleen Wallace, nominated for governor.

ELECTRICAL INDUSTRY unions are approaching new contract goals with a unity that spells the end of the employer practice of playing one union against another, Sec. Joseph D. Keenan (center) of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers said as he was interviewed by Alan Adams (left) of Business Week magazine and Duane Emme of Labor newspaper on the AFL-CIO-produced public service program Labor News Conference, aired weekly over the Mutual radio network.

Area Jobless Report Shows Strong Gains

Four major manpower centers, long afflicted with chronic unemployment, have shown a job pickup that removes them from the list of areas with substantial unemployment, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The department's survey of the nation's 150 major job centers showed a total of 13 in May with unemployment of 6 percent or higher. This compared to 17 in March and 22 in May 1965.

The Charleston, W. Va., and Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton, Pa., areas were removed from the substantial unemployment list for the first time since areas were so classified 11 years ago, the Labor Dept. said.

The Huntington-Ashland, W. Va., and Duluth-Superior, Minn.-Wis., areas were taken off the 6 percent or more jobless list for the first time in eight years.

The job improvement in these four areas caused them to be reclassified in the group with 3 to 5.9 percent jobless.

Five other major centers showed job gains which put them into the 1.5 to 2.9 percent jobless group. These were Albany-Schenectady-Troy, N. Y.; Baltimore, Md.; South Bend, Ind.; Pittsburgh, Pa., and Seattle, Wash. One area — Baton Rouge, La.—moved in the opposite direction, being shifted into the 3 to 5.9 percent group, the report said.

The Labor Dept. said 59 major areas are now in the low unemployment category—1.5 to 2.9 percent jobless—the highest total since the area list was started. About 40 percent of the workforce in the 150 areas is in these 59 areas.

FIRST ISSUE of Labor's Weekly Digest is given by Chairman George Riveire of the Newspaper Guild's striking Bureau of National Affairs unit to Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks. The Digest offers an alternative to BNA's Daily Labor Report and other services for the duration of the strike in which union security is the main issue. RCIA is one of numerous unions which have canceled BNA services until a fair settlement is reached.

Good Reception Given Strikers' Labor Digest

Newspaper Guild members on strike against the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., reported an encouraging reception for the first issue of Labor's Weekly Digest.

Some of the strikers took time out to produce the Digest, which will for the duration of the strike provide a summary of news developments for and about labor as an alternative to the struck BNA services.

The Guild earlier had reported a strong response to its appeal to other unions to cancel their subscriptions to BNA services, produced by strikebreakers and supervisors since the unit walked out May 9. Some 5,000 subscribers to the new Digest were urged to send donations to the strike fund in lieu of subscription charges.

Meanwhile, the BNA strikers, a unit of the Washington-Baltimore Guild, continued their battle for a better contract—on the picket line and in legal proceedings:

- Unit members voted unanimously against a company proposal for a return to work without meaningful union security but with the discharge and transfer of several strikers.

The strikers also urged the company to resume negotiations under the auspices of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and reiterated their desire for an "equitable and non-discriminatory settlement."

- A court hearing was scheduled Aug. 17 for a BNA guard accused of knifing Guildsman James Mitchell in a picket-line scuffle. The guard is charged with assault with a dangerous weapon. Mitchell was treated for face cuts at a nearby hospital and returned to duty in charge of Guild strike headquarters.
- Guild legal counsel argued orally Aug. 4 that the National Labor Relations Board should issue a complaint charging BNA management with refusal to bargain. An NLRB aide had previously refused to issue the complaint.

Efforts Urged to Spur Union Use of Libraries

New York—Union officials would make better use of libraries if librarians tried harder to show how the facilities could be of direct benefit to them, two union educators made clear at a meeting here.

The advice was given by Education Dir. John Dillon of Auto Workers Region 9A and Education Dir. Carl Schlesinger of New York Typographical Union Local 6 at a meeting of the Joint Committee on Library Service to Labor Groups of the American Library Association.

It was offered during a panel discussion of the doctoral thesis of Prof. Dorothy Bendix of the Graduate School of Library Science at Drexel Institute, which attempted to explore the use unions make of educational and informational resources with special reference to group and reference services.

On the panel were Schlesinger, Dillon, Prof. Bendix, Mrs. Roberta McBride, librarian of the Labor History Archives at Wayne State Univeristy, and Lillian Tudiver, chief of the Brooklyn Public Library's Social Science Division.

The panelists agreed that unions do not use library services to the extent of other community groups.

In casting about for the reasons, Schlesinger suggested that "polite letters from generally middle-class oriented librarians" to local union leaders might not go unanswered if the librarians realized that "each union is different not only in its structure but in its outlook."

Bibliographies Suggested

He also said that sending short reviews of new labor books to a random list of union officials might pay off in increased interest. He pointed out the value of a library's offering to provide a bibliography of books and articles about a specific union or trade.

Dillon proposed that librarians visit union leaders and describe the available facilities and services, and that they make a special effort to offer practical services to unionists on a continuing basis.

During discussions, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin said librarians could give valuable aid by offering assistance in starting union educational programs.

Albert K. Herling of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers urged librarians to buy more labor works and labor newspapers to assure students and others of access to both sides of labor disputes.

The librarians also visited the Firestone Library at Princeton University and went to the Ladies' Garment Workers summer retreat at Unity House, Pa., where ILGWU Assistant Pres. Gus Tyler spoke on the use of libraries by unions.

Pulp-Sulphite Unit Turns Back Raid

Rittman, O.—The Pulp-Sulphite Workers by a 555-361 vote repulsed an attempt by the Teamsters to take over bargaining rights at the Packaging Corp. of America, which the AFL-CIO affiliate organized 32 years ago.

Only five workers voted for no union. Russell Schroeder, Ted Dethloff and Al Shibley from the AFL-CIO regional office in Cleveland—veterans of the Glass Bottle Blowers successful fight two months ago against a Teamsters' raid at the Johns-Manville Co., Defiance, O.—assisted a Pulp-Sulphite team headed by Intl. Rep. Jack Stone.

The Teamsters were expelled by the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of control by corrupt elements.

$915,000 in Backpay Collected in New York

Albany, N.Y.—The state Labor Dept. compelled more than 10,000 employers to pay $915,000 to nearly 15,000 workers in the first half of 1966, Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) reported. The money was for minimum wage underpayments and workers' claims for unpaid wages.

Prices, Productivity Cited:

Higher Wage Goals Set by News Guild

Describing a $270 weekly wage goal adopted only a year ago as already "obsolete" because of rising prices and productivity, the Newspaper Guild's annual convention raised the goal to $292.

The $22 increase in the goal for key newspaper job classifications, the convention pointed out in a unanimously approved report, is necessary to provide the 1966 equivalent of a $100 wage goal adopted 20 years ago.

The convention at the same time increased its wage goal for all adult jobs from $135 to $146.

The Guild said the 3.2 percent wage-increase guideline proposed by the President's Council of Economic Advisers "is particularly unrealistic in the news industry "where profits have ranged from 19 to 23 percent of revenue before taxes compared with the average 9.5 percent of revenue before taxes prevailing in other industry."

The convention heard Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.), a former Chicago Guild member, call for "flexibility" in cases where profits are so high that the 3.2-percent formula can be exceeded without increasing prices.

Pucinski urged the Guild and other unions to conduct an educational drive among young people entering the labor market to counteract the propaganda of "right-to-work" advocates and other anti-labor forces.

Among others to address the convention briefly were Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

The convention urged increased efforts to abolish wage discrimination against newspaper women and to obtain automation and jurisdiction protection, job security, improved pensions and added leisure time. It called for increased interunion co-operation to help achieve these goals.

In other actions, the convention:

- Voted full support to the Canadian Labor Congress's current campaign to eliminate the use of anti-picketing injunctions in strikes and called for the adoption of both state and federal legislation to prohibit the use of professional strikebreakers.
- Urged revision of state and provincial laws that impose a penalty period before workers idled by strikes and lockouts can receive unemployment compensation and called on the Senate to resist any weakening of proposed legislation to strengthen unemployment compensation laws.
- Voiced wholehearted support of the Washington-Baltimore Guild strike against the Bureau of National Affairs, called on the federal government to "stop subsidizing" strikebreakers by continuing subscriptions to BNA publications, and urged BNA management to "come to its senses and offer conditions which will permit a quick and honorable end" to the strike.
- Called on Guild locals to give full support to the boycott of the Kingsport (Tenn.) Press by five printing trades unions by demanding that local boards of education refrain from buying Kingsport-produced textbooks.
- Urged adoption of "the strongest possible 1966 Civil Rights Bill" and opposed exemption of small apartment houses and of real estate brokers.
- Condemned a growing trend toward newspaper use of "canned editorials" supplied by special-interest organizations as "an abdication of editorial responsibility" and "a violation of a public trust."

Merger Curbs Proposed

Expanding a recommendation of previous conventions, the Guild urged legislation to require news magazines as well as newspapers to provide 90 days' notice to both their employes and the Justice Dept. of any contemplated merger or suspension.

If Justice Dept. investigation disclosed the publication was in danger of going out of business, the law would require that nonmonopoly purchasers be given an opportunity to buy the publication at its fair market value before it could be sold or merged with a competitor at any price.

The convention went on record in favor of home rule for the District of Columbia, declaring that "for 92 years the voteless, voiceless residents of the District have been the cracked glass in this supposed showcase of democracy."

And it called for legislation to extend provisions of the National Labor Relations Act to the agricultural worker to make him "a first-class citizen at the collective-bargaining table."

Hugh Harrison, president of the Seattle-Tacoma Guild, was elected without opposition to fill a vacancy as vice president from the Guild's West Coast and Rocky Mountain region.

'Put Jobs on the Line':

Top Educator Spurs Fight for Integration

The nation's top educator has called on school administrators to take the lead in fighting for quality integrated education, even if it costs them their jobs.

Harold Howe II, the U.S. Commissioner of Education, talked bluntly and in tough terms to a School Administrators' Conference sponsored by the National Urban League and Columbia University's Teachers College.

Howe's speech was reprinted in the August issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist under the title, "Test for Schoolmen: Action on Integration."

Howe commended the educators for bringing new ideas and techniques into the school systems but, he added, very little has been accomplished in moving towards integration.

"The load we must carry," he declared, "is that of irritating a fair percentage of our white constituents—of embarrassing some governors and mayors, of alarming some newspaper publishers and of enraging suburban taxpayers who, in proportion to their means, are not paying as much for their good schools as paupers in the cities are paying for their bad ones.

"And all this means that, finally and most grievously, we must run the risk of being invited to resign. Unless all of us are willing to put our jobs and our integrity on the line, we should admit that American educators are no longer prepared to be the prime movers in American education."

Howe observed that the nation's schools remains almost as segregated today as they were when the Supreme Court issued its desegregation decision in 1954. An entire sub-generation of Negro and white youngsters who started school that year has graduated from high school—most of them without any classroom experience with the other race, he said.

Howe said that school officials have the advantage of both authority and knowledge, but have lacked a "productive commitment" on integration. He commended educators for introducing new ideas into schools and added:

"But to win public support for such advances as team teaching, modern curriculum, language laboratories, ungraded classrooms, closed-circuit television and computerized instruction is not enough. We must at the same time desegregate the schools."

Howe told the educators that "a revolution is brewing under our feet and it is largely up to the schools to determine whether the energies of that revolution can be converted into a new and vigorous source of American progress or whether the explosion will rip this nation into two societies."

It is now much less dangerous to make a mistake than to do nothing, he added.

Howe reviewed the familiar plans for desegregating school systems: faculty and student exchanges; busing; educational parks with as many as 20,000 students; supplementary centers for special education.

U.S. Aid Analyzed

He listed the federal programs which have help towards integration. He said grants and training institutes have been provided under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to help train teachers and other school personnel in handling desegregation problems.

The federal aid to education program enacted in 1965, Howe added, provided nearly $1 billion especially aimed at benefiting the 5.5 million school children from families with an annual income of less than $2,000 a year.

In addition, Howe continued, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1965 gave a special thrust to all federal programs where discrimination is involved. The simple rationale, he said, is "no desegregation, no federal money."

Yet, Howe said, this rationale in practice is both frustrating and complex. The Office of Education finds this so both with its desegregation guidelines in the South and in the problem of de facto school segregation in the North and West.

The task of educators, he said, is "to make the schools of the central city such good schools that they attract people rather than repel them" and to make each school "a cross section of the social and economic backgrounds of the metropolis."

"We are in the midst of a struggle for excellent education for every American youngster and we must use every likely tool we can devise," Howe declared. "Local school administrators must consider such means as redrawing school district boundaries and consolidating with neighboring districts for educational purposes, even though political boundaries may remain unchanged. We cannot wait for mayors and city councils to do the work they hired us to do. And sometimes we must do work they don't want us to do."

Yardmasters Press Rail Wage Drive

Chicago—Members of the Railroad Yardmasters who have served wage notices on many of the country's major carriers were assured full support by delegates to the union's 29th convention here.

Pres. Ralph H. Wachowiak reported that talks have been started on the union's demand for a 20 percent general wage hike, plus further increases based on seniority, and for more liberal vacations. Negotiations, he predicted, eventually will be handled on a national basis.

Wachowiak was elected without opposition as the union wound up its convention after making a number of minor changes in the constitution and bylaws. He had been serving as president since the death of the late M. G. Schoch in March 1965.

Sec.-Treas. Waldo A. Snyder was re-elected, and the following were re-elected vice presidents and members of the executive board: R. M. Semple, vice chairman; C. E. Falconer, Reinhold Schmidt and F. R. Griffin, Jr.. E. P. Wine was re-elected vice president and elected for the first time to the executive board.

Other vice presidents re-elected included F. W. Baker, C. A. Calhoun, Jr., I. W. Wirrin, N. L. Eberts, A. T. Otto, Jr., C. W. Rademacher and V. E. Wilmes. Newly elected vice presidents were V. R. Adkins, J. R. Culver, J. E. Jones, G. E. Sweeney and E. M. Gray, Jr.

Louis Levine Named N. Y. Labor Dept. Aide

New York—Louis L. Levine, community services and rehabilitation director for the New York City Central Labor Council, has been appointed a deputy industrial commissioner in the State Labor Dept.

KENTUCKY AFL-CIO is promoting the use of this front end license plate for the autos of union members to remind unorganized workers that it pays to join the family of organized labor. State law requires the use of but one official plate, placed at the rear of the car.

House Nears Final Tests On Rights Bill

essary to eventual passage of the bill.

Apparently on the theory that a superficially stringent measure would be easier to defeat than a clearly moderate one, most Republicans and southern Democrats joined to attack the amendment.

It was approved on a teller vote by a 180-179 count, with the decisive vote cast to break a tie by Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), acting as chairman of the House in Committee of the Whole.

A second test was scheduled after another full day of confused debate when the House agreed to take up on Aug. 5 an amendment by Rep. Arch A. Moore (R-W. Va.) to kill the housing section entirely.

A handful of liberal Democrats, ignoring leadership warnings, refused to vote for the Mathias amendment. But the bulk of the opposition came from Democratic and Republican opponents of the anti-discrimination ban. Only about 20 GOP members supported Mathias.

Some progress was registered on sections of the bill dealing with issues other than housing, such as new safeguards against discrimination in the selection of federal and state juries and stronger guarantees of the constitutional rights of citizens against denial through force or intimidation.

The bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee also would authorize the Justice Dept. to file suits to compel the desegregation of schools and other public facilities without waiting for a written complaint from some citizen.

The housing section fell under heavy attack, however, despite endorsement of the Judiciary Committee modifications and the Mathias amendment by the groups working in the Leadership Conference for Civil Rights as well as by Celler and McCulloch.

House passage of the bill would send it to the Senate, where Republican Floor Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has announced he is opposed to any prohibition on housing discrimination and that he would not "resist" a Southern filibuster designed to halt passage of a bill containing any such provision.

Thomas Murtha Dies, Stage Union Leader

Queens Village, N. Y.—Intl. Rep. Thomas Murtha of the Theatrical Stage Employes died at the Will Rogers Memorial Hospital, Saranac Lake, N. Y., after an illness of several months.

For many years he was business manager of Brooklyn Stage Employes Local 4 and at the time of his death was also president of the union's District 10, composed of New York State locals.

South Atlantic Region Leads U.S. Job Gains

Non-farm employment in the U.S. rose by 11.5 percent between 1960 and 1965 and the South Atlantic led all regions with a sharp 18 percent increase, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The performance of the nation's regions, states and cities is detailed in an updated publication titled "Employment and Earnings Statistics for States and Areas, 1939-65." It is the fourth in a Bureau of Labor Statistics series.

Among the states, Nevada led the way with a 50 percent jump in nonfarm employment over the five-year period.

Other states recording sizable job gains were Alaska and Arkansas, with 24 percent each, Florida with 23 percent and Arizona with 20 percent.

In earnings, the factory production worker has had a gain of 20 percent since 1960. Average weekly earnings in 1965 ranged from $75 in Mississippi, Arkansas and North Carolina to $144 in Michigan and $159 in Alaska, the report showed.

The variations in earnings between North and South reflect differences in types of manufacturing —auto, aircraft and machinery in the North and textiles and other soft goods in the South—the report observes.

Widespread differences in earnings also exist between metropolitan areas, even within the same state, the report notes.

In Pennsylvania, factory workers in Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton averaged $73 a week last year while workers in Pittsburgh earned an average of $128.

The highest metropolitan area earnings in 1965, the report adds, were shown by workers in Flint, Mich., at $166.26. The lowest earnings were those in Fall River, Mass., at $69.38.

The Labor Dept. offers the 772-page report as a basic tool for community and plant location planners, market researchers, trade groups and regional economic analysts. Union researchers also could put it to good use. The report, priced at $4.25, is available from BLS regional offices or the Supt. of Documents, Government Printing Office, Wash., D.C.

Annual Drive Launched For Labor Day Safety

The 8th annual Labor Day Safety Campaign co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health and the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council has been launched with its slogan "Whatever you do, do it safely over the Labor Day weekend."

Material sent international and national unions and state and local central bodies includes tips for safe driving, safety in swimming, camping and other recreational activities, and safety in the home.

The hints can "help make labor's own holiday weekend a safe and happy one," Robert M. Farrell, chairman of the Labor Conference and safety director of Operating Engineers Local 150, Chicago, said in an accompanying letter.

"Accidents cause pain and suffering," he pointed out, "and, oftentimes, a loss of income and excessive drain on health and welfare funds."

The tips include:

- Driving: Make a safety check of the car before leaving, wear seat belts, don't try to cover too much ground in too short a time, don't be so intent on the immediate that you ignore the road ahead, give plenty of room to other drivers, stop and pass carefully, give adequate warning when turning, and be extra cautious in case of rain.
- Recreation: Don't be overconfident in the water, make sure life preservers work, watch out for camp fires especially if the wind changes and if possible avoid carrying flammable liquids in a car—especially in a confined area like a trunk.
- At home: Clean up the yard to remove dangers like rocks, nails, glass, old lumber, etc., and check it for poison ivy, oak and sumac; make sure play equipment is strong enough to take rough play; keep a watch on swimming or wading pools; place the charcoal grill on level ground and never use it inside, dress properly for cooking, never use kerosene, gasoline or lighter fluid for a starter, and keep an extinguisher or water handy just in case.

Steps Asked to Curb Abuses in Packaging

Swift congressional action to curb packaging abuses that are causing serious problems for the nation's consumers was urged by the AFL-CIO in testimony prepared for presentation to the House Commerce Committee.

Federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged enactment of "truth-in-packaging" legislation to provide regulation of weights, measures and labels of household goods. He also asked a ban on deceptive packaging and misleading "savings" come-ons.

The AFL-CIO spokesman said the legislation is needed to cope with the "packaging revolution" which has put a "gloriously differentiated" array of 8,000 packages on the typical supermarket shelves, causing "a serious problem of confusion to the consumer" who seeks to buy knowledgeably and stay within the family budget.

Today's products are sold by the package rather than by the pound or ounce as was once the practice, Biemiller stated, with the result that a "comprehensive and rational system of weights and measures has virtually disappeared from the retail market place."

This has also opened the door to packaging abuses, he declared, such as the deceptively designed or shaped package. He noted that of the thousands of items available to the public, liquor is one of the few commodities required by law to be sold in specific quantities, such as pints, fifths and quarts.

Biemiller gave support to the bill that passed the Senate on June 9, and to a similar House measure, but urged additional safeguards be written into the legislation to curb deceptive shapes and sizes as well as to ban untruthful illustrations on packages. He also urged a flat prohibition of so-called "cents-off" advertising lures as being impossible for the customer to check and impractical for the store manager to verify as to their honesty.

He indicated a fear that the consumer's needs may lose out if procedures for setting up regulations by the secretary of health, education and welfare become bogged down by "excess baggage." Biemiller noted that the Senate-passed bill gives assurances to manufacturers and packagers that not only include the customary procedures of the Food, Drug & Cosmetics Act, but go far beyond.

In addition to the present "thorough procedure" which "often takes years to complete" the bill provides the manufacturer and packager with a circuitous route through voluntary standards procedures which unless eliminated "may seriously reduce the effectiveness of the law," he said.

The need for swift regulation to protect America's millions of consumers was clearly demonstrated, Biemiller declared, by recent experiences of shoppers from consumer organizations and university groups who conscientiously shopped for greatest quantity for the lowest price, yet failed to achieve that objective.

Confusion Proved Costly

The confusion encountered in relating costs to the weights and sizes of packages caused the test groups to make mistakes in nearly 50 percent of their purchases. The errors raised the costs of their purchases by nearly 10 percent, Biemiller reported.

Contributing to this failure, he said, are the abuses of label information, such as packages having illegible print or in white ink on yellow paper. Also, puzzlement over a single item available in such combinations as 6.5 ounces for 25 cents, 7.75 ounces for 29 cents, 13.25 ounces for 43 cents makes shopping a chaotic and costly experience, he testified.

Biemiller concluded his testimony by offering for committee study an exhibit of brand name items including the costs, sizes and "savings," that had tripped up shoppers from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research in Washington, Consumers Union in New York and Consumers Cooperatives in Berkeley, Calif.

A NEWLY-FILMED SEGMENT of the AFL-CIO documentary "When the Day's Work is Done" features an interview by narrator Dave Garroway (left) with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne. The half-hour film salute to union members and their service to their communities will be shown on 100 television stations during the Labor Day holiday period.

Rail Firemen Back Merger Plan

Cleveland, O. — The 29-member policy committee of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen has approved a proposal to create a new rail union by uniting with two other rail groups—the Railway Conductors and the Switchmen.

The committee said regrouping is necessary to stay on a level with "high financial empires" of rail management.

The Conductors took similar action earlier and the Switchmen will pass on it soon.

United Nations Urged to Act On 'Apartheid'

Brussels—The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has renewed its demand that the United Nations "take the most energetic steps" to free South West Africa from "the evils of apartheid to which they have been subjected by the Verwoerd government" of South Africa.

The demand was voiced by Gen. Sec. Omer Becu following the Intl. Court of Justice's rejection of the challenge of Ethiopia and Liberia to South Africa's administration of the territory under mandate of the former League of Nations. The court based its ruling on a finding that Ethiopia and Liberia, as individual members of the league, had not established their legal right to watch over the administration of South Africa.

The decision shifts the judgment, Becu declared, to the international community, of which the free trade union movement forms part. The UN must act, he said, in view of the "latest turn of events."

"The ICFTU cannot cease its fight for an end to a policy of apartheid for achievement of social justice and full political rights for the African people of Southern Africa," he said. "It is the duty of the UN to ensure that fundamental human rights enshrined in its charter and in the Declaration of Human Rights are respected and applied in South and South West Africa. We demand urgent action."

Williams Wins Easily; Smylie Out in Idaho

a challenge from a respected and moderately liberal House member, Rep. Robert Ellsworth.

The Democratic nominee for governor is Robert Docking, son of a former governor, who piled up an impressive vote in the party primary. J. Floyd Breeding, a former member of Congress, won the senatorial nomination and will face Pearson in November.

Despite Smylie's defeat in Idaho, Republican Sen. Len B. Jordan won nomination for a full term after serving previously by appointment. His Democratic opponent will be former Rep. Ralph R. Harding, who for the last two years has been an assistant secretary of the Air Force.

In Michigan, Williams will seek to unseat Sen. Robert P. Griffin, a co-sponsor of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act, in the November election. Griffin was appointed by Michigan's Gov. George Romney to fill the vacancy created by the death of Democratic Sen. Pat McNamara last April.

Support Pledged

Cavanagh promptly announced that he would give his full support to Williams, and the former governor pledged a hard-fighting campaign against Griffin.

"Let the word go out throughout the state," he said, "you ain't seen nothin' yet."

Romney won the Republican nomination without opposition for a third term as governor—a term stretched from two years to four years by a new state constitution. Democrats nominated their state chairman, Zoltan A. Ferency, also unopposed.

The size of the vote for Romney and Williams, although they are running for different offices, will be watched by political observers in November as a test of their pulling power.

Williams, unchallenged leader of the organization that gave Michigan an almost unbroken series of Democratic victories for a decade, must beat Griffin to launch a new career on the national scene. Romney has as much at stake because he must win, and by a commanding majority, if he is to maintain his present standing as a prime potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968.

In races for Congress in four states, including Missouri as well as Michigan, Idaho and Kansas, all incumbents won renomination in their own parties although many face close races in the November general election.

Two identifiable Republican conservatives, including former Rep. George Meader in Michigan's 2nd Congressional District, failed in their effort to win GOP nominations. Meader was beaten by Marvin L. Esch. Richard D. Kuhn, in the 19th District, lost out to George McDonald. Kuhn had the benefit of a $2,500 contribution left over from 1964 in the Citizens for Goldwater-Miller treasury.

Senate Urged to Keep Jobless Aid Bill Intact

The House-passed jobless compensation measure, which was amended in the Senate committee, made no provision for federal minimum standards which the states would be induced to meet.

The Senate committee reworked the bill to set up federal standards on the amount and duration of weekly benefits in all states and to create a federal guideline on eligibility requirements imposed on a jobless worker.

House Bill Revised

In addition, it revised the House-passed provisions for extended federal benefits to workers whose state eligibility is exhausted by providing that these extended benefits be financed wholly from federal funds.

Federal standards covered in the Senate Finance Committee bill include these:

- The individual minimum weekly benefit must be at least 50 percent of a jobless worker's average previous wage, and the statewide maximum compensation must be at least 50 percent of the statewide average wage.
- The duration of state compensation must be at least 26 weeks, payable to any worker with 20 weeks or more of employment in his base period.
- Compensation cannot be denied by a state because a jobless worker is undergoing an approved training program or because he lives in or files a claim from another state.

Extended federal benefits of 13 weeks for the long-term jobless, following the exhaustion of state compensation, would be financed by raising the wage base for unemployment taxes to $3,900, as the House version did but by making this increase effective in 1968 rather than 1969, and adding a further increase in the wage base to $4,800 instead of $4,200 in 1972.

The standards provided in the Senate committee bill would be required in all state unemployment compensation laws if the states were to continue to receive back the major portion of taxes for the system collected by the federal government from employers.

The House-passed bill was weakened by the Senate committee only in regard to coverage of workers now left unprotected. The House bill would have covered 3 million additional workers; the Senate committee reduced this to about 1.8 million.

Address List Denial Voids NLRB Vote

An employer's refusal to give the Auto Workers a list of workers' names and addresses is sufficient reason for setting aside a representation election and ordering a new vote, the National Labor Relations Board has decided in the first decision since the name-and-address rule was adopted last year.

The Crane Packing Co., Morton Grove, Ill., entered into a consent election last April but refused to provide the union with an election eligibility list. The UAW filed objections after losing and the NLRB regional director upheld the union position.

All five members of the labor board agreed with the director's finding, rejecting the employer's arguments that the board exceeded its powers and that even if the rule first applied in the Excelsior Underwear case was valid, the NLRB should not apply it at Crane because the union had various means of communicating with company employes.

The vote in the election 14 months ago was 188 for the union, 339 against, with 57 challenged ballots.

Meany Lashes Airlines Bill As Attack on Basic Liberty

Senate OKs Key Federal Jobless Aid

Federal standards on the amount and duration of unemployment compensation benefits, the first major change in the law in 31 years, have been voted by the Senate.

The Senate passed the measure 53 to 31 after beating back an attempt led by Sen. Thruston Morton (R-Ky.) to substitute a modified version of the House-passed bill, which made no provision for federal standards, by a vote of 51 to 36.

The Senate-approved measure now heads for a House-Senate conference to resolve differences. The House measure, passed earlier in the session, had been characterized by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in testimony before the Senate Labor Committee as "completely unsatisfactory . . . a mere token measure."

Of the nine rollcalls involved in the two-day debate on the Senate measure, the most critical came on adoption of a federal standard on the amount of jobless benefits. The standard was written into the measure on a vote of 45 to 36.

The bill passed by the Senate would set up these nationwide standards:

- Require all states to pay weekly unemployment compensation benefits of 50 percent of the average weekly wage received by a worker before he became jobless or a maximum 50 percent of the state's average weekly wage. The Administration's original bill, supported by

NEWSMEN LISTEN and cameras record as AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany gestures to make a point at Washington press conference on airlines strike. Meany expressed his "total opposition" to a federal law forcing 35,000 Machinists back to work, charging that it would be a blow to collective bargaining. There is no national emergency because of the strike; transportation is not paralyzed; the flow of defense materials and manpower has not been interrupted or delayed, he declared.

Meany Scores Use Of Force On Strikers

By Eugene A. Kelly

A vote by Congress to end a "legal, non-emergency strike" of airlines mechanics by a federal law forcing the men back to work would "deliver a crippling blow to the whole labor movement and, more than that, to the liberty of every American who works for wages," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany told a press conference, convened after the House Commerce Committee refused him permission to testify on a strike-ending Senate resolution, that the proposed law would be a "first step" toward nationalization or government seizure of other industries behind the cloak of the "national interest."

He agreed that the strike has caused inconvenience, but denied that this would justify a law forcing free men to work against their will for private, profit-making employers.

He urged congressmen not to "pass legislation that you will regret the rest of your lives."

In answer to reporters' questions, Meany said "I agree with Roy Siemiller—take away the promise of congressional help and they [the lines] will settle damn quick." P. L. (Roy) Siemiller is IAM president.

Meany's attack on the bill came as the House Commerce Committee ended brief hearings on the Senate-passed measure and began consideration of various portions.

Housing Bias Policy Approved:

'Milestone' Civil Rights Bill Faces Filibuster in Senate

The House approved a "milestone" civil rights measure establishing a national policy against housing discrimination and sent it to the Senate, where it faces a possible filibuster from the GOP-Southern Democratic coalition.

Final passage of the House bill after 12 days of intensive debate came by a vote of 259 to 157. But a series of close non-recorded teller votes on the housing section provided the real guides to the fight.

The bill contains provisions assuring non-discrimination in the selection of federal and state juries, broadening federal laws against acts of racial violence and permitting federal court injunctions against anticipated violence or intimidation.

But the provision that touched off the controversy in House debate was to bar racial discrimination in the sale or rental of housing. As finally adopted the bill covers primarily apartment houses and individual homes built or sold by commercial interests.

Present home owners, boarding houses and owner-occupied apartment houses with no more than three family units are exempt.

A victim of housing discrimination would be able either to go to court or take his complaint, under the bill, to a federal fair housing board that would have power to issue cease and desist orders against landlords, builders, real estate agents and financial institutions.

Pres. Johnson, hailing the measure as "an important new milestone," and urging prompt action by the Senate, expressed his regret that the housing provision "was not as comprehensive as that we proposed and sought." He indicated efforts would be made to restore the

Joblessness Still 3.9%, Mired at 8-Month Level

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment rate remained immovably in the 4 percent area in July as the non-farm job picture showed continued strength, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Edging down to 3.9 percent in July, the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate has fluctuated around 4 percent for eight months, stubbornly refusing to break towards "full" employment.

Convinced that "a considerably lower rate could be attained," Commissioner of Labor Statistics Arthur M. Ross disclosed the Labor Dept. is developing data on the 20 percent "worst-off" census tracts.

Whether measured by race, age group or sex, Ross explained, these "poverty tracts" have uniformly higher jobless rates than the non-poverty tracts.

Ross said the Census Bureau has been asked to include the criteria of unemployment and low labor force participation in its present standards for defining

Medicare Program Seen As 'Off to Good Start'

The medicare program is off to a "good start" and is working smoothly in its first month of operation, the advisory council on the new health care legislation reported to the President.

The Health Insurance Benefits Advisory Council, set up under the medicare program, is headed by Kermit Gordon, vice president of the Brookings Institution and former director of the Bureau of the Budget, and composed of physicians, hospital and insurance industry leaders and experts in the area of social insurance.

Gordon's letter to the President, released by the White House, noted the council's "satisfaction with the results of the intensive preparatory work which preceded the initiation of the medicare program and with the smoothness of the first month of operation."

No peacetime effort of the government, he said, "has ever presented larger or more complex administrative problems" and "these tasks were well per- poverty tracts. These are income, housing, educational level and lack of skill.

Some 12 million people—about half of them white and half Negro—live in these poverty tracts in cities over 250,000, he said

Poorest Least Employed

The 4 percent jobless rate means full employment exists for some groups and not for others, Ross said. It is full employment for the mature, experienced, well-trained or better-connected individuals in middle-class neighborhoods. The 4 percent national rate, however, obscures the high unemployment levels in the poverty tracts for Negroes, the under-educated, under-trained and inexperienced, Ross added.

The data being collected will provide the basis for policies and programs to zero in on unemployment problems.

Ross said it was evident from this nation's lower jobless rates in the past—the rate was 2.6 percent early in 1953—and from the experience of European nations that "a considerably lower rate can be attained" than the present 4 percent.

The Labor Dept. report for July showed total unemployment declining seasonally by 650,000 to 3.2 million. Compared to a year ago, unemployment was down by 400,000, with the entire net decline among those seeking full-time jobs.

The unemployed were made up of 1 million adult men, 870,000 adult women and 1.3 million teenagers.

The overall national jobless rate was 4.5 percent in July a year ago. It fell to 4.1 percent by December, dipped as low as 3.7 percent in February and April and then moved up to 4 percent in May and June.

The Negro jobless rate continued to run more than double the white race. The Negro rate was 7.9 percent in July, down from 8.9 percent a year earlier. The white rate was 3.4 percent in July, down six-tenths of 1 percent from July 1965.

The teen-age jobless rate continued high at 12.2 percent in July, compared to 13.4 percent a year ago.

Key Rate Stays Low

The jobless rate for married men—the key breadwinner group—remained low at 2 percent in July; a year ago it was 2.3 percent.

The blue collar jobless rate moved up for the third straight month, from 4 percent in April to 4.6 percent in July. The rise for this group, and for men 25 years and over, was linked by the Labor Dept. to the slowdown in auto production and the early model changeover.

On the employment side of the picture, the Labor Dept. said nonfarm payroll jobs showed an extra-seasonal gain.

At 63.8 million in July, non-farm payroll employment was up 3.1 million from a year earlier, the report said. Payroll jobs were down by 250,000 from June, but this decline was 150,000 less than expected.

The net improvement, said the report, was centered in miscellaneous services and government.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, therefore, non-farm payrolls showed a gain of 150,000 to 63.6 million. Manufacturing employment held steady at 19.1 million as a 70,000 job drop in autos was offset by gains elsewhere.

Over the year, factory employment contributed the largest gains—about 1.1 million jobs—to the gain in payroll employment. Job gains of about 500,000 were scored by trade and other services, while state and local overnments added 575,000 jobs.

In a separate report on teen-age summer employment, Ross said the figures indicated "very considerable success" in the programs and policies aimed at creating work during the vacation period.

Teen Jobs Up

Comparing the difference between the pre-vacation month of May and the vacation month of July showed a rise of 3.1 million in teen-age employment. Of the increase, 2.7 million were white youngsters and 400,000 were Negroes.

This represented a sizable jump in teen-age job gains when compared to the same May-July period in recent years: 2 million in 1963; 2.2 million in 1964; 2.7 million in 1965. The percentage of the Negro teen-age job gain was 10 percent in 1963, 9 percent in 1964, 16 percent in 1965 and 13 percent this year.

Over the past year, there was a gain of 920,000 teen-age jobs. Of these, 887,000 went to whites and 33,000 to Negroes.

The year before—July 1964 to July 1965—saw a gain of 963,000 teen-age jobs. Some 767,000 of those went to whites and 197,000 to Negroes. There was no explanation of the sharp fall-off this year in gains for Negroes.

Strengthened Safety Laws Backed in Ohio

Columbus, O.—Stronger and more centralized enforcement of Ohio's industrial safety laws has been called for by a study committee of the Legislative Service Commission.

Labor spokesmen, who testified at committee hearings, called that finding and others a forward step. They will renew efforts to get more improvements when the study group meets in September, they said.

Witnesses before the committee noted that, while Ohio has only 79 inspectors to protect the health and safety of workers, it has 109 game wardens to protect rabbits and birds.

The study group recommended that the now-scattered safety provisions of the law be consolidated; that enforcement laws be strengthened to protect workers against employers who "openly and flagrantly defy" safety regulations; that more inspectors be hired to meet the need.

Other recommendations: granting inspectors authority to require immediate compliance with safety laws when violations are found; using allocated funds to provide more aid for the Service Commission's studies.

During the hearings, the Ohio AFL-CIO presented witnesses who called for safety codes in industries where none exist, and for updating and better enforcement of existing codes.

Clam Fishermen Win Union Pact

Point Pleasant, N.J.—Gourmets can enjoy clams with a union label as the result of a first agreement between the National Maritime Union and the Snow Canning Co. covering the crews of the firm's clam boats.

The pact includes average wage increases of $20 per week the first year and $10 the second, institutes company contributions for vacations, insurance and welfare benefits, and generally improves working conditions. It became effective Aug. 1 and expires July 31, 1968.

The NMU agreed to establish a union hiring hall at Point Pleasant Beach to serve the crews of the company's fishing fleet.

Rightwing Extremism Key Issue:

Labor Mounts Drive To Block Reagan Bid

San Diego, Calif.—Nearly 2,000 delegates to the California AFL-CIO convention here pledged labor will mount its biggest political effort since 1958 when a "right to work" drive was overwhelmingly defeated and Gov. Edmund G. Brown was elected by a million-vote margin.

Brown and other Democratic Party leaders agree with labor that California has been picked by the extreme right-wing as the prime target for ultra-conservative activities in the 1966 election.

Actor Ronald Reagan, the Republican gubernatorial candidate, is rated as a strong possibility to defeat Brown unless liberals, labor and moderates unite in a massive campaign to turn back his candidacy, which is ardently supported by far right elements both in and out of California.

Assailed by Pitts

Exec. Sec. Thomas L. Pitts, said Reagan is a "puppet for the big corporate groups he has been fronting for for years," and warned that if elected Reagan would carry out policies of the extremists.

Paul Hall, AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Seafarers, and Al Barkan, head of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, met prior to the convention with top California labor leaders to forge a united labor front which will coordinate all political activities.

Lt. Gov. Glenn Anderson said Reagan is "trying to pull the biggest political hoax in American history by hiding his feelings against old age pensions, welfare programs and other liberal causes. The governor said the enemies of labor and progress were turned back in 1958, "but they have had a face-lifting since then, and they are back, far more determined and more dangerous than ever."

Brown, Pitts and others are making a major campaign issue of the fact that Reagan has refused to repudiate the John Birch Society, which has its greatest support in the nation in southern California.

For years, Reagan was a paid spokesman for the American Medical Association in its effort to kill medicare before it was born, Brown said, and now that it is law, he is trying to kill it by making social security voluntary. The governor added:

"This is no jest. It is a deadly serious, all-out effort by the forces of extremism from across the country to reverse the progressive thrust of our state government.

"Reagan is devoid of ideas except those short, spoon-fed answers fed to him by his public relations firm and right-wing supporters . . ."

Brown is strongly supporting such measures as higher minimum wages, extension of jobless benefits and other legislation to farm workers and others not exempt, and, in general, the same policies endorsed by labor.

State Controller Alan Cranston is pressing Reagan hardest on the Birch Society issue, and he told the convention that several of Reagan's contributors are also contributing to the "despicable, neo-facist Christian Nationalist Crusade of Gerald L. K. Smith."

The names of the Reagan supporters were given to him, he said, but despite all the evidence that these things are happening, and that the Birch Society "is riddled from top to bottom with race hate and religious prejudice, Reagan still maintains he has seen nothing yet to change his opinion about the society and repudiate it".

Ernest B. Webb, director of California's Dept. of Industrial Relations, also stressed the political problems, saying that the "normally responsible and traditionally moderate GOP leaders are lining up automaton-like behind Reagan, saying that he is what he is—the darling of the Far Right and the chief espousers of Birchland philosophy."

The delegates unanimously backed pres. Johnson's policies in Viet Nam, saying they "continue to give the best hope for eventually securing a just and lasting peace, not only in that country, but throughout Southeast Asia."

The delegates said this country must be "compassionate, yet realistic, dedicated to peace but resolute in its determination to thwart totalitarian aggression and subversion. . . ."

They also denounced as unfair to workers the wage guidelines, urged enactment of a $2 hourly minimum wage and a 35-hour workweek.

Full support was also given to major improvements in social security, jobless benefits, social welfare programs, urban renewal, education programs, and new legislation in the field of civil rights.

Secret Meeting Disclosed

Before the convention, Pitt disclosed that Reagan had met with the executive director of the National Association of Manufacturers, and received a pledge of nationwide financial support.

Pitts said the sessions were held at a private Lake Tahoe lodge in Nevada, and an armed private detective patrolled the area.

Also at the session, Pitts said, was Reagan's running mate, Robert H. Finch, the GOP nominee for lieutenant governor.

Pitts said the NAM officer was Richard Cornelle, a wealthly Californian who is also secretary-treasurer of the Foundation for Voluntary Welfare.

Reagan said there was such a meeting, but denied that it was secret or that any such pledges of political support had been given.

Postal Clerks Reject Plan For Merger

Louisville, Ky.—A proposal to merge the Postal Clerks and the unaffiliated National Postal Union was defeated on a rollcall vote, 653-616, at the 34th convention of the Clerks.

The rollcall came as the first order of business after two hours of debate. The result fell far short of the required two-thirds majority.

The issue came to the floor by referral from a special convention, held last April, at which a merger plan failed narrowly to win a two-thirds vote.

During debate, unity proponents stressed the advantages of a larger and stronger union. Opponents argued that the merger terms were too generous, that the NPU's health plan was unsatisfactory, and that domination by large locals threatened the security of smaller locals.

At a previous convention the NPU had approved merger by a 7-1 margin. Members also voted for it in a national referendum.

Further action on the subject by this convention was foreclosed by an amendment to the convention rules but some pro-merger delegates said they will move for later study, possibly by a special committee.

Meany Hits Airline Strike Bill As Attack on Workers' Freedom

preliminary and tentative approval to the major sections of the Senate bill, but all actions were still subject to final votes.

The Senate had adopted on Aug. 4 by a 54-33 vote a measure calling for the following procedures in the airlines dispute:

- An order by Congress terminating the strike for 30 days, and appointment by the President of a special airline dispute board to mediate the disagreement over contract terms during that period.
- Authority for the President to extend mediation and forbid a strike for another 60 days and, if the board recommends, for an additional 90 days.

Injunction Proviso

The bill provided also that federal courts could restrain any violations but no individual worker would be compelled to work against his will; wage terms finally agreed to would be retroactive to Jan. 1, 1966.

Finally the bill proposed that if no settlement is reached after 180 days, the board would report its recommendations to the President and the President to Congress, with his recommendations for ways to prevent "further interruption of the continuity of transportation services."

Negotiations between the Machinists and the airlines continued without progress as the House committee hearings were going on. During the hearings Siemiller, asked if the union would submit the dispute to final, binding arbitration, declared that "unless there is general agreement on most major issues" it would be unrealistic to submit the arbitration proposal to a vote of the striking workers.

Meany said in his statement, prepared for the House committee and read to his press conference, that the Senate bill "proposes to make this legal strike illegal."

The walkout "unquestionably has greatly inconvenienced a substantial number of citizens," which is "of course regrettable," Meany said, But, he noted, "as every expert witness has testified, there is no national emergency."

"Transportation is not paralyzed," he declared. "The flow of men and materials affecting the national defense has neither been interrupted nor delayed."

Meany asked "Where, then, does the public interest lie? Does it really lie with a statute which, for the sake of overcoming an inconvenience, would force free men to work against their will for private, profit-making corporations?

"We say no. We say the preservation of freedom outweighs the elimination of inconvenience."

Rejecting the claim that the airlines refused to increase their wage offers to serve the "public interest" and to prevent inflation, Meany said "We reject that claim as well."

Touching on the Administration's wage "guidelines," the AFL-CIO president said "attempts to limit wages, when there are no effective ceilings on prices, profits, dividends or corporate salaries, do not serve the public interest—they damage it."

The five airlines "typify the basis for our conviction," Meany said, adding "their profits have soared far beyond what the government itself considers reasonable, and they have applied no 'guidelines' in the executive suite."

Yet the proposed legislation would "force the strikers to work for these profit-rich companies on terms that are unacceptable to them, while the same (mediation) procedures that failed earlier are repeated again," he declared.

Declaring that bargaining has halted every time Congress moved to intervene, Meany said "the companies see no need to bargain when they expect Congress to break the strike."

He urged the House to "vote this proposal down" and predicted that if it does so, "free collective bargaining will settle this dispute in less time than the Congress has already devoted to it."

Siemiller told the House committee that the strike-ending resolution would "destroy collective bargaining in this industry." If the strikers are forced back to work under wages and conditions they feel are unjust, Siemiller predicted, "many employes will quit the industry for better-paying work in other fields."

Wages of airline mechanics average $3.52 an hour, the union head testified, in comparison with wages of $4.61 for Western Greyhound bus mechanics, $4.53 for garbage truck mechanics in New York City, $4.33 for San Francisco auto mechanics, and higher wages recently negotiated by the IAM in other areas.

Profits Zoom

There were these other developments in the strike that started July 8 against United, Trans World, Eastern, Northwest and National airlines:

- Airline profits after taxes climbed 55 percent to $21 million for Northwest in the first five months of 1966; 22 percent for TWA; 95 percent for United, and 44 percent for National.

Eastern's profits declined 5.6 percent in the same period—from $20 million to $19 million net, according to figures released by Meany.

- More than 2,900 delegates to the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters convention in Kansas City, Mo., voted unanimously to support the IAM strikers.
- Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen sent a statement for the House committee record stating that his union is "unalterably opposed" to the proposed bill and adding:

"As long as either side in a labor dispute can hope to be relieved of its responsibility" to bargain either by Congress or the Administration, the "lineup of applicants for such aid will grow longer."

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Machinists, Airlines

The Senate voted 54-33 for a bill to send striking airline Machinists back to work and to extend the Railway Labor Act no-strike period by up to 180 days while negotiations continue or mediators seek an agreement.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the bill as voted by the Senate, which went to the House. Fifty-four senators opposed labor's position, 33 voted in favor of labor's position. Here is the Senate vote:

Time lost because of strikes and lockouts in the first six months of 1966 was less than in 1965's first half, the Labor Dept. reported.

This half-year's figures show 2,000 work stoppages involving 992,000 workers and a loss of 10.5 million mandays of work. In the same period of 1965, time lost by 861,000 workers totaled 11.2 million mandays.

'Runaway' Hit by Order On Rehiring Workers

A sportswear firm which clandestinely "ran away" from Peru, Ind., to a new $250,000 city-built plant in Uniontown, Ala., should be compelled to offer jobs in the Alabama plant to the employes it deserted, pay all their family moving expenses and make up their lost income, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has recommended.

The examiner, rejecting the employer's argument that an employer "has the right to close his entire business" even if the closing is motivated by "vindictiveness toward the union," ruled that the McLoughlin Mfg. Corp. of Peru did not actually go out of business but instead moved its machines to Alabama and formed a new firm called Lady Jo, Inc.

Cited by the examiner was a Supreme Court decision in the case of the Darlington Mfg. Co., which closed its Darlington, S.C., mill shortly after the Textile Workers Union of America won a representation election there in 1956. In that case, the court held that an employer may close one unit of his business if the motive is not to discourage unionism.

In the current case, the record showed that the Ladies' Garment Workers had represented McLoughlin plant employes since 1954.

Under the Darlington rule, the examiner related, McLoughlin did not commit an unfair practice when it notified the ILGWU in April 1965 that the company had "decided to close up its operation and go out of business." But the factual situation was "completely changed" when the management decided in late June or early July 1965 to transfer the business to another location, the report stated.

Secret Transfer

"It is well settled," the examiner wrote, "that the decision to move or relocate a business . . . is a mandatory subject of collective bargaining," whether economically motivated or not.

The transfer was "purposefully accomplished in secret from the union" to prevent employes from exercising their rights and to avoid bargaining with the ILGWU as their representative, the examiner ruled.

He recommended that the firm be ordered to offer jobs to all employes laid off after June 10, 1965, dismissing if necessary all 65 employes of the Alabama plant; to take the other actions he found justified, and to bargain with the ILGWU at the new plant.

Food Price Increases Probe Set by FTC

The Federal Trade Commission has begun an investigation into nationwide increases in food prices during recent months.

The FTC announcement came only a few hours after Sec. of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman disclosed he had asked it to undertake the probe. Freeman's request, in turn, came two days after the Senate Agriculture Committee had asked him to see if he could determine why milk, bread and other food prices have risen during the last few months.

The study is being directed by FTC Chairman Paul Rand Dixon and will take three months. It was made public in Freeman's testimony before a special New York City Council committee charged with learning why the price tags on many foods have been marked upward in recent weeks.

He heatedly declared that the farm subsidy program, which is administered by his department, could be charged with only a small part of the rise. He added:

"Recent modest farm price increases are badly needed and have been earned."

Price rises in the stores, Freeman said, have been two to three times the boost at the farm. He cited as an example the retail price of a pound of white bread, which went up 3 cents between July 1965 and July 1966 while the farmer was getting only a half-cent more for the ingredients. A retail price climb of "about 1 cent a quart" for milk would be "justified," he said, and anything more "must go accounted for by other factors."

He pointed out that as the American standard of living improves, consumers are turning to higher-priced foods.

Freeman warned that unless farmers can make a living, they will continue to leave the farms and thus create shortages that would push food prices higher still.

At a press conference after his testimony, he refused to charge anyone for "gouging" but suggested an investigation of food after it leaves the farm.

"The farmer gets less than 39 cents of the food dollar," he reminded reporters.

To Preserve Freedom

IF CONGRESS VOTES to end this legal, non-emergency [airline] strike by a federal law forcing the men back to work, it will deliver a crippling blow to the whole labor movement, and more than that, to the liberty of every American who works for wages.

What is involved is a strike that unquestionably has greatly inconvenienced a substantial number of citizens who use the five airlines involved. This is, of course, regrettable. But as every expert witness has testified, there is no national emergency. Transportation is not paralyzed. The flow of men and materials affecting the national defense has neither been interrupted nor delayed.

Where, then, does the "public interest" lie?

Does it really lie with a statute which, for the sake of overcoming an inconvenience, would force free men to work against their will for private, profit-making corporations? We say no. We say the preservation of freedom outweighs the elimination of an inconvenience.

Make no mistake about it, the preservation of freedom is what you are debating—the freedom of American workers to decide, collectively, the terms and conditions under which they will work, or will not work.

This is a basic freedom; for the alternative is involuntary servitude.

Everyone who has spoken on this measure has defended the right to strike. But the right to strike is not an abstract theory. It is an operating right. Anyone who believes in the right to strike must accept the proposition that strikes will take place. It is not enough to believe in the right to strike in every case except the strike that is going on at the time or the strike that inconveniences articulate citizens.

THE OTHER DAY, Congressman Staggers called on the parties to reach an agreement to avoid legislation which, he said, "you will regret for the rest of your lives."

I would say it another way. I say to the Congress, do not pass legislation that you will regret the rest of your lives. Do not legislate against the rights of free Americans.

This is a far more serious matter than a dispute between 35,000 machinists and five airlines. Those who vote for this bill will be voting—no matter how good their intentions—against the basic freedom of every union member and every wage-earner in America.

It is hard to believe that this Congress will blacken its great record by curtailing the liberty of free men.

Profit Reports of Struck Lines Show Spectacular Advances

The following is excerpted from an address in the Senate by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) during the debate on the measure passed by the Senate ordering striking Machinists on five airlines back to their jobs.

I HAVE BEEN studying through the financial manuals what has been happening to the net income, after taxes, of the various [airline] companies; and I should like to state some of the figures.

In 1960, the net income after taxes of United Air Lines was $8,487,000. In 1965, it was $38,827,000.

The figure for TWA was minus $321,000 in 1960. It is up, in 1965, to a plus of $22,820,000.

Northwest Airlines had earnings of $1,230,000 in 1960—this is net income after taxes—and in 1965, of $24,830,000.

National had a deficit of $5 million in 1960. Its earnings were up to $18,419,000 in 1965.

Eastern, which has had the poorest earnings record of any of the so-called big five perhaps partially because of a previous strike, lost $3,700,000 in 1960; but in 1965 it made $21,348,000.

Let me read the percentage earnings on investment of the five lines in 1965: Eastern, 11.1 percent; National, 19 percent; Northwest, 19 percent; TWA, 10.3 percent; United, 9.4 percent.

In the first six months of this year, there has been a tremendous increase in the volume of traffic. Revenue passenger miles for the first five months of this year, for Eastern, were 15 percent above last year's corresponding period; for National, 23.6 percent above; for Northwest, 27.4 percent above; for TWA, 22.2 percent above; and for United, 30.3 percent above.

We have witnessed, of course, a tremendous increase in the price of the stocks of these airlines.

For Eastern, on Aug. 4, 1964, the price was 30 and a fraction. On the 4th of August 1966, the price was 99.

For National, the price in 1964, on the 4th of August, was 51. Then the stock was split 2 for 1 on the 9th of November 1965, but it is still selling today for 80.5, or an equivalent of 161 on the old basis.

For Northwest, the price was 56.5 in 1964 and 111.75 on the 4th of August, 1966.

TWA has gone from 41 to 85. United has gone up from 48 to 62 and a fraction, but once again, there has been a 2-for-1 split, so that, on the old basis, that would be 125.5, or almost three times the price on the corresponding date in 1964.

I should like to point out, if I may, that the so-called guideline for wage increases being limited to 3.2 percent a year is based on physical productivity and constant price levels. It is said that if we can keep the labor cost per unit produced constant, and increase labor costs per hour only in correspondence with the increase in output per hour, then we can keep prices constant. In general, I approve of that standard. But the point is that the cost of living has to be constant.

THE INCREASE in the productivity of wage labor per manhour, in manufacturing, at least, has averaged somewhat above 3.2 percent. It was 1.4 percent for 1960 over 1959; 4.6 percent for 1961 over 1960; 3.2 percent for 1962 over 1961; 4.4 percent for 1963 over 1962; 4 percent for 1964 over 1963; and 5.1 percent for 1965 over 1964.

In short, as far as manufacturing is concerned, labor productivity per manhour has gone up recently more than the 3.2 percent provided in the guideline. If we take society as a whole, and deflate the gross national product by the total number of employes, the increase is less. But on the whole, labor in manufacturing has performed by a high standard of increase.

Let me put this question before the Senate: Suppose productivity per manhour goes up by 3.2 percent, but the cost of living goes up 3.2 percent. That means there is no increase in real earnings for the workers during this period that their productivity has advanced.

The result is a great increase in corporate profits and this is shown in the recent annual current corporate figures. The corporate profits after taxes increased from $26.7 billion in 1960 to $44.5 billion in 1965 and to an annual rate of $48.7 billion in the first quarter of 1966.

The right to strike and to leave work should be a very important value in American life. It is not something to be trifled with. If we make an exception in this case, we will be led to make exceptions in many other cases. If the broad language of these provisions is approved, they will be called upon again and again.

This would not only be unjust, but it would also lead to further dangerous precedents. We cannot regulate wages by prohibiting strikes, in all fairness, unless we go on and then regulate prices and profits. For by prohibiting strikes, we take away one of the chief weapons of labor and tilt the balance of power in favor of the employers.

This would inevitably lead to a control of American industry by government.

I will therefore vote against the Morse amendment or against any amendment which would take away the right to strike.

'Modernized' Human Structure Needed for Republican Future

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

THE REPUBLICAN Party, like its opposite number, the Democratic Party, has no viable future outside the middle ground of the national political spectrum.

The extremes, whether racist, radical right or far left, are expensive but unavoidable luxuries of the two-party system in an open society but they are the refuge of nuts and nuisances, not the foundation of a triumphant new political order. The great bulk of American voters are moderate, some a little right, some a little left of center.

The pros of both parties know this but the Democratic pros are more successful in putting this axiom to work and one of the big reasons for this is that the Republican Party has failed to modernize its human structure. Not long ago Barry Goldwater said, in effect, that any GOP presidential aspirant who thought the Republican convention of 1968 would be controlled by different kinds of people than the delegates who nominated him in 1964, that aspirant was in for a shocking surprise.

As of now ex-Sen. Goldwater is right. The grassroots party organization across the land is still largely in the hands of decent, respectable, hard-working businessmen, lawyers, real estate operators and others with astigmatism in their political vision. They know little or nothing about the art of government and politics, partly because they have always regarded government as the enemy.

The party needs not a man on horseback but a modern moderate who knows the difference between planning and socialism, recognizes that the computer has done more than to revolutionize cost-accounting and has a face that doesn't scare babies on television. The Republicans can count some highly intelligent political talent on their side. The trouble is that when these forward-looking figures start generating a little momentum, as if they were really going somewhere, the party's organizational rank and file slips a banana peel in their path.

At the age of 51, Gov. Robert E. Smylie of Idaho might or might not have gone far on the national scene. He pondered running for the U.S. Senate and then decided to go for an unprecedented fourth term. He was chairman of the Republican Governors' Association, the dean of the governors in tenure, and he figured his moderate program evolved over 12 years as the state's chief executive would appeal to Idaho voters.

His Republican constituents showed him how wrong he was. He was mutilated in the primary by a farm equipment dealer and state senator from Idaho's northern panhandle, Don Samuelson, who carried all but six of the 44 counties.

A number of reasons are given for Smylie's stunning, unexpected defeat: He is said to have run a poor, unpunchy campaign, saving himself and his funds for November. The voters were tired of his long tenure. (California's two-term Gov. Brown should take due note.) They despised his sales tax, on which there will be a referendum in November. A savings and loan association scandal was blamed on his not pushing for better regulation of such institutions.

Goldwaterites, who lost Idaho to Lyndon Johnson by only 5,363 votes, never forgave Smylie for his lukewarm support of the '64 ticket or his lead in the purge of Goldwater's man, Dean Burch, from the chairmanship of the national committee. Extremist support for Samuelson was strong but so was support by Democrats; perhaps 10,000 of them crossed party lines in the open primary to vote for him as a strategic slap at Smylie, on the theory that their candidate, Charles Herndon, a lawyer-businessman from Salmon, can now beat Samuelson.

STATE SEN. PERRY SWISHER, a moderate Republican from Pocatello and also one of the most pungent and provocative editors in the West, recently sized up his fellow Republican Samuelson in his Intermountain Weekly.

"In Samuelson's world," Swisher wrote, "anything new is a menace. Public schools are intolerably expensive. Qualified teachers are a luxury. Campuses are sources of subversion. Public employes are routinely lazy, dishonest, disrespectful, expendable.

"To avoid government spending, it is Samuelson's habit to exhort barefoot people to lift themselves up by their bootstraps. . . . Listen carefully to Samuelson and you realize that no government intervention from the time the Indians ruled Idaho would have met his approval. . . . The private Don Samuelson is an open-minded, genial extrovert; his wife is a sweetheart; he has the personality and the appetites of a very good scoutmaster."

The fascinating but distressing thing is that Republican Editor-Politician Perry Swisher could have been describing any number of GOP candidates across the country. There is little doubt, either, that the radical right, strong in Idaho, will swarm to Samuelson's support.

However, ex-Rep. Ralph Harding, a moderate Democrat who will try to unseat U.S. Sen. Len B. Jordan in November, was doggedly optimistic.

"This is a [Republican] dream ticket," he said, "which the John Birch Society and other extreme rightists in Idaho can go all out for."

The larger question is, after the nightmare of 1964, how many dream tickets the Republicans emotionally can afford.

'Industrial Bonds' Seen Menace As Appeal to Runaway Plants

AN AFL-CIO spokesman has urged Congress to end state and local government industrial bond financing, charging that the practice gives "unnatural and improper" advantages to some employers at the expense of workers, communities and taxpayers.

The intent of Congress in giving state and local governments authority to issue tax-free bonds was that it be "used exclusively for public purposes" such as "schools, highways, hospitals and the like," said Frank Fernbach, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research. He noted, however, a growing number of communities are using tax-free bond revenues in building industrial sites to lure businesses from other areas.

"These communities are perverting this (congressional) intent," he asserted, adding that the practice, now existing in 30 states, threatens to spread to all 50, unless the federal law is changed. Fernbach's statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Fernbach explained that when these community-financed plants and factories are leased to employers, no capital outlay is required and rentals can be charged off as production costs, giving such employers a special tax advantage.

AS FURTHER inducement to relocate, he said that prospective companies are often permitted to purchase the bonds issued to finance their own plants and thereby realize added income in the form of tax-free interest payments.

Many companies relocating to capitalize on these special advantages are "runaways," and "create not only personal tragedy for the workers" whose jobs vanish, but also "tragedy for a whole community that was dependent upon this particular place of employment," Fernbach said. He reported growing alarm in Congress over the "magnitude of growth of this industrial bond financing device."

Reporters questioning Fernbach on the weekly AFL-CIO-produced interview, aired over the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Alex Uhl, editor of Press Associates, Inc., and Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SENATE FATE of the civil rights bill and its housing section rests specifically in the hands of Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the GOP leader, who has been avowing himself as violently opposed to any housing section whatsoever.

The arithmetic of such a situation is clear. At least 18 Democratic southern senators may be expected to filibuster the House-passed rights bill of 1966, as they filibustered the voting rights bill of 1965 and the basic civil rights bill of 1964. They may be expected to filibuster it whether or not the modified section intended to guarantee the right of Negroes to obtain housing outside the ghettos of northern cities is dropped.

There is only one way in which a filibuster by as many as 18 senators can be broken, particularly late in a congressional session, and that is by a cloture vote, which requires a two-thirds majority. There are 33 Republican members of the Senate, and no two-thirds majority for cloture to shut off a filibuster can be obtained without the support of something approaching 25 of these GOP members.

Dirksen is the only person who can bring his fellow Republicans into a bipartisan approach with the majority of Democratic senators for the purpose of achieving a civil rights vote.

The 1964 and 1965 rights bills were passed under such an approach and the Republican leadership, including Dirksen in the Senate and Rep. William M. McCulloch of Ohio, ranking GOP member of the House Judiciary Committee, were given full credit.

THIS BIPARTISANSHIP cracked badly in the House on the housing section this year.

The bill was amended in the Judiciary Committee, on the motion of a GOP member, Rep. Charles McC. Mathias (Md.), to provide that the section forbidding racial discrimination in the sale or rental of housing would not apply to owner-occupied houses or small apartment buildings. McCulloch made it perfectly clear that he felt such an exemption was necessary, and he was supported by the Democratic committee chairman, Rep. Emanuel Celler of New York.

But the Republican leaders, including Floor Leader Gerald P. Ford of Michigan, refused to follow the judgment and guidance of McCulloch this year.

They voted heavily to defeat a technical amendment by Mathias to make the purpose of the exemption of owner-occupied houses and small apartments entirely clear. Indeed, on a teller vote, only about 20 to 25 Republican members supported Mathias.

Ford himself argued in a speech that the whole housing section was full of uncertainties and was of dubious constitutionality. In a rollcall on a motion to strike out the section, Ford and nearly all the official House GOP leaders voted in favor of it.

Clarence Mitchell, who has worked many years on Capitol Hill for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, bluntly charged that Ford's speech showed "complete duplicity" and said the House GOP was trying to "knife" the rights bill even if it meant putting the party "in the arms of the Old Confederacy."

It was a "good illustration," he said, of "why a great majority of Negroes vote the Democratic ticket." GOP House members split 86 in favor of killing the housing section, 50 against it, while Democrats split 172 against and 104 for killing it, with those in favor representing principally southern and border state districts.

ON FINAL PASSAGE, Ford and other Republican House leaders reversed themselves and voted for the bill. But the chance for such a reversal by members is unlikely in the Senate.

The cloture vote on a filibuster will be the key to whether the Senate gets to vote at all on a bill covering the same fields as the House measure, including discrimination in housing.

Dirksen, like Ford, is publicly on record as saying that the section on housing is unconstitutional. The chances of the bill in the Senate may depend on whether he will change his mind.

STATE AND LOCAL industrial bond financing gives some employers "unnatural and improper" advantages at the expense of workers, communities and taxpayers, Frank Fernbach, center, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, charged in calling for congressional action to end the practice. Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Alex Uhl, editor of Press Associates, Inc., interviewed him on Labor News Conference, produced by the AFL-CIO and aired weekly over the Mutual Radio Network.

EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK was the demand of these Belgian women marching through the streets of Herstal, near Liege, in April. They won their objective after a 12-week strike.

'Milestone' House Bill on Rights Faces Hard Senate Filibuster

Administration's original proposal in the Senate limiting exemptions to boarding houses.

The AFL-CIO, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, strongly supported the Administration bill.

Johnson noted that despite the exemptions in the House bill, which extends to an estimated 60 percent of the nation's dwelling units, in practical terms "the House has barred bigotry in all new housing and in apartment houses. This opens major avenues toward fair and adequate housing for millions of citizens."

The housing provision fight came initially on an amendment by Rep. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.) to spell out the exact terms of a Judiciary Committee provision exempting owners of single homes and small apartment buildings from the anti-discrimination section. An owner is permitted, under the bill, to give written instructions to a real estate broker to discriminate. The Mathias amendment carried on a teller vote of 180 to 179 after the House leadership became convinced the amendment was necessary to secure passage.

The second test came on another teller vote to strike the housing section from the bill entirely. It lost 198 to 179 with the Republican leadership, led by Rep. Gerald R. Ford (R-Mich.), seeking to kill the section and Mathias and about 25 Republicans supporting the principle of fair housing.

The Mathias amendment was approved on a rollcall vote, 237 to 176, with the Republicans again split but the Mathias faction picking up additional votes. The Southern Democrats, with a few exceptions, were opposed to the housing provision and other portions of the bill.

A second rollcall to strike the housing section completely was defeated by 222 to 190.

School Change Wins

The GOP-Southern Democratic coalition did succeed, however, in making ineffective one section which would have permitted the attorney general to file school desegregation lawsuits without being requested to do so by citizens in the district involved. The amendment rendering this section ineffective carried 214 to 201.

A second bid by southerners sought to prevent the government from withholding funds from any federally-assisted program in violation of civil rights programs until it had been proved that the local government involved was in violation of federal law or the Constitution. The amendment was defeated by a teller vote of 136 to 127. School integration was the main issue in this attempt, with Southerners attacking the government desegregation guidelines on federal school aid.

GOP Senate Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has indicated his strong opposition to the ban on discrimination in housing and has intimated that he will decline to support it in the Senate. As with other civil rights bills that have faced southern filibusters, GOP votes are needed in the Senate to carry a cloture motion by the required two-thirds margin.

formed and the program is off to a good start."

Much of the credit, he added, "must go to the thousands of persons in the health professions . . . who gave freely of their time and expert knowledge to help shape the structure of medicare." A major share of the burden, the letter added, fell on the staff of the Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare and "they deserve high praise" for their skill and diligence.

The council pointed out that not all the problems of medicare have been solved "nor all the machinery perfected" and that efforts are continuing to improve the system.

But, it added, "meanwhile hundreds of thousands of elderly people are receiving health care under the program and the blueprint which you approved a year ago has become a reality."

In addition to Gordon, the council is composed of William E. Beaumont, Jr., president emeritus, American Nursing Home Association; Dr. Bernard Bucove, director, Washington State Health Dept.; Dr. Kenneth W. Clement, past president, National Medical Association; Dorothy A. Cornelius, executive director, Ohio State Nurses Association; Nelson H. ## Cement Union Pioneer Dies

Chicago — William Schoenberg, founding president of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, died in a suburban Des Plaines hospital after an illness of several months. He was 88.

His union activity began in 1913, when he was named a representative of the Chicago district of the Machinists. A few years later he was appointed an IAM general representative, and in 1933 was named AFL general representative in the Midwest.

He was placed in charge of AFL organization of Portland cement plant employes and in September 1939 was elected president of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers when it was chartered by the AFL. He retired in 1955 and was designated president emeritus.

Surviving are his widow, Bertha, and two sons, William, Jr., and Alfred.

Rail Fireman Cited For Saving 2 Boys

Indianapolis—A locomotive fireman who shoved two boys from the path of a moving freight train last winter was honored at a public luncheon here.

Nelson D. Reynolds, 30, of Evansville, who works for the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad, received $250 and a plaque as winner of the quarterly safety award of his union, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

Reynolds worked his way to the front of his engine in Poseyville, Ind., grabbed the handbar with one hand and swept the frightened youngsters to the side of the track.

Taking a Fresh Look:

European Unions Eye Bargaining Methods

The trade unions of Western Europe are taking a fresh look at ways to strengthen their collective bargaining techniques and bolster the influence of unions at the worker level.

"New Bargaining Patterns in Europe," an article in the August issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist, says this re-evaluation is inspired by a feeling that traditional approaches may be inadequate to today's problems and conditions.

Bert Seidman, who has served several years as AFL-CIO European economic representative based in Geneva, makes it clear in his article that millions of workers have gained "substantially better incomes and living standards and improved working conditions" through their unions.

"Yet most European unions are not althogether satisfied with what they have thus far achieved," Seidman writes. "Therefore, they are analyzing their own shortcomings in a search for practical solutions to improve their negotiating positions.

"The problems are nowhere identical nor are the solutions, but they all seem to aim at strengthening collective bargaining.

"European unions want to enhance their opportunity to negotiate on what really counts—the wages and working conditions of the workers in the plant, shop or office and the assurance that the union at the plant level will be able effectively to represent and defend the workers."

Before detailing the bargaining trends in each of 11 West European nations, Seidman describes three major differences between the U.S. and European bargaining frameworks:

"To an American observer," he explains, "the most striking feature of the European trade union scene is that collective bargaining is usually highly centralized at the national level. It determines overall trends in worker incomes and working conditions. But the actual earnings and employment terms of many workers are influenced much more by plant bargaining or even unilateral management decisions.

Low Minimums

"This is because national negotiations tend to set minimum wages and conditions which even less prosperous employers are presumed able to meet, instead of establishing standards based on what the better-off employers can provide."

A second major difference, Seidman continues, is the existence nearly everywhere in western Europe of "works councils." The council is elected by workers in a firm, plant or unit, usually on the basis of slates put up by the major union or unions.

While the council seldom engages in bargaining on new contracts, it does perform many functions handled by American unions. It processes grievances and consults with management on sales performance, technological changes and non-bargaining matters.

The works council is not under direct union control and in some ways competes with it for worker energy and loyalty, Seidman writes. However, it is highly unlikely that this well-entrenched institution will disappear, he adds.

A third major difference, according to Seidman, is the area covered by law and by negotiations. Since most European nations have national health plans, this subject is not likely to figure in labor-management talks except for supplemental benefits. In the U.S., a minimum wage level and union-employer relations are spelled out by law whereas in Europe these are covered by negotiations.

In Europe, a further difference is that many nations have laws requiring that the union contract terms be extended—in varying degrees—to non-signatory firms and workers. This is designed to protect those with higher standards from the substandard competition of unorganized firms, Seidman says.

The isues in European bargaining, he writes, cover the entire range of problems and demands familiar to American trade unionists. The wage gains of European unions by and large have been more impressive than those of U.S. labor, he reports, adding:

"Their better wage bargaining record is not too hard to explain. Economic conditions generally have been prosperous. Industry has been expanding. Most important of all, with the exception of Italy, full employment has prevailed everywhere in western Europe. Unemployment rates seldom have exceeded 2 percent and in quite a number of countries have for years been well below 1 percent."

However, Seidman notes in qualification, real earnings rose much more slowly because of the inflation of recent years. And, he added, actual wages have risen twice as fast as negotiated wages in what is called the "wage drift." Unions regard the wage drift as a sign that nationally-bargained pay hikes have been below what most employers could afford, he points out.

40-Hour Week Goal

On working hours, Seidman writes, European labor started the postwar period with a 48-hour workweek and has been pushing toward the 40-hour standard long prevalent in America. Most workers are now on 42 to 46-hour schedules, but the 40-hour goal is expected to be achieved in some nations within the next few years.

On paid holidays and vacations, he says, the European record is as good or better than that of U.S. labor.

In conclusion, Seidman reports that "European trade union leaders are thinking not only in terms of boosting the real significance of collective bargaining, but also strengthening the influence of the union as the primary organization of the workers at the plant level."

Industrial Safety Courses Expanded

Chicago — The course in Fundamentals of Industrial Safety which the National Safety Council has been giving for the past 20 years will be offered six times during 1967 as part of an expanded program.

The course is intended to help union safety committeemen, stewards and officers, as well as other personnel, to organize and operate safety programs and covers such topics as accident records, job safety analysis and personal protective equipment.

Classes will be held Jan. 23-27, Feb. 27-Mar. 3, Apr. 17-21, May 15-19, June 5-9 and Nov. 13-17 in NSC headquarters here, where a series of other classes also will be given. Schoemann Reports 'Lots of Work':

Membership at Record High, Plumbers Convention Told

By Gervase N. Love

Kansas City—The Plumbers & Pipe Fitters are in the best shape in the union's 77-year history, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann told delegates to the 29th convention here.

Membership is at an all-time high of 274,033 in 725 locals in the United States, Canada and the Panama Canal Zone, he reported to the more than 2,900 delegates.

Their condition is "prosperous," with average wage rates and take-home pay at record levels, he said, adding that "reports from our local unions indicate that there is lots of work, and that unemployment is low."

The convention, held every five years, was the fourth in a row to be held in Kansas City.

It also was the first AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has missed since 1921. Meany, a delegate from New York Local 2, was unable to attend because of the crisis arising from the airlines strike bill.

Meany, in a telegram expressing "sincerest regrets" at his inability to attend, hailed the union's recent membership gains as one of its many achievements since the last convention. He urged the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters to strive for ever greater gains because the workers, "for whom we speak, must have a better and fuller life."

Schoemann in his report vigorously defended the Johnson Administration's course in Viet Nam as a defense of freedom throughout the world.

"Time and again our nation has made clear its intention that we seek no additional territory, no empire, no domination over others," he declared. "We have extended the olive branch to explore every avenue of peace without limitation. These offers have been rejected, and so a bitter choice has been forced upon us.

"It takes two sides to negotiate, and our government has made it clear that we are not the side obstructing negotiations," he added.

Schoemann expressed satisfaction at the spread of political awareness and political education in the union. The "tragic and bitter" defeat of repeal of Section 14(b) and the "unpromising" situation regarding a situs picketing law make it imperative that the union "press forward, relying on the traditional economic weapons of the trade union movement."

Wage Guides Scored

He denounced existing wage guidelines, emphasizing that if there were a national emergency requiring controls—the existence of which he denied—labor would accept curbs "equally with all other economic groups" but it objected to being singled out for restraint.

In discussing equal employment opportunity, Schoemann restated the union's position that its ranks are open to all but on its own terms and without lowering the qualifications of either apprentices or journeymen.

"Members of minority groups will come into our local unions in gradually increasing numbers," he said. "There will be no great flap about it; life will go on as in the past."

Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey, a guest speaker, strongly defended the position of the Johnson Administration on a number of fronts, with stress on its fight for freedom in Viet Nam. The Free World must demonstrate to the Communists, he declared, "that the price of aggression is too high, and that they must learn to live with their neighbors."

He said another effort will be made to pass the situs picketing bill, which he sponsored as a senator, and called for even greater support from organized labor in the fight to enact the legislation. He praised the union's expansion of its apprenticeship programs and called political activity "as vital to the labor movement as collective bargaining."

Solicitor of Labor Charles Donahue, former union research director, described recent changes in labor laws and predicted passage of the situs picketing bill. Rep. William J. Randall (D), whose district includes part of Kansas City and who was one of the supporters of Section 14(b) repeal in the House, was critical of labor for not generating more backing for the repealer and also for the delays on situs picketing.

The convention authorized establishment of the post of international organization director and Schoemann announced the appointment of Eugene W. Bradshaw, since 1951 a general organizer.

Schoemann emphasized that the union "must move out boldly" and with "imagination" to new organizing opportunities, and called for "intelligent coordination of activity" to secure the best results. The union has gained 18,000 new members in the last two years, he said, and he urged new efforts to unionize in the homebuilding and servicing fields.

The convention received 199 resolutions endorsing Schoemann and his administration and calling for the re-election of present officers. The delegates approved these resolutions prior to the actual election.

Plumbers Parley Greeted by Truman

Kansas City—En route to the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters convention here, Vice Pres. and Mrs. Humphrey stopped off in nearby Independence, Mo., to pay their respects to former Pres. Harry S. Truman who was released a few days previously from the hospital.

"His color was good, his spirits were even better," Humphrey reported to the convention. "I told him I was coming here and he said, "Well, Mr. Vice President, I just want you to know one thing—the best friends I ever had were in the labor movement. You tell that union hello for me, will you?"

VICE PRES. Hubert Humphrey, pausing en route to Plumbers & Pipe Fitters convention in Kansas City, Mo., shakes hands with picketing Machinist at Municipal Air Terminal there after warmly greeting other pickets. The airport is one of 231 where 35,000 union ground crewmen struck for acceptable contract.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Jobless Pay Standard

The key vote on a Senate committee amendment to a House-passed bill came on a resolution providing that a jobless worker in all states shall receive a weekly unemployment benefit of 50 percent of his previous wage or a maximum of 50 percent of the state's average of all wages.

The AFL-CIO had called for passage of the Senate Finance Committee bill "without weakening floor amendments." The vote was 45 in favor, 36 opposed, to the Finance Committee proposal.

Senate Votes Standards For State Jobless Laws

the AFL-CIO, had called for a gradual step-up to two-thirds of the average weekly wage.

- Require that any worker who has at least 20 weeks of employment in a year be eligible for jobless benefits.

- Require that states pay at least 26 weeks of benefits to a worker who had been employed at least 39 weeks. The Senate Finance Committee had recommended that a worker with 20 weeks of employment should be eligible for 26 weeks of benefits but controversy on the Senate floor led to the compromise 39-week figure.

- Full federal financing of an extra 13 weeks of benefits to unemployed workers during recessions. The House bill provided for a similar plan but would have split the financing between the federal government and the states on a 50-50 basis.

The Senate bill increases the wage base on which taxes against employers are levied for the unemployment compensation program from the current $3,000 to $3,900 in 1968 and $4,800 in 1972. The House bill would increase the base eventually to $4,200. Both measures would raise the tax applied to the wage base from 3.1 to 3.3 percent starting in 1967.

Coverage under the Senate bill would be extended to an additional 2.3 million workers, exempting employers with fewer than 4 workers. The House bill would cover 3.5 million new workers extending the law to employes of all firms with more than one worker.

The Senate also wrote into its measure a provision to allow unemployed persons between 60 and 65 to qualify for extended benefits if their skills have become obsolete or if they live in areas certified by the Labor Dept. in which jobs for them are not available.

New Coverage

The present law now covers about 42.5 million workers. The new coverage under the Senate bill would apply mostly to employes of non-profit organizations, some agent-drivers and outside salesmen and about 200,000 workers in certain food-processing plants.

Sen. Russell Long (D-La.) chairman of the Senate Finance Committee which handled the measure, led a determined fight on the floor to retain the federal standards approved by the committee and won reversal of earlier votes against setting a 26-week standard on duration of benefits. He worked out the compromise that led to the 39-week eligibility provision for the 26-week benefit plan.

Before the Senate started work on the measure, Meany called for passage of the committee-approved bill without weakening amendments. While the committee bill did not include all the improvements needed to modernize the law, he said, the improvements it does embody have "high and urgent priority."

The standards provided in the Senate-passed measure would be required in all state unemployment compensation laws if the states were to continue to receive back the major portion of taxes for the system collected by the federal government from employers.

Molders Ask Protection Under 'Dumping' Laws

San Francisco—Two programs for long-range job protection won the endorsement of delegates to the 34th convention of the Molders and Allied Workers Union here.

One gave Molders' officials solid backing in their efforts to clarify anti-dumping laws to obtain relief from over-heavy importation of foreign-made soil pipes and fittings.

The union has contended that the foreign products are made at prices which do not allow domestic manufacturers to compete and still pay a living wage. Initial efforts to secure relief were rejected.

The Molders are supporting legislative proposals which would define "injury" to industry and workers more precisely and which would make the present anti-dumping laws more effective.

A second program called on local Molders' unions to seek retraining programs and severance pay provisions in their contracts.

The convention's 332 delegates took note of rapid changes in the technology of their industry and the shift in job structure. Severance pay and retraining would allow workers greater mobility and security in the face of the changing economy, they declared.

Pres. William A. Lazzerini of San Francisco was returned to office for a second term.

Reginald C. Bigsby of Wausau, Wis., was re-elected secretary.

'Best We Have':

Wage-Price Guides Under Study—LBJ

The wage-price guideposts are "the best measuring stick we have" but "we are constantly searching for something better," Pres. Johnson declared at a news conference.

His comments in reply to reporters' queries came a day after two cabinet officers, Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler and Commerce Sec. John T. Connor, told newsmen after meeting with the President that the economy is in good health and growing and that while the guideposts may be in need of revision they would not be abandoned.

Two Studies

The President said the guidepost question was under study by both the Administration and the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee. The committee, said Johnson, has been asked to "consider every possible approach" to the problem. The advisory group contains representatives of labor, industry and the public, including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

At his news conference the President reaffirmed his views on the need for "an effective stabilization program" and said that the guideposts have generally proved "fair to the workers and management," but were not "perfect" and as of the moment his advisers had "nothing better to suggest."

The AFL-CIO had rejected the concept as unfair and unworkable when the guideposts were initiated five years ago in the Kennedy Administration and strongly reaffirmed its opposition this year, when the President's Council of Economic Advisers set aside what would have been a normal increase in the wage guidepost figure of 3.6 percent in favor of 3.2 percent.

The President discussed in detail wage and price problems at his press conference and reviewed the history of the past few months. He emphasized that the Administration was trying to keep prices in line by "voluntary" methods and that the question of inflation should be viewed in historical perspective.

He argued that since 1960 the Consumer Price Index, measuring living costs, had risen from 100 to 108, meaning that the cost of an average family market basket of food and services had moved from $10 in 1960 to $10.80 in 1966. In other countries, he pointed out, living costs had increased very sharply in contrast to the U.S.

Fowler and Connor told reporters that the economy is absorbing the pressures of the Viet Nam war without losing its "fundamental balance."

The cabinet members indicated possible revision of the guidepost approach, Connor noting that "preoccupation" with the 3.2 percent figure can lead to "misunderstandings." Fowler said the question is whether "there is one magic number for all industries."

Unit Cost Down

Fowler pointed out that the labor cost per unit of factory output in June was below that of the previous two months and that at 99.3 percent of the 1957-59 average was only a bit above the 99 percent of a year earlier.

Both he and Connor said the $3 a ton price increase on sheet steel, a 2 percent hike, was a significant change but would not be "disastrous." Connor termed the increase "minimal" and "within bounds."

Earlier the President had greeted the steel price rise with a statement that inflationary price increases might force cuts in federal spending on space and other projects. Gardner Ackley, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, had termed the raise "irresponsible," especially in terms of lack of prior consultation with the Administration.

SENIOR HOUSING FOUNDATION sponsored by Dayton-Miami Valley (O.) AFL-CIO built this $3 million apartment house for retirees after assessing members for two years and winning approval of $3 million loan from Housing & Home Finance Agency. Completed last June, the 11-story, 264-suite "Lakewoods" apartments is fully occupied, has 140 on waiting list. Rents range from $79 to $120 a month for retired workers aged 62 and up.

Dayton Labor Raises Funds For Housing

Dayton, O.—An 11-story $3 million apartment house called the Lakewoods, built for retired workers under the sponsorship of the Dayton-Miami Valley AFL-CIO, is fully occupied and has a waiting list of 140 prospective tenants.

The building, on Wilmington Ave. in a residential neighborhood, took four years of cooperative effort by labor and the community and the U.S. Housing & Home Finance Agency.

Since plans were started four years ago, the central body organized the Senior Housing Foundation as a non-profit corporation; raised $50,000 by assessing members of affiliated unions at the rate of two cents a month per member for two years; secured a $3 million government loan and won a court suit to build the high-rise apartment in an outlying section of town.

Executive Sec. Conrad Grimes of the central body said, "We have sponsored other community projects for years. Now we have one we initiated ourselves."

The building has 264 suites for retired persons, union and non-union, aged 62 and up. Monthly rental charges of $79 to $120 include water, heat and electric lighting and heating; wall to wall carpeting; a lounge and balcony on each floor; a community room for meetings; a circulating library; coin-operated washers and dryers on each floor, and outdoor parking.

Election Battles Set In 2 Southern States

Sharp election battles were set up in two southern states—Arkansas and Tennessee—as Republicans nominated Howard Baker, Jr., for the U. S. Senate against Gov. Frank Clement in Tennessee, who won the Democratic primary, and Republican Winthrop Rockefeller prepared to challenge Jim Johnson, winner of a bitterly-fought run-off primary, for governor of Arkansas.

Clement narrowly defeated incumbent Democratic Sen. Ross Bass for his party's nomination for a full six-year Senate term. It was a reversal of the primary results two years ago, when Bass was nominated for the unexpired two years of the term of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver.

Johnson Tops Holt

In Arkansas Jim Johnson rode to victory for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination over Frank Holt in a campaign in which he denounced the federal government, civil rights legislation, foreign aid and the state administration of six-term Gov. Orval Faubus.

Both Johnson and Holt are former members of the Arkansas Supreme Court who resigned to seek nomination for governor. Johnson bolted the Democratic Party in 1964 to campaign for the Republican presidential nominee, former Sen. Barry Goldwater.

The Arkansas AFL-CIO through its Committee on Political Education endorsed Holt against Johnson, acknowledging that Johnson had a "satisfactory" record on specific labor matters but declaring that the real primary issues were "larger than the minimum wage and social security" and "go to the core of our democratic society." J. Bill Becker, president of the state federation, accused Johnson of "spreading hatred" in his campaign.

COPE also endorsed David Pryor, who won, in a run-off primary for Democratic nomination to the House of Representatives in the Arkansas 4th Congressional District.

Rockefeller, a brother of New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, began building GOP strength in Arkansas six years ago while serving as chairman of the state industrial development commission. He won an unusually heavy vote for governor in a challenge against Faubus two years ago.

In Tennessee, Baker won the GOP nomination for the Senate easily over a token opponent. He is a son of a long-time former Republican member of the House and a son-in-law of Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), the GOP Senate floor leader.

The Democratic nominee for governor, succeeding Clement, is former Gov. Buford Ellington, who handily defeated a political newcomer, John Jay Hooker, Jr. Republicans did not stage a gubernatorial primary. The Tennessee COPE endorsed both Hooker and Bass.

Rep. Tom Murray, chairman of the House Post Office Committee, was beaten for renomination in the 7th Congressional District by State Rep. Ray Blanton. Republican State Chairman Julius Hurst was nominated by the GOP.

$7 Hike, Workweek Cut Mark Cap Makers Pact

New York—A "best ever" contract negotiated with three cap manufacturers' associations will give some 2,000 members of the Hatters $7 in wage increases over a three-year term and cut their workweek from 40 to 37.5 hours, Pres. Alex Rose has announced.

The agreement, he said, is a model for the industry throughout the country and was reached after nearly two months of negotiations with the Empire State Cloth Hat & Cap Manufacturers Association, the National Headwear Manufacturers Association and the Uniform Manufacturers Exchange, Inc.

The first installment of the wage increase, $3 weekly, is retroactive to July 18. Another $4 is due July 1, 1967, and a year later the shorter workweek becomes effective.

A two-step progression will boost craft minimums from the present $60 to $70 a week to $70 to $82 when the federal minimum wage becomes $1.60 an hour. Workers earning less than their craft minimums will receive $3 increases on Jan. 1 of each of the next three years.

When new minimum wage laws are enacted, all workers must receive at least $4 above the floor.

The agreement changed the base for the employer's 4 percent vacation pay contribution from straight time earnings to gross wages.

Employer contributions to the retirement fund were raised from 4 to 4.5 percent retroactive to July 1 and to 4.75 percent on Apr. 1, 1969.

$1.60 Minimum Wage Bill Voted by Senate Committee

Ratification Vote Set:

New Airline Pact Called 'Best Ever'

By Eugene A. Kelly

Machinists on five struck airlines were scheduled to vote Aug. 19 on a proposed new contract with gains their union president called "the best ever won" in a single set of union negotiations.

The contract calls for wage increases of 5 percent a year for three years; a cost-of-living clause in the second year of the agreement—the first such clause in the industry, the union declared; an additional paid holiday, and improvements in health and welfare benefits, vacations, wage progression schedules and premium pay for workers on line aircraft maintenance.

The union said the contract "effectively and thoroughly shreds the so-called guidelines" set at 3.2 percent by the President's Council of Economic Advisers. It summarized the major provisions and mailed them to each of the 35,000 members with a letter recommending their approval.

Simultaneous Meetings

In telegrams to presidents of 60 airline locals, IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller asked that the locals vote at 3 p.m. EDT and wire or telephone the results to IAM headquarters by 6 p.m. Aug. 19, after this issue of the AFL-CIO News has gone to press.

The strikers have "scored a victory they can be proud of," Siemiller said. "They have made the airline industry a better place to work, and their families will live better as a result."

Approval of the proposed contract would end a strike that started July 9 at 231 airline locations. The walkout halted commercial flights on United, Eastern, Trans World, Northwest and National airlines but did not interfere with the movement of defense personnel or supplies. Five other major airlines were not struck and continued service.

The tentative settlement came

Court Tells GE: Talk to Union Team

A federal judge ordered General Electric management to bargain with the negotiating team selected by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—one which includes representatives of seven other cooperating AFL-CIO unions.

U.S. Dist. Judge Marvin Frankel blasted GE's walkout from a preliminary bargaining session on May 4 as "inexcusable." There was "nothing unlawful or in any sense improper" in the makeup of the IUE committee, he said.

"The company breached its duty to bargain," he declared.

The judge issued an injunction, sought by the National Labor Relations Board, to compel GE to return to the bargaining table.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings hailed the decision as removing "the major stumbling block to getting negotiations started" and proposed that GE bargaining begin on Aug. 23 and Westinghouse negotiations two days later.

He pledged that "the IUE and the unions associated with us will

Meany Asks U.S. to Halt Climb in Interest Rate

Immediate action to halt the upward spiral of interest rates has been urged on the Johnson Administration and Congress by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Meany, who also called for an "effective" rollback to "reasonable levels," charged the surge in rates "is boosting prices and throwing residential construction into a depression."

His demand was touched off by the rise in "the prime interest rate for the choicest and richest borrowers" to 6 percent, put into effect by the First National City Bank of New York and other commercial banks across the nation.

This is a 33-1/3 percent rise in the basic price of money since last December," Meany pointed out. "Interest rates are higher than at any time since the 1920s.

"These unconscionable price hikes are increasing the cost of living. They have boosted the average effective mortgage rate to 6.5 percent and more, if the home buyer can find available mortgage funds.

MERGER AGREEMENT that would create a new Graphic Arts Intl. Union on Labor Day 1967 is signed in New York by Pres. James H. Sampson (left) of the Stereotypers & Electrotypers and Pres. Kenneth J. Brown of the Lithographers & Photoengravers following approval by their respective executive bodies.

Target Date Set:

2 Printing Unions Adopt Merger Plan

New York—The executive bodies of the Lithographers & Photoengravers and the Stereotypers & Electrotypers have unanimously approved an agreement to merge into a new Graphic Arts Intl. Union, with Labor Day 1967 set as the target date for completion of the unification process.

Approval of the agreement was announced by LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown and ISEU Pres. James H. Sampson, who said it came after 13 months of discussion.

The Stereotypers will act on the proposal at a convention in Washington Sept. 11-15, after which it will go to the members for a referendum vote. The Lithographers & Photoengravers international council will initiate a similar referendum in that union.

If the merger plan is approved by the members of the two unions, they will then hold special and joint conventions next spring to act on a proposed constitution. If the delegates give it their endorsement, it will then go to the members for final ratification.

64,000 Involved

The new union would start life with 64,000 members—51,000 from the LPIU and the remaining 13,000 from the Stereotypers.

The unity pact provides that the president will be a lithographer, with the photoengravers and the stereotypers-electrotypers each having an executive vice presidency.

Brown said the LPIU is continuing merger talks with the Printing Pressmen, with 115,000 members, and in October will begin exploratory talks on unity with the 62,000-member Bookbinders, which ratified such a step at a convention last month.

The LPIU itself is the result of a merger, effective Labor Day 1964, of the Lithographers and the Photoengravers—the first merger of unions in the graphic arts in half a century.

In approving the agreement, representatives of the LPIU and the ISEU said it "would continue and consolidate the historic position of each organization in protecting and advancing the interests of their members."

Also, they declared, it would "strengthen leadership, financial and other resources by increasing the organizing capability of the merged organization and by substantially improving services for the membership which can result in more certain job security, expanded job opportunities and improvement in the wages, hours and working conditions of all members."

The subcommittee that drafted the agreement in its final form was made up of Recording & Financial Sec. Donald W. Stone and Vice Pres. Walter F. Risdon of the LPIU and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer and Vice Pres. C. William Miller of the ISEU.

Shifts Date On Increase To 1968

By David L. Perlman

The Senate Labor Committee has voted 15-0 approval of a minimum wage bill which would raise the wage floor for nearly 30 million workers to $1.60 an hour by Feb. 1, 1968—a year earlier than the House-passed bill. It would also extend coverage to 7.2 million workers now excluded from the Fair Labor Standards Act, some 800,000 fewer than the House bill.

Despite the unanimous committee vote, the bill will face a barrage of restrictive amendments when it goes before the Senate itself. Foes are expected to seek to stretch out the timetable for the minimum wage increases and to hack away at new coverage, particularly among agricultural workers and retail employes.

Attempts to weaken the bill along these lines were made in the Labor Committee, but were soundly defeated.

Both the House and Senate bills would raise the minimum for persons now guaranteed $1.25 an hour to $1.40 on Feb. 1, 1967. An estimated 3.8 million workers presently covered earn less than $1.40 an hour and the rise to that level would add more than $800 million in purchasing power.

With nearly 5.9 million covered workers below the $1.60 level, the added purchasing power of the higher wage is estimated at nearly $2 billion.

Newly-covered workers would be brought in under a $1 minimum wage next February, with a rise of 15 cents a year until farm workers

Major Gains Won on Steel River Boats

Maritime Union members who man towboats of three major steel companies have ratified a five-year agreement which will bring them wage and fringe benefits estimated at $9.26 a day.

The contract covers some 200 NMU boatmen employed by U. S. Steel, Jones & Laughlin and the Wheeling Steel Co. The boats deliver coal to the companies' plants in the Pittsburgh area, via the Allegheny, Monongahela and Ohio Rivers.

The ratification vote was 171 to 10, the NMU reported.

Over the five-year period wages will rise $4.63 a day, with an immediate increase of $1.93 a day.

Pension benefits will be doubled for most workers and other fringe gains include improved insurance, supplemental unemployment benefits, holiday pay and a unique special bonus. The special bonus, a new contract feature, provides two to four weeks pay for each employe depending on length of service, paid once during the life of the contract. NMU Vice Pres. Rick Miller said the bonus for a deckhand with top seniority will be $1,075.

Trainmen, 8 Roads Agree on Crew Size

New York—Committees representing the Railroad Trainmen and eight major railroads have reached agreement on crew sizes and attrition principles under the state's recently amended full crew law, BRT Vice Pres. William J. Weil said here.

A dispute over interpretation of the law and a 1965 agreement, negotiated by BRT Pres. Charles Luna, resulted in a one-day walkout of trainmen on the Delaware & Hudson Railroad. Committees were appointed and an agreement reached in 11 days, the BRT said.

First-Half Profits Up 12 Percent Over 1966

After-tax profits of 1,300 leading corporations reached $13.3 billion in the first six months of 1966, a 12 percent jump over the first half of last year.

The figures, compiled by the First National City Bank of New York, showed a broad across-the-board gain in earnings for 83 percent of all companies reporting for the second quarter of the year.

The bank said that "the sharpest gain" among the non-manufacturing groups was in the airlines, "which benefited from steep increases in passenger and freight traffic, plus economies attained from more jet planes."

Profits in the second quarter would have probably run higher than the 8 percent gain over the first three months of 1966 if it were not for a decline in sales which lowered profits in the auto industry. But the second quarter figures overall were up 12 percent over a year ago.

Outside the auto industry, the bank reported, "virtually every other industry group continued to chalk up healthy gains."

U.S. Aide Lauds ILA For Viet Port Role

New York—The help given by Pres. Thomas W. Gleason and an eight-man team of union specialists in unclogging the port of Saigon was called "an unprecedented contribution of service" by John Condon, former U.S. labor attache in Viet Nam.

Condon and Gleason held a joint press conference here at which the former praised the latter for "making many, many years of service available" for the task of getting equipment, food and other supplies to U. S. fighting men and their allies.

Gleason made three trips to Saigon, the first in October 1965, in an effort to untangle what appeared to be a hopeless mess. He found the most pressing need was for wooden pallets and forklift trucks to get cargo from the holds of ships to the docks, and then flatbed trucks to move it to storage areas.

A recommendation of additional storage space led to construction of between 40 and 50 prefabricated warehouses near the docks for temporary storage of civilian goods — military shipments are stored elsewhere—and speedier removal of goods ordered by private importers.

He returned to Saigon last December and again in June. His last recommendation was for the issuance of licenses to importers with a requirement that they be compelled to move wares from the harbor area within a limited time.

Meantime the union, at its own expense, sent eight members with years of experience at different phases of longshoring to instruct the Vietnamese dockers in modern techniques and the proper use of the equipment.

"The Vietnamese are as good longshoremen as any in the world," Gleason said at the joint press conference. "They're small, but they can work in the oppressive heat. All they needed was the equipment.

"Under the present system of operations, including the present equipment now in Saigon, the port should be able to handle any increase in supplies destined for the war effort."

The monthly "handle" is now around 700,000 tons, he said, and could be raised to 1.5 million tons.

At an earlier press conference in Washington prior to being reassigned to Lebanon, Condon hailed the aid U. S. unions have given in Viet Nam but urged greater efforts to help the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT), which he said is "playing a growing and vital role in helping to create a more free and durable country."

He singled out for praise not only the ILA, but also the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Machinists, Auto Workers, and railroad unions and Steelworkers for their programs of assistance, and suggested that joint projects of assistance to the CVT be undertaken.

Wages Up 3.8 Percent In New 1966 Contracts

Major contracts negotiated during the first six months of 1966 boosted hourly wage earnings an average of 3.8 percent, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Agreements surveyed covered more than 800,000 workers, about equally divided between manufacturing and non-manufacturing employment. Construction industry wage changes, covered in a separate study, averaged 6.4 percent, the BLS said.

The six-month pattern is about the same as for the equivalent period in 1965, but higher than the 3.1 and 3.2 percent increases of 1963 and 1964.

Pay raises went to all but 1 percent of the workers in the bargaining units studied. The largest proportion — 54 percent — were scheduled for first-year increases ranging from 3 to 4.5 percent. Another 25 percent received raises of 5 percent or more.

First-year adjustments averaged 3.9 percent in manufacturing and 3.8 percent in non-manufacturing industries, the BLS said. Its term "average" refers to the median—the halfway point on the list of wage changes—it specified. The value of non-wage fringe benefits won in contract negotiations was not included in the BLS study.

In contracts running more than one year, the first-year wage increase tended to be larger than that of subsequent years, but the difference was less than in previous years.

The average annual wage increase over the life of agreements negotiated in the first half of 1966 was 3.7 percent. This compares with 3.3 percent in 1965 agreements, 3 percent in 1964 and 2.5 percent in 1963.

In the agreements studied—those affecting 1,000 or more workers—the average first-year wage increase came to 12 cents an hour.

Canadian to Assist New ILO Institute

Ottawa, Ont. — Max Swerdlow, education director for the Canadian Labor Congress, has been given a year's leave of absence to help set up a new Institute on Labor-Management Relations in Trinidad and Tobago.

The mission is one of many Swerdlow has undertaken for the Intl. Labor Organization, which is directing establishment of the institute. The project is divided into labor and management sections with the former expected to follow the pattern of the Canadian Labor College in Montreal, which Swerdlow was instrumental in developing.

Veteran Chicago Leader Retires After 50 Years

Chicago—Daniel J. McNamara, president and business agent of Amalgamated Transit Division 241 since 1950 and a Chicago union official for nearly 50 years, has retired effective Sept. 1.

2.8% Wage Gains For Craft Unions

An increase of 2.8 percent in average wage scales for union building trades workers in the second quarter of 1966 was reported by the Labor Dept. The increase was equal to the one posted in the comparable quarter of last year, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

The quarterly survey of seven major trades in 100 cities showed $4.59 an hour as the estimated average wage for union craftsmen as of July 1, 1966—an hourly rise of 12.3 cents between Apr. 1 and July 1.

After 10 Years:

New Ruling Snarls Darlington Decision

The 10-year-old Darlington mill-closing case was started on a new round of delays and appeals with a National Labor Relations Board examiner's ruling that the mill was not closed to discourage union organizing in the owner's other mills.

The ruling, by Trial Examiner Lloyd Buchanan, was his fifth in the case since the Textile Workers Union of America won bargaining rights in 1956 at the Darlington, S.C., textile mill headed by Roger Milliken, also an executive of Deering Milliken & Co., Inc.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the union will appeal the finding to the full board, adding "we owe it to the 500 Darlington workers who were thrown on the scrapheap when the plant was shut down."

NLRB sources indicated that the general counsel's office, which filed the formal complaint against Darlington and fought the case up through the courts, also was expected to file exceptions to the trial examiner's recommended findings and obtain review by the board.

At stake in the long-pending case are not only jobs and backpay for the fired workers, but such issues as whether the plant was closed unlawfully to thwart the employes' union desires and whether Darlington and Deering Milliken constituted a single employer.

The NLRB sent the case back for further findings after a 1965 Supreme Court ruling in the Darlington case.

The high court in a 7-0 ruling rejected the argument that a "single businessman cannot choose to go out of business if he wants to" but held that if the business involved more than one plant and the employer's motive was to "chill" unionism in the other plants, the National Labor Relations Act would have been violated.

Lower Court Reversed

That decision in effect set aside a lower court ruling that an employer could close all or part of his business for anti-union or other reasons. It sent the case back for further hearings on the "chilling" aspect.

The union said in a statement that the examiner's latest finding "ignores the ample and persuasive evidence" that the intent of the Darlington closing was "indeed for the purpose of chilling unionism" in the textile chain.

"While [the] recommendation may bring comfort to the huge union-busting textile complexes in the South, a severe blow has been struck against the right of American workers to join a union of their own choice," it said.

"Moreover [the] recommendations, if allowed to stand, will wash down the drain some $7 million in backpay and restoration to similar jobs, awarded under a previous NLRB decision."

Buchanan held hearings over a five-month period under the Supreme Court mandate. He ruled that:

- Darlington management did not close the mill to discourage unions in its other plants.
- The evidence does not indicate it was "realistically foreseeable" that employes at other company plants would fear their plant would be shut down "if they persisted in organizational activities" or that the employes "were in fact so led to fear."
- Any claim of labor law violation should be dismissed.

In Buchanan's first ruling, on Apr. 30, 1957, he concluded that the Darlington closing was an act of discrimination against the employes. He made three supplementary reports before the board itself ruled, in October 1962, that the mill had been closed to avoid dealing with the union, and that the employes who lost their jobs were unlawfully discharged.

The board also ruled then that Darlington and Deering Milliken constituted a single employer under the labor relations statute, should share the cost of backpay for the fired workers and should rehire them at other company mills or put them on a preferential rehiring list.

The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1963 refused to enforce the board's order but the Supreme Court vacated that judgment. It held that while an employer has the legal right "to terminate his entire business for any reason he pleases," the partial closing of a business is unlawful "if motivated by a purpose to chill unionism" in his other plants and if the employer could "reasonably" have foreseen the closing could have that effect.

Time Lost in Strikes Up in Great Britain

London, Eng.—The number of mandays lost because of strikes went up by 650,000 to 2,925,000 in 1965 despite a drop in the number of walkouts, the Labor Ministry reported. Strikes totaled 2,354, or 170 fewer than in 1964.

Bert Seidman to Head Dept. of Social Security

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the appointment of Bert Seidman as director of the Dept. of Social Security.

Seidman, who served as an economist in the Dept. of Research of the former AFL and the AFL-CIO, returned recently from a four-year assignment in Europe as the federation's economic representative to assume his new post.

He succeeds Raymond Munts, who is joining the Institute for Research on Poverty at the University of Wisconsin as a research associate specializing in Social Security problems.

Seidman has served as a member of the U.S. delegation to the annual conferences of the Intl. Labor Organization since 1958 and as a public adviser to the U.S. delegation which conducted tariff negotiations in 1955, 1961 and 1964.

Prior to his overseas assignment, he represented the AFL-CIO on a number of advisory committees dealing with housing, statistics and budget procedures, and on the board of directors of the National Housing Conference.

In Europe he served as a member of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development as well as on delegations and committees of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Seidman, 47, holds bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Wisconsin. He is married and has three children.

New Airline Pact Called 'Best Ever'

Aug. 15 as the House Rules Committee was preparing to act on legislation to force the strikers back to work. The bill had been approved by the Senate and the House Commerce Committee. The Senate bill would have broken the strike and ordered up to 180 more days of mediation.

The AFL-CIO and a number of its affiliated organizations had opposed the legislation. Federation Pres. George Meany, refused permission to testify at House and Senate committee hearings, sent messages strongly opposing any law sending free Americans back to work for private employers against their will and urging the airlines to settle the dispute at the bargaining table.

A proposal that the government take over the struck airlines while negotiations continued was defeated in the House Commerce Committee, where an amendment by Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) was rejected.

Long Negotiations

The proposal submitted to IAM members was made after long drawn-out negotiations between union and management with the assistance of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Assistant Sec. James J. Reynolds and other mediators.

The union said the contract proposal will affect 19,000 mechanics whose top pay rate has been $3.52 an hour and 16,000 others—mostly ramp service employes paid $2.82 an hour, cleaners getting $2.49, food service employes and stores clerks.

Here is the IAM's summary of the proposed three-year agreement:

WAGES: Effective Jan. 1, 1966, a 5 percent general wage increase; effective Jan. 1, 1967, another 5 percent hike, and a third 5 percent raise on May 1, 1968.

COST OF LIVING: Changes in the cost of living from July 1, 1967, through Dec. 31, 1967, will be reflected in an adjustment effective Jan. 1, 1968, based upon raises of 1 cent an hour for every living-cost rise of four-tenths of 1 percent, to a maximum of 3 cents an hour.

Cost increases between March and August 1968 will be reflected in an adjustment of 3 cents an hour or less, effective Sept. 1, 1968. No downward adjustment may reduce basic hourly rates.

This is the first such clause negotiated in this industry and is, the union said, "one of the major achievements of this settlement." The clause could mean a 6-cent increase by 1968.

HOLIDAYS: Effective on signing, workers will get Good Friday as an additional paid holiday. All time worked on holidays will be at double time and a half.

HEALTH AND WELFARE: Carriers which do not now pay benefits for dependents will pay 5 cents an hour up to $2 a week as of next Jan. 1. There will be no increase in premiums during the contract terms.

PROGRESSION PAY SCHEDULES: The next-to-last step will be eliminated Jan. 1, 1967. Individuals within that step will move to the top of the wage scale in their classification. One year later, everyone in the first step of the scale will more to the second step.

VACATIONS: Employes with 15 years of service will be eligible for four weeks' vacation as of next Jan. 1. A year later, those with eight years of service will receive three weeks. The former schedules called for 20 years and 10, respectively.

The employers agreed that the strike period will not be deducted from service records in determining vacation eligibility.

PAY PREMIUM: Effective next Jan. 1, the employer will pay an additional 5 cents an hour to mechanics, lead mechanics and inspectors on line aircraft maintenance working four hours a day or more. Eastern Airlines already pays 3 cents an hour, which will rise to 5 cents.

The contract offer was the third made to the IAM since joint negotiations started last October. A special board headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) proposed terms which were rejected by the union negotiators. Another settlement, announced by Pres. Johnson July 29, was rejected 3-1 in a secret ballot vote. The latest offer is a "substantial" improvement over the other two, union sources said.

UNITY BUTTON, symbolizing the solidarity of eight AFL-CIO unions bargaining with General Electric and Westinghouse, is pinned on leaders of four of the unions by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. From left: Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Sec.-Treas. Matthew DeMore of the Machinists, and Pres. Russell M. Stephens of the Technical Engineers. Some 180,000 union members wore the buttons to work on Aug. 16, designated as "Unity Day."

Second Group Wins Aid Under Auto Trade Pact

A second group of Auto Workers has been certified as eligible to apply for adjustment assistance under the Automotive Products Trade Act of 1965, the Labor Dept. has announced.

The group is made up of about 400 members of Local 730. They lost their jobs at General Motors' Fisher Body Plant No. 2, Grand Rapids, Mich., because the production of soft trim for Chevy II and Chevelle models was transferred to the company's plant in Windsor, Ont., the Automotive Agreement Adjustment Assistance Board ruled.

They were certified eligible to ask for aid on the ground that the primary factor in the job dislocation was the U.S.-Canadian Automotive Products Agreement, the board found.

The determination makes the Local 730 members eligible for trade adjustment allowances, counseling and retraining (including training allowances), and relocation grants.

Workers who qualify are entitled to maximum allowances of $70 a week for up to 52 weeks; the "reasonable" cost of moving the worker, his family and his household goods when he gets a new job, and a lump sum equal to 2.5 times the average weekly manufacturing wage according to the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The assistance board is composed of Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz as chairman, Sec. of Commerce John T. Connor and Sec. of the Treasury Henry H. Fowler. It was set up under the law implementing the U.S.-Canadian agreement that wiped out duties between the nations on motor vehicles and original parts.

The first unit of workers ruled eligible for aid was made up of some 200 members of UAW Local 918 at a Ford Motor Co. parts depot in Pennsauken, N. J., whose operation had been transferred to Canada in November 1965.

Interest Rate Curbs Asked By Meany

New housing starts are already down to the lowest level since the spring of 1961 and probably are going down even lower—at a time when the rebuilding of America's cities is urgently needed."

Consumers, small businessmen and farmers "frequently" have to pay effective interest rates "as high as 10 percent and more," Meany said. The only beneficiaries, he added, are the commercial banks and the holders of large blocks of government and corporate bonds.

He concluded:

"I also urge the Administration and Congress to effectively curb the business investment boom in new plants and machines, and thereby make more funds available for residential construction, consumers, small businessmen and farmers."

Union Wins Despite Racists In Mississippi

Canton, Miss.—Appeals to race prejudice and hostility from politicians and businessmen failed to derail a union organizing drive at the local plant of Udico Mfg. Co. as workers voted 89-73 for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a National Labor Relations Board election.

Udico is a "runaway" shop from California. It produces electric can-openers and electric shoeshine machines.

The union found local halls could not be rented for its meetings and workers drove to Jackson, 60 miles away, when IUE's Vickers Local 792 offered its hall.

In Canton, workers received unsolicited phone calls from the mayor, city councilmen and business leaders advising them to expect unpleasant consequences if the union won at Udico.

Suddenly-organized "friends of Canton" used letters and full-page ads to warn workers about the dangers of unionism.

All such tactics failed to sway a majority in a plant where bread-and-butter issues were considered more important—$1.30 an hour wages, layoffs with no recall rights, lack of seniority and hazardous working conditions.

After the election, union members prepared to elect officers and draft contract proposals, the IUE reported.

Court Upholds Unions On GE Bargaining Team

do everything possible to obtain fair agreements, early and peacefully."

The IUE bargains nationally with GE for its members; the other unions negotiate locally at the plant level. All eight AFL-CIO unions are coordinating their bargaining.

Just two days before the court decision, members of the eight unions demonstrated their solidarity.

On Unity Day, Aug. 16, the 180,000 union members reported for work at GE and Westinghouse plants throughout the nation wearing identical buttons carrying the initials of all eight unions.

The buttons were worn too by their top leaders—many of whom had them pinned on by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a ceremony in Washington.

The Unity Day statement by the eight-union coordinating group, issued by Meany, said the display of unity buttons symbolized the "united determination" of the union members "to achieve economic justice from employers who are well able to provide it."

It pointed out that almost all of the wage increases received by GE and Westinghouse workers since 1960 have been cancelled by the rise in the cost of living.

"The 5 percent increase in wages since 1963 has been swamped by a 6 percent surge in living costs," the unions stressed. "Meanwhile, GE and Westinghouse profits have doubled."

Statements issued by GE, the unions asserted, indicate that the company will once again present a take-it-or-leave-it offer and "will place its reliance on a propaganda campaign designed to try to frighten and divide its workers."

"This tactic has at times been effective in the past when there were divisions in our ranks," the unions noted. "It will not work this time. We will not accept any first offer as a last offer because GE so describes it."

Members of the AFL-CIO inter-union committee are, in addition to IUE, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers and Flint Glass Workers. Cooperating with the committee are three other unions which represent smaller units of GE and Westinghouse workers, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

NILE Director Named Professor

Dr. Joseph Mire, executive director of the National Institute of Labor Education since 1955, has been appointed a research professor in the Dept. of Economics at American University in Washington.

A native of Austria, Mire for 14 years was an economics and legal advisor for the Chamber of Labor in Vienna, taught labor legislation and did economic research at Ruskin College, Oxford, England, and for eight years was education and research director for the State, County & Municipal Employes.

NILE is now affiliated with American University.

Council Urges Bargaining in Hospital Strike

Oak Ridge, Tenn.—The Oak Ridge City Council has urged the trustees of Oak Ridge Hospital to bargain collectively with a union representing 200 hospital employes who have been on strike since July 9.

By a 9-3 vote the city fathers passed a resolution calling on the trustees to bargain with Building Service Employes Local 150T.

As long ago as 1958, the union recalled, hospital management announced that if employes voted for union representation, the hospital would recognize the union and bargain with it.

The employes recently selected Local 150T and several negotiating meetings were held, but management told committeemen it would not recognize them as employe bargaining representatives, union Pres. H. B. Adams said.

The refusal to bargain followed a management announcement July 1 that all pay scales would be raised at least 10 percent. At the same time, room rates were advanced by an average of $7 a day, according to the local.

Laborers Win Rights In Defense Dept. Unit

Mechanicsburg, Pa. — The Laborers won exclusive bargaining rights for a unit of 1,200 employes of the Defense Dept. Supply Depot here in an election among civilian federal workers.

DELEGATES AND WIVES at the Postal Clerks convention banquet in Louisville give an ovation to UFPC Pres. E. C. Hallbeck. Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien addressed the dinner, held midway through the weeklong convention.

Postal Clerks Hike Per Capita To Finance Stepped-Up Activities

Louisville, Ky.—More than 1,000 delegates to the 34th biennial convention of the Postal Clerks adopted a program calling for stepped-up legislative, bargaining and servicing activities—and approved a per capita increase to finance it.

The convention voted overwhelmingly to raise the monthly per capita tax from $1 to $1.35, effective Jan. 1, 1967. It will be the first increase for the 160,000-member union since 1961.

As its "paramount" legislative goal for the next two years, the convention called for "union recognition by law," including provisions for binding arbitration of disputes and penalties for violations of union recognition policies. Federal employes presently have bargaining rights granted by presidential executive order, with no provisions for final resolution of disputes.

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck won easy re-election to a fourth two-year term. He polled 1,062 votes against a total of 237 for two opponents.

Delegates also re-elected Legislative Dir. Patrick J. Nilan, Exec. Vice Pres. Don E. Dunn, Administrative Vice Pres. Henry T. Anglim, Sec.-Treas. Owen H. Schoon, Organization Dir. Joseph F. Thomas, Administrative Aide Francis S. Fibley and Research Dir. William E. Price.

Emmet Andrews of San Franciso was elected executive aide, succeeding Joseph V. Silvestri, who retired. Delegates also elected 15 regional vice presidents. The large number of elective offices reflects a series of merger agreements among postal clerk organizations in recent years.

The convention voted unanimously to institute legal action against the Post Office Dept. to force compliance with basic workweek schedules established by Congress last year if the department does not act promptly to end "arbitrary" changes of workweek assignments.

Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, who addressed the convention banquet shortly after the vote, told the delegates that the department has agreed to use mediation next year to settle bargaining impasses. He termed it "a historic advance in our employe-management relations."

The convention also listed among its "major legislative goals":

- Time-and-one-half for Saturday work; double time for Sunday and holiday work, and overtime for substitutes after eight hours in a day.
- A 35-hour workweek.
- Elimination of temporary employes.
- Liberalization of the Hatch Act which restricts political activities by federal employes.
- Improved retirement and insurance benefits.
- Job protection against automation.
- Upgrading of postal clerks in the pay schedule.
- Elimination of the Post Office's work measurement system, described as a "speed-up" program.

The convention selected Minneapolis as the site for the 1968 convention.

Reinsurance Program Urged for Pensions

A federal reinsurance program to safeguard pension rights of workers was strongly urged by Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the committee he "wholeheartedly" supports the intent of legislation to set up such a program, but he suggested the problem be more thoroughly explored before Congress acts.

The committee has before it a bill by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) to set up a federal insurance system for private pension plans comparable to that now provided for bank deposits.

Such a system was urged in an AFL-CIO convention resolution which cited the "tragedies" of workers who have lost their pension rights when companies went out of business or pension fund investments went sour.

Reuther told the committee that more than 25 million Americans are now covered by pension plans and the security of the funds on which they depend for a retirement income "has clearly become a matter of vital public concern."

He noted that some 7,000 retirement plans were terminated between 1953 and 1965, "drastically" affecting the pension expectations of many thousands of workers.

Wirtz testified that many pension plans now in effect do not provide adequate protection against discontinuance and loss of promised benefits. He stressed that any federal insurance plan would have to be coupled with federal standards and controls, as is the case with insurance of bank deposits.

The Labor Dept. and a federal interagency task force are currently exploring problems affecting private pension plans, he told the committee, and "further studies will undoubtedly be necessary."

Nevada Labor Seeks to Ease 'Work' Law

Las Vegas, Nev.—A broad program of state social legislation, highlighted by a proposal to take the teeth out of the so-called "right-to-work" law, was approved by 300 delegates to the Nevada AFL-CIO convention.

They also urged improved unemployment compensation and workmen's compensation benefits, enactment of benefits for off-the-job sickness and accidents, stricter health and safety laws and a 48-hour workweek and the right to organize for firemen, who now spend 56 hours on the job each week and are not permitted to form their own unions.

The delegates endorsed Ralph Denton (D), Boulder City attorney, for the at-large congressional seat now held by Rep. Walter S. Baring. Baring, also a Democrat, defeated Denton by only 1,500 votes in the 1964 party primary.

Also endorsed were Democratic state officials seeking re-election—Gov. Grant Sawyer, a convention speaker; Atty. Gen. Harvey Dickerson; Sec. of State John Koontz; State Comptroller Keith Lee; State Printer John A. McCarthy, who is seeking his ninth term, and State Supreme Court Justice John Collins.

Speakers included Dir. Daniel V. Flanagan of AFL-CIO Region XXII; Stanton Smith, coordinator of AFL-CIO central bodies; Margaret Thornburgh, western director of women's activities for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, and Sen. Howard C. Cannon (R-Nev.).

Sec.-Treas. Louis Paley, a member of the Laborers, was re-elected without opposition, as were three vice presidents—Boyd Manning, of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; John Morman, of the Carpenters, and Keith Hickman, of the Painters. Other state officers will be voted on next year.

Coverage Up 7.2 Million:

Senate Unit Votes $1.60 Wage Bill

reach $1.30 and non-farm workers catch up with the $1.60 wage floor. An estimated 725,000 of the 6.1 million newly-covered non-farm workers and some 180,000 of the 390,000 farm workers to be covered make less than $1 an hour.

Most newly-covered employes would start with a 44-hour maximum straight-time workweek, dropping in two annual steps to 40 hours.

Both the House and Senate bills would extend coverage to 1.5 million retail employes, 425,000 restaurant and 275,000 hotel workers, more than 1.47 million employes in hospitals and nursing homes, 580,000 construction workers, 505,000 laundry and dry cleaning workers, and substantial numbers of federal employes, taxi drivers, transit workers, loggers and agricultural processing workers.

A historic breakthrough is inclusion—for the first time in the history of the Fair Labor Standards Act—of farm workers. Only farms using substantial numbers of hired workers would be covered. The Senate bill would cover some 390,000 out of 1.9 million agricultural workers.

The Senate committee eliminated from the House bill's proposed coverage some 900,000 employes of local school systems, such as janitors and maintenance men.

Credit on Tips

It also permitted employers to credit tips received by employes for up to 50 percent of the minimum wage; the House bill limited the offset to 45 percent.

It permits a longer seasonal exemption from overtime requirements for agricultural processing workers than does the House bill, although both measures are an improvement over present law. And the Senate committee also voted to exempt nursing home employes from overtime coverage.

On the plus side, the Senate panel improved the House bill by eliminating the present overtime exemption for operating employes of large transit companies, expanding coverage in the Panama Canal Zone, and dropping special exemptions for young people and so-called "management trainees."

It also provided for a three-step inclusion of handicapped employes in sheltered workshops, with provisions for special exemptions for severely handicapped workers.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), who was chairman of the subcommittee which first handled the bill, will be its floor leader in the Senate. Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.), who fought to cut back the bill in committee although eventually voting to report it to the floor, is expected to lead the drive for restrictive amendments.

Group Plan To Operate Own Hospital

New York—The state legislature passed, and Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) signed, a labor-backed bill to permit the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York to own and operate its own hospitals.

The new law will make it possible for HIP hospitals to provide integrated health care at lower cost than in comparable voluntary hospitals, according to HIP Pres. James Brindle.

Currently, subscribers who receive doctors' care at HIP group medical centers often are unable to get hospital care by the same group of doctors because all do not have admittance privileges at the same hospitals, Brindle said. He added:

"Operating our own hospitals will enable us to coordinate patient care, lower costs to the patient by avoiding duplication of X-ray procedures, and have better controls on quality."

Group medical plans that own their own hospitals can, Brindle said, show "substantially lower" hospital insurance costs than other insurance plans. Negotiations are under way, he said, to convert one or more area hospitals into an HIP-operated voluntary community hospital.

Utah AFL-CIO Votes Hike in Per Capita Tax

Salt Lake City—The 10th annual convention of the Utah AFL-CIO moved toward an expanded activities program by approving the first per capita dues increase since the merger of former AFL and CIO state central bodies in 1956.

Delegates from 100 affiliated local unions voted to raise the dues from 10 cents per member per month to 15 cents, effective next Jan. 1.

Resolutions stressed the need for stepped-up activity in the fields of education, public relations and political action.

Ormond Konkle, secretary-treasurer since the merger, was re-elected for another two-year term. Other members of the executive council were returned for one-year terms, and Mrs. Dora Davis was chosen to fill a District 3 vacancy caused by the retirement of Leo H. Erickson, Jr.

The term of Council Pres. C. E. Berger has one more year to run.

Konkle and other officers reported that state body affiliations increased by 18 since the last convention. They cited the benefits expected from increased income and expanded programs, particularly in publicizing labor's objectives and achievements.

The convention approved the addition to the education committee of key leaders from representative areas of the state to work with local central bodies, unions, colleges and universities on special programs in labor education, public information and other subjects.

The delegates instructed officers to seek amendments in the next session of the Legislature to provide death benefits for injured workmen under state compensation laws and to support enactment of an "enforceable prevailing wage law," and called on Gov. Calvin L. Rampton (D) and the legislature to authorize a study by the Legislative Council of the need for low-rent housing.

Also approved was a resolution calling for passage of federal legislation to construct two dams in the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River to provide more water for states in the Colorado basin.

Union Staff Members Return to School

In an increasingly complex industrial world, the full-time union staff representative has to go far beyond traditional services to members and prepare himself to protect them against such things as management's use of industrial engineering techniques. The AFL-CIO has undertaken training at Union Industrial Engineering Institutes at the University of Wisconsin in cooperation with the UW School for Workers. This year it offered courses in establishing work standards, which included time study; job evaluation and related problems. Students worked long and hard to acquire knowledge and skills to meet management on its own terms. Some highlights of their class and field work are shown here.

CONCENTRATION of students (above) and instructors (right) proved essential to the course in synthetic standards systems, designed for those with training in stopwatch time study. It included such things as work sampling, stopwatch standard data, standard data formulas, predetermined motion times.

JOB EVALUATION study included application of what was learned in class to the work of Earl Dahl (right center), university technician, and a related mock arbitration session (above).

The Interest Squeeze

IN ALL THE DISCUSSION about rising prices and inflation—much of it confused and misleading—the largest single increase has been the price of money.

In the past nine months interest rates for the borrowers with the best possible credit ratings have increased 33 1/3 percent. For those who do not quality for the prime rate, the cost of money has risen even more sharply.

This price increase affects every American family. It directly raises the cost of buying a home, improving or repairing it. It hikes the cost of purchasing an automobile or a major appliance.

It affects every aspect of American life where the borrowing of money for short-term emergency needs or long-term purchases is involved.

THE INTEREST RATE blast-off started last December when the Federal Reserve Board increased the rate at which banks can borrow funds from the federal government from 4 to 4.5 percent. It also lifted the permissible interest rate which commercial banks can pay on so-called certificates of deposit from 4.5 to 5.5 percent.

A certificate of deposit had been a very specialized banking instrument involving large investors and large amounts of money. The ordinary American with a savings or checking account had in all probability never heard of this high-finance device.

But with the government allowing higher interest rates, the banks redesigned the certificates of deposit, dropped the minimum to as low as $100 in some cases and made the cash-in provisions more flexible.

The result: in the first four months of 1966 about 87 percent of the increase in savings went to the commercial banks. With deposits off, the savings banks and the savings and loan associations, which together make over half of all home mortgage and improvement loans, had limited funds; home building dropped off seriously because of the lack of mortgage money.

The scarcity of mortgage money sent up its price so that today the American trying to purchase a home has to pay 6.5 percent for a conventional mortgage.

WHAT'S HAPPENED to mortgage interest rates is happening also in other areas as rate increases have piled up on each other to reach the current impossibly high levels.

The beneficiaries of soaring interest rates have been the commercial banks and the large investors who can move their investments around easily to take advantage of the higher return on their money.

The victims are the low and middle-income Americans who are forced either to postpone purchases or reconsider the timing of them because of higher price tags resulting from the higher price of money.

The key is in the hands of the federal government. It can control and regulate the amount of interest banks and other lenders can charge. Through its monetary policies it can affect government borrowing rates.

Runaway interest rates must be stopped and rolled back. The government has the power and the authority. Its failure to act could well bring on a real and crippling inflationary situation.

'Generous Dose of Bargaining' Bar to Conflict Over Automation

A National Labor Relations Board member, Sam Zagoria, recently discussed the problems of automation and job losses with the labor law section of the Minnesota Bar Association. Excerpts from his speech appear below:

THERE ARE VARYING PREDICTIONS of how sharply cybernation—the linking of the computer to automation—will affect employment rolls, but there is little disagreement among the experts on the fact that worker relocations, worker retraining, early worker retirements and other changes are inevitable.

Already, when youngsters are preparing to shoulder their first jobs, the Labor Dept. is warning, "No longer can a boy or girl expect just one occupation to cover a lifetime of work. Even today, a 20-year-old man could be expected to change jobs six or seven times during his work life expectancy of 43 years."

The President and Congress recognized the vast dimensions of prospective change in establishing the National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress. This group of outstanding leaders of business, labor, education and government issued a landmark report, which I hope will be the basis for future action in the private and public sectors of our economy. The commission recognized that while the fruits of automation can assure most of us comfortable, satisfying lives, for the displaced worker there may be only the bitter pits of rejection.

Some enterprising and progressive firms and unions have taken the lead in establishing special automation funds. The title of these funds suggests that their objective is to help the displaced worker. However, Prof. Thomas Kennedy of the Harvard Business School, in an intensive study of the seven major automation funds in effect in 1962, concludes that while they helped the continuing workers, "they provided little or nothing in the way of benefits for the workers displaced by automation."

Kennedy recommends that automation programs aim "(1) to recapture for displaced workers their accumulated benefit rights and competitive-status seniority rights or to compensate them for [their] loss; (2) to help the displaced workers find new jobs by financing unemployment service, retraining and relocation costs to the extent that such benefits are not provided adequately by the government; (3) to provide the displaced workers with more adequate income, including welfare benefits, during the transition period."

I submit that a major contribution to clearing the way for a peaceful transition to automation lies in planning and communication, with across-the-board participation of labor and management. In short, a generous dose of collective bargaining is the best preventive medicine to avoid conflict.

WILLIAM E. SIMKIN, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, recently reported that "we are making really significant progress at the bargaining table in negotiating adjustments in manpower usage and work practices frequently associated with automation and changing technology. These are potentially explosive issues."

His distinguished predecessor, Cyrus Ching, now 90, puts it this way: "The idea of forcing industry to freeze people on the job regardless of company investment in improved production machinery is shortsighted on the part of labor. But management's unwillingness to face the problem that something has to be done for employes who are hurt is equally shortsighted.

"What's needed is a realization on the part of both labor and management that they have to live together."

IN NOVA SCOTIA, representatives of labor and management hammered out an Automation Code and its principles are being implemented in contracts. It has been agreed upon as a codicil to the general agreement of the Eastern Canada Newsprint Group, according to A. E. Balloch, president of the Bowaters Mersey Paper Co., a prime mover in the effort.

The Automation Code emphasizes advance planning and consultation between labor and management on all projects which are liable to result in displacement. With this advance planning, a personnel plan can be drawn up to match the capital spending plan.

Immediate steps are begun to absorb men elsewhere who may not be needed; internal transfers are undertaken with every man affected considered individually and "in some cases five or six moves [are] made to look after one man whose job is vanishing, but with careful planning everyone concerned may benefit;" others receive retraining on the job or as supernumerary learners, and in severe displacement, early retirement to men approaching retirement age, relocation for younger men or transfers to other units of the company are undertaken.

Senseless Killings Show Need For Careful Gun Regulation

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

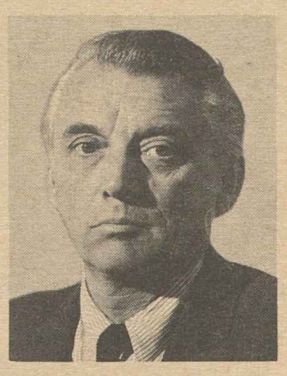
ONE OF WASHINGTON'S most prestigious and influential men, aghast, asked a dinner companion after the Austin massacre, "What manner of madness is this?" In Baltimore, an internationally known psychonanalyst shook his head, said he couldn't possibly make an intelligent comment on the macabre tragedy without studying the case history of the possessed young man who caused it.



Morgan

A New York psychiatrist suggested that there was a definite "triggering" connected between the slaughter of the eight student nurses in Chicago and the deadly aim of the sniper from the campus tower at the University of Texas. This doctor added the warning that others with criminally insane tendencies might take their cue to violence from this latest incident.

It all leaves the layman slightly wilted with horror and helplessness. It brings home the realization that with all the marvels of the scientific age increasing man's comforts and expanding his horizons of discovery, there are dark recesses of the mind still unknown and unexplored. Meanwhile, unfairly but inevitably, the image of America as a savage paradise for bloodthirsty, gun-totin' wild men is girdling the globe again on the gas of misunderstanding, giddy generalizations and downright propaganda. One thing the reaction adds up to is the fact that the press everywhere can be sensation-seeking, superficial and irresponsible and that where crimes of violence are concerned, the public appetite for the gory details knows no national boundaries.

Probably, because of its dominating world position of wealth, power and, let's face it, a recurrently overbearing attitude of self-righteous morality, the United States becomes more of a target for criticism, some of it given with diabolical delight, when such things happen here.

One of the more misguided comments came from a Japanese news agency which said the Austin massacre "resulted from an unbalanced situation because of an increased gap between the rich and the poor, some of whom are unwillingly sent to Viet Nam." Charles J. Whitman was neither rich nor poor but a member of the growing middle class. There is a dangerous gap isolating the poor in this country from the good life and racial prejudice adds a lethal charge to that situation, but there is no indication of any racial overtones to the mass killings in Chicago and Austin.

Society cannot be totally protected from such hideous crimes any more than a President can be totally protected from a mad assassin. It may be that life in America is more violent than in other countries, though it happens the Soviet Union is currently in the grips of a rising crime wave. Whatever the statistical facts, the overriding fact of the moment is that life is more violent in this country than it should be.

Legislation regulating the commerce in guns would not have prevented the fiendish slayings of the young nurses in Chicago and might not have prevented the killing or wounding of nearly 50 people in Austin. The heavy fact remains, as Connecticut's Sen. Thomas Dodd reemphasized, that tens of thousands of people annually are murdered or wounded in this country by guns. So it was neither untimely nor that Pres. Johnson used the shock of the Austin incident to demand stronger legislation to control the sale and use of firearms.

If the President's appeal to Congress was quickened by his anguish over the luckless fact that again his native Texas had been the scene of senseless murder by rifle, it is understandable. Nor is his action made less genuine by the revelation that the Johnson family knew one of the victims.

THERE IS NO VALIDITY to the worried warning of the lobbies opposing more sensible gun laws that action should not be taken in the "emotions of the moment." How many more wanton murders, let alone massacres, are needed to dramatize the need for careful restrictions?

Dodd's relatively mild bill to ban mail order sales of pistols and revolvers and restrict interstate purchases of rifles and shotguns has been bottled up for months in the Senate Judiciary Committee, vigilantly presided over by Sen. James Eastland of Mississippi, despite the fact that the Johnson Administration long ago called for curbs on dangerous traffic in firearms.

Now the President is asking that the Dodd measure bans be broadened to cover mail order sales of rifles and shotguns. This will trigger a thunderous barrage of protest from the National Rifle Association and other so-called sportsmen's groups which have formed a dubious but effective lobby against legislation so far. The NRA, denying the necessity of any meaningful regulation of gun sales, argues that the problem is detecting and isolating criminals and mentally ill. Both precautions are necessary and anyone who ignores these needs ought to have his head examined.

Labor News Conference:

Profits Rising Faster Than Pay, Top Labor Economist Declares

IF THERE IS any inflation in the United States today "it is profit inflation," organized labor's top economist declared in a network radio interview.

Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research said that between 1960 and 1965, corporate profits after taxes soared 67 percent, while "in sharp contrast, total wage, salary and fringe benefit payments to all workers . . . increased only 33 percent."

During the same period, unit labor costs for industrial goods dropped while prices have gone up, and the spread, he said, "is now greater than at any time in the past 15 years—since the middle of 1951." His statements came on Labor News Conference, weekly public affairs program on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The resulting higher living costs "are washing out a large part of the gains in hourly wages," Goldfinger said, and the lag of worker buying power should be offset by substantial wage increases "that can, and should, come out of the enormous profits of American industry."

In fact, he added, industries in which productivity is rising rapidly "can very often grant a substantial wage increase and also afford to reduce prices somewhat."

GOLDFINGER renewed organized labor's call for repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit, which, he said, is causing "a super boom of business investment in new plants and machines . . . productive capacity way out of line with the economy's ability, under ordinary circumstances, to buy what can be produced."

"If there ever were an argument in the past for such a subsidy . . . there certainly is a powerful argument for dropping it now, when it is causing trouble," he asserted.

Questioning Goldfinger on the AFL-CIO produced program were Stanley Levey, labor correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, and William Easton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SIGNIFICANCE of individual votes in both primaries and general elections—this year as in every other election year—is underscored by recalling the results of the Senate race in Montana in 1960.

Lee Metcalf, Democrat, running for the Senate after several terms as a House member, won election by a margin of 4,050 over the Republican nominee. The specific account was 140,231 for Metcalf, 136, 281 for his rival.

The margin was less than 1.5 percent of the total vote.

So Metcalf went to the Senate, instead of being retired to private life. Five years later—last January—he was named to fill a vacancy on the Senate Finance Committee. And when the pending unemployment compensation bill reached the committee a little later, amendments adding key federal standards on length and amount of minimum benefits were approved in committee by only a single vote. Metcalf represented the single vote.

So the bill went to the full Senate bearing committee approval of federal standards, and they were held in the bill in a hard floor fight.

The bill is not yet finally passed in the scope approved by the Senate; the House did not vote on any proposed federal standards and the issue is the exact language adopted in conference committee for final vote in both houses. But the conferees would not even consider the question except for the Senate vote, and Metcalf's committee vote eased the way for the broad-scale Senate action.

A few votes cast in 1960, five years of accumulated seniority and Metcalf's committee appointment following the retirement of the elder Sen. Harry F. Byrd, and the potential result is a major improvement in a long neglected and uncorrected deficiency in the 30-year-old jobless insurance program throughout the nation.

For poignant reminders to citizens, Metcalf has just been renominated for a second term, the Republicans choosing the conservative Gov. Tim Babcock to run against him. The chance that Babcock would ever vote to approve strengthening amendments to a key piece of social legislation can be rated as non-existent.

THE PRIMARY RESULTS in various West Coast and Mountain states, it should be observed, have now set up a good many elections where the issue will be that of a right-wing Republican against a liberal Democrat. California and the Mountain States were Goldwater territory in 1963-64; the indication is that, in the GOP organizations, they still are this year.

Ronald Reagan, who raised money for Goldwater in 1964, was an easy victor over the moderate Republican candidate, George Christopher, for nomination as governor. Babcock of Montana was an avowed pro-Goldwater man, and Gov. Cliff Hansen of Wyoming called out dogs to protect the state legislature against the alleged threat of union members opposing a pending right-to-work bill. Now they have both been nominated for the Senate.

An argument can be made, as well, that the pro-Goldwater Republicans are still running party affairs in the South—where in Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama and South Carolina the GOP nominees for governor or senator are the ones who created the machine that delivered Republican convention delegates to Goldwater in a monolithic bloc.

They include Rep. "Bo" Calloway of Georgia, Rep. James Martin of Alabama, Rep. Prestiss Walker of Mississippi (seeking to prove that incumbent Democratic Sen. James O. Eastland is a dangerous liberal and softie), incumbent party-switching Sen. Strom Thurmond in South Carolina.

Nelson A. Rockefeller, arch-rival of Goldwater in 1964, managed to squeeze out potential party opposition in running for re-election as governor of New York—but it isn't sure he can be re-elected even after getting renominated.

A political issue in this country sometimes is not really settled in a single election; the losers strive to live on to fight another day.

INFLATION, if it does exist, is the result of "profit inflation," Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger (center) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research declared as he was questioned by William Eaton (left) of the Chicago Daily News and Stanley Levey of Scripps-Howard on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO produced public affairs program on the Mutual Radio Network.

Survey of Consumer Problems Finds Rise in Auto Repair Gyps

by Sidney Margolius

CAR REPAIR frauds, and especially "bait" ads for transmission repairs, are on the increase, a survey of current consumer problems by this department finds.

In the survey, made among Better Business Bureaus, Legal Aid Societies and state legal authorities, car buying and repair problems lead the hit parade of consumer complaints. (Among the other leaders are installment-buying problems in general; easy loans promoted by small-loan companies with resultant garnishees and even bankruptcies, and a resurgence of food-freezer plans.)

There also are continuing reports of excessive charges for transmission repairs and engine overhaul, with low-income and moderate-income families especially hit hard.

You can't depend on exceptionally low prices advertised for overhauling an automatic transmission, the New York Better Business Bureau warns. Such offers as $59 or $75 are merely bait to get you into the shop. You then find yourself charged for all kinds of extras.

In a case cited by Vice Pres. G. K. Grimm of the Milwaukee Better Business Bureau, who puts auto repairs at the top of his complaint list, one repair firm advertised $40 for transmission repairs, but a customer wound up paying $125.

In California, complaints about auto repairs have led to the introduction of a bill in the legislature to require auto shops to register with the State Bureau of Repair Services, just as TV and radio repair dealers now must do. The bill was drafted with the aid of experienced journeymen mechanics associated with the Machinists' Automotive Legislative Committee.

In addition to guarding against "bait" transmission ads, you need to be careful of ads quoting bargain flat prices for brake linings and other jobs, the Akron BBB warns. The purported bargain may prove to be more costly than the charges made by responsible service companies.

Sometimes repair jobs performed by high-pressure shops may not be satisfactory even at the final high price. An Akron car owner answered an ad for a transmission exchange at a flat price. The final bill was $129—more than double the advertised price. But the transmission was worse than ever, and the repair company would not honor its six-month "guarantee."

Another frequent "bargain" offer which often results in excessive charges is bait ads for rebuilt motors. One New York firm was found to offer to install rebuilt motors for $109. But when customers came to pick up their cars they were charged several hundred dollars more for work they had not authorized.

There are no bargain car repairs if you expect competent work. The only way to keep down the cost is to take the best preventive possible care, and practice careful driving habits. When repairs are required, you also need to know how to select a competent shop.

With proper care, an automatic transmission should last 50,000 to 75,000 miles if you habitually drive in heavy city traffic, and 100,000 or more if most of your driving is done in light traffic.

DEFECTIVE or worn-out shock absorbers (after 25,000 miles) also can cause transmission failures as well as other problems, the Petroleum Division of Greenbelt (Md.) Consumer Services advises. But here, too, you need to beware of advertised cheap prices. High-quality shocks of the preferred multi-value type usually cost $8.50 to $12 each, and should be installed in pairs, these experts say.

In choosing a repair shop, look for these clues to competence:

- Does the shop look well organized and clean?
- Does the shop use modern test equipment such as engine operation and vacuum gauges, volt meters, osciloscope and a dynamometer which simulates road conditions?
- Is the shop experienced in your make, or at least in the type of repair you require?
- Is there any tendency towards high-pressure selling? (A good shop may recommend certain types of preventive maintenance such as lubrication and spark-plug regapping, but won't grasp the chance to sell you something just because you ask whether you need it, such as new spark plugs.)
- Does the serviceman diagnose carefully before he will say what the trouble is?
- A union shop is a definite added safeguard because the mechanics must go through a formal apprenticeship program plus additional training.

Requirements Overhauled:

FDA Revises Rules On Special Diet Aids

A MAJOR OVERHAUL of requirements for special diet foods and diet supplements has been announced by the government. The revisions affect labeling or content—or both—of those products.

The new regulations are aimed at providing the consumer with more facts about the food he buys for weight control, for dietary supplementation with vitamins and minerals, and for other special diet needs, such as controlling salt intake, Food & Drug Commissioner James L. Goddard explained.

Changes will include adoption of recommended dietary allowances as a guide to meeting nutritional needs. These allowances, based upon a report of the National Academy of Sciences, replace the 25-year-old outmoded concept of "minimum daily requirements." The FDA also will:

- Restrict "low calorie" labelling to those foods that contain 15 or fewer calories per serving.
- Limit "reduced in calorie" claims to those food products that contain at least 50 percent fewer calories than their ordinary counterparts.
- Establish eight classes of foods that may be "fortified" with vitamins and minerals. These include cereals and iodized salt.
- Stipulate which nutritional elements, and the amounts of each, may be used in "fortified" foods.
- Prohibit extravagant promotion of "shotgun" multi-vitamin and mineral supplements containing nutrients that meet no dietary need and tend to deceive the consumer.

The revised labeling regulations and the new standards for fortified foods and vitamin and mineral supplements will become effective at the end of the year. However, individual provisions may be stayed if there are legally justified requests for public hearings.

A general revision of regulations on special dietary foods and vitamin-mineral supplements was proposed by the FDA four years ago. More than 50,000 comments were received on the provisions suggested.

GODDARD SAID the new requirements should sweep away many of the common misconceptions about the kinds and amounts of vitamins and minerals needed in the diet, and how they are obtained.

He agreed that "some families in economically depressed areas do not have a varied or plentiful supply of foods, even though their diet does seem to provide their basic nutritional needs." But most normal diets supply these needs, he said.

He supported the food distribution programs of private and governmental agencies that amplify and lend greater variety to the diets of these deprived citizens. And he said that vitamin-mineral supplements are not the answer to their needs.

Losing a Wallet Snips the Ties Between You and Your Identity

By Jane Goodsell

LOSING your wallet is an existentialist experience which leaves you feeling loosely attached to the world, isolated from the mainstream of life and doubtful that you really exist. Having lost all tangible proof of your identity, you begin to wonder if maybe you've dissolved into thin air, and you scan the obituary columns half expecting to find yourself listed there.

Like Oedipus Rex bemoaning his fall from power, you think back wistfully to the days when you were a person of substance with credit cards, charge-a-plates, membership cards, driver's permit and fishing license. Now—bereft of supporting evidence that you are the person you claim to be—you are an anonymous soul adrift in the universe.

Should you succumb to the temptation to relate your woes to your friends, you'll find yourself lying awake nights envisioning yourself living out your days in the poorhouse.

Losing a wallet, like having surgery, always reminds people of parallel cases which ended in tragedy. Everybody knows somebody whose mother-in-law lost her wallet and was held responsible for over $2,000 worth of gasoline charged on her credit card.

WHEN YOU aren't entertaining visions of wild champagne parties being billed to your Diner's Club account, you are gnashing your teeth over might-have-beens. If only you'd checked to make sure your wallet was in your purse when you walked out of the theatre. Had you but known you'd lose your wallet, you'd have bought that $8.95 blouse you were contemplating. Then you'd be out only a few loose coins instead of the $10 bill that was left in your wallet.

Gradually, like someone emerging from a coma, you awaken to the realization that you just can't sit there lamenting your fate, and you set about the job of re-establishing your identity. In less time than it takes to do a thorough spring cleaning, you have bought a new wallet, replaced your identification cards and assumed your rightful place in the world as a real person.

Having acomplished that monumental task, you are assailed by the irrepressible hunch that now—when it's the last thing in the world you want—your old wallet is going to turn up.

PRESIDING at the 29th convention of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters in Kansas City is Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, who with other general officers was re-elected unanimously.

Plumbers Hike Dues, Per Capita, Hear Johnson Hail Labor's Role

By Gervase N. Love

Kansas City, Mo.—Delegates to the 29th general convention of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters voted to increase the per capita tax from $2 to $2.75 per member per month and adopted a companion resolution to raise the minimum monthly dues from $3 to $5 monthly.

Pres. Johnson, in a filmed message of greeting, hailed the union for its contributions to the country's progress and praised the 89th Congress for having chalked up a "tremendous record" despite "the disappointments we share" over failure to enact such legislation as repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

"But we've not abandoned the job," he said. "We intend to see that reason and justice ultimately prevail."

The President said that he did not want the economy "sidetracked" by the war in Viet Nam, and added:

"No other group of Americans, I think, has understood more clearly than labor the real significance of the events now transpiring in Southeast Asia.

"Communism, you know, claims to be the champion of the workingman. But the workers of America long ago saw through that masquerade. The American labor movement has demonstrated to workers throughout the world that fair wages, opportunity and justice are possible only within the framework of freedom."

The convention unanimously adopted a resolution attacking "certain legislative prima donnas" in Congress. Adding that the delegates "pledged themselves with renewed dedication and vigor to continue our fight for the passage of the situs picketing bill and repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act until victory is ours."

A pension plan for full-time officers and employes of local unions, long a subject of discussion, was approved in principle, with the general officers authorized to proceed with the necessary actuarial work, to establish a trust fund and adopt the necessary administrative procedures.

Local unions will contribute to the trust fund effective Jan. 1, 1967, 10 percent of the salaries of the officers and employes covered. The general officers were authorized to require contributions from those covered of up to 3 percent of their salaries, with a reduction of the amount due from the local to "about 8 percent" of salary.

Dir. Alexander E. Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education warned that labor will have to work hard for its congressional friends in the November election or face an anti-labor Congress for the following two years.

Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. declared it is "not good or healthy" that union members will work on only 40 to 60 percent of the $70 billion in construction Congress authorized in 1966.

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. lauded the union's organizational gains and pointed out that there are "still a vast number of unorganized to whom we must bring the blessings of union membership."

Other Speakers

Other speakers included Pres. Russell K. Berg of the Boiler Makers; Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.); state and local government leaders headed by Gov. Warren E. Hearnes (D-Mo.), Mayor Ilus W. Davis of Kansas City, Mo., and Mayor James McDowell of Kansas City, Kan., and representatives of the U.S. and Canadian construction industry.

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, Sec.-Treas. Martin J. Ward, Assistant Pres. John J. McCartin, Assistant Sec.-Treas. Leslie B. Dilg and Executive Vice Pres. William T. Dodd and six vice presidents were re-elected without opposition.

They were obligated by John W. Bruce, 91-year-old delegate from Toronto, Ont., Local 46, who was presented with a pin and testimonial on his 60 years of membership. A former general organizer, Bruce recalled that when he first went to work for the international 50 years ago he was paid $1,800 a year.

Thomas McGlynn, business manager of New York City Local 638, died of a heart attack during the convention.

Organizing Drive Set By Transport Service

Chicago—The United Transport Service Employes launched a combination organizing and education campaign at its 15th biennial convention here.

Assessments ranging from $6 to $20 per member to finance the program for the next two years were approved by 55 delegates representing the union's 3,000 members. The organizing-education levy is based on income level. The union represents some industrial workers and redcaps and skycaps at railroad and air terminals.

Education Program

Education projects will be established on a regional basis. AFL-CIO regional offices, state and local central bodies and universities in each area will be asked to help set up the program. Key members in local unions will be sent to the education projects and help train members in their own locals after graduation.

All members who complete the program will be asked to help organize in their regions. Pres. George P. Sabattie said the union hopes to involve every member in the new education-organizing drive, with everyone helping.

In a series of resolutions the delegates approved the new organizing drive, supported the legislative and political programs of the AFL-CIO and called for renewed efforts to secure equal rights for all. Philip Weightman, assistant director of National COPE, addressed the convention and gave the union a COPE award for 100 percent participation in the dollar drive.

Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver praised the union's work in the field of civil rights.

"Today a man who is turned away from the factory gate because of the color of his skin has a clear-cut legal case," he said. "But another who is turned away from the factory gate because he is untrained has no legal case at all, even though the reason he is untrained is that he was born in a ghetto and his education was as unequal as it was separate."

Other speakers included Daniel J. Healy, AFL-CIO regional director for Illinois and Iowa; Douglas Anderson, representing U. S. Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D., Ill.); Walter G. Davis, deputy executive director, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission; and Edwin Berry, executive director, Chicago Urban League, a member of the union.

Sabattie, Sec.-Treas. Richard S. Hamme and three vice presidents were re-elected without opposition.

Sabattie reported that an internal economy drive ordered by the executive board in 1965 has resulted in considerable savings. All international and local union officers took on extra duty in field work and organizing.

Recognition by Law Also an Aim:

'Adequate' Pay Scale Letter Carriers Goal

Detroit—Union recognition by statute and an adequate wage scale for postal employes are key goals of delegates attending the Letter Carriers convention in Detroit's Cobo Hall.

Pres. Jerome J. Keating set the tone in his opening remarks: "It will be our biggest convention, that's true. But we shall also forge, during the week, a historic program which will give our men decent pay—decent routes—and will give the American people the decent service they should have."

Keating promised an all-out program to bring the pay level of letter carriers in line with wages paid for comparable jobs in private industry. The NALC will bend every effort, he said, to help the Post Office Dept. get the money it needs to run an improved service.

Keating had words of praise for Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, who addressed the convention.

"He is service-minded just as we are," Keating said. "We are going to help him do what he wants to do—give the people a postal service worthy of the country."

The key resolution adopted in early sessions was one calling for recognition of federal employe unions by statute. The resolution points out that while the late Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order 10988, which gave recognition to federal employe unions for the first time, has served its purpose, "several glaring weaknesses" have cropped up.

The resolution lists these weaknesses as:

- The absence of any meaningful procedure for settling an appeal or impasse at any level.
- The absence of any provision for appropriate penalties for willful disregard . . . or deliberate violation at the local level of provisions of national bargaining agreements.

The resolution calls for federal legislation to correct these weaknesses and the designation of the Dept. of Labor to administer the law.

Other resolutions dealt with working conditions and internal union affairs, including one calling for equal pay for female letter carriers. Another dealt with the Number One problem of letter carriers—biting dogs.

A number of congressmen appeared befor the convention. They included Representatives John Conyers (D-Mich.), Billie S. Farnum (D-Mich.), Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.) and Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.). Senators Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) and Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) also spoke briefly.

The convention—the union's 45th—attracted some 6,000 delegates, guests and wives. The union represents 181,000 members in 6,377 branches. Meeting in conjunction with the NALC was the 30th biennial convention of the union's National Ladies Auxiliary.

Firm Ordered To Bargain On Checkoff

An employer who refused to agree to a dues deduction plan because without it a union would be likely to disintegrate has been held guilty of bargaining in bad faith.

By a 3-2 vote the National Labor Relations Board approved an order compelling the Roanoke, Va., Iron & Bridge Works, Inc., to bargain in good faith with the Steelworkers, and to post notices that it will so bargain on proposals to facilitate the collection of union dues.

Prior to the present case, the Steelworkers "enjoyed a brief period" in 1951-52 when they were the certified bargaining representative of Roanoke Iron Workers, Trial Examiner Frederick U. Reel reported.

After almost a year of negotiations, union members yielded to management's refusal to grant a voluntary checkoff by means of signed authorization cards. The resulting agreement lapsed after a year and the union died.

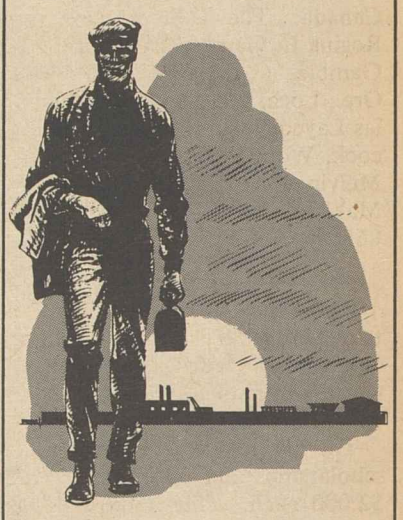
In 1961, Reel recounted, employes formed an unaffiliated union, "Steel Fabricators Union of Roanoke, Va.," and also asked for a voluntary checkoff of union dues.

No employes ever had their dues checked off and the company-favored union had vanished when the USWA won bargaining rights again in 1964. Management again refused to grant a dues checkoff, and the union filed charges of refusal to bargain, citing company letters to employes as evidence.

The examiner, summarizing the record and court rulings in similar cases, said "it seems fair to conclude that if a party at the bargaining table espouses a position" to destroy or cripple the other party he has not bargained in good faith.

'WHEN THE DAY'S WORK IS DONE'



What have shorter working hours and longer vacations brought to America's union members? For thousands they have meant an opportunity to enjoy life and help others while making their communities better places in which to live.

See "When The Day's Work Is Done," a special documentary film to be shown on nationwide television during the Labor Day period. Narrated by Dave Garroway; comments by AFL-CIO President George Meany and Vice President Joseph A. Beirne. An AFL-CIO production.

Opposes Deduction Scheme:

Labor Backs Tax Credit Plan For Political Contributions

The AFL-CIO urged a tax credit for small contributors to political candidates, parties or independent political committees and endorsed a proposal for government contributions to the cost of presidential election campaigns.

"It is essential to the proper working of a democratic political system that campaigns be adequately financed," AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris told the Senate Finance Committee.

Labor's view, he stressed, is that "the broader the financial support for political activity, the better. The more people who contribute small amounts, the less candidates and parties need be beholden to a few large contributors."

Harris strongly opposed, however, various proposals to allow a tax deduction for political contributions, whether unlimited in amount or limited to $100 as Pres. Johnson has suggested.

Its effect, he said, would be to give an advantage to large upper-income contributors whose earnings are taxed at a higher rate.

A tax deduction reduces the amount of income on which tax is due. A tax credit is a deduction from the amount of tax owed to the government—and therefore is of equal benefit to families in all income brackets.

Ideally, Harris suggested, taxpayers should be able to take a tax credit for political contributions up to $5 a year. He stressed that such a credit should be allowed for contributions to independent political committees such as COPE as well as to regular party organizations.

Long Bill Praised

Harris commented favorably on a bill by Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) for Treasury contributions to political parties in presidential campaigns and noted that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany "endorsed the idea 10 years ago."

The Long bill would give parties which polled at least 1.5 million votes funds to pay a major part of their campaign expenses. "It would substantially aid the national committees in their almost impossible job of financing presidential campaigns," Harris noted.

The AFL-CIO attorney told the committee that "democracy works best" when political campaigns are well-publicized and competing candidates and policies are fully presented to the electorate.

"No one," he said, "wants to see the day when only very wealthy men, who can finance their own campaigns, can run for office."

He pointed out that small contributions by large numbers of people also build interest and participation in the election process, adding:

"We in the AFL-CIO would like to get each member of our unions to contribute a dollar a year for politics. A few people give more, and we don't turn it down, but the larger the number of contributors, the happier we are about it."

On the role of COPE and comparable organizations, Harris noted that "independent political groups have made major contributions to the political life of this nation and have supplied energy and ideas sometimes lacking in the regular parties."

POLITICAL ACTIVITY on a scale unmatched since the successful campaign to defeat so-called "right-to-work" in 1958 was voted by the California AFL-CIO convention after it had endorsed Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown (speaking) Democratic candidate for re-election.

Scholarship Programs of Unions Grow to More Than $1.5 Million

Students by the score will go to colleges in all parts of the United States and Canada this fall with financial assistance from the ever-broadening scholarship programs of AFL-CIO affiliates which now total more than $1.5 million a year.

International and local unions and central bodies have set up programs of aid ranging from comparatively modest grants to approximately full tuition costs. In many cases the awards are restricted to the children of members.

The Operating Engineers this year instituted the Joseph J. Delaney Memorial Scholarship Awards, honoring the union's late president, with eligibility limited to the children of members.

Three awards were made—two in the United States and one in Canada. The U.S. winners were Regina L. Gamble, daughter of Jay Gamble, a member of Portland, Ore., Local 701, and Harold Douglas Laycock, son of Harold F. Laycock, Wood River, Ill., Local 525. Melvin Clive Maki, son of R. W. Maki, of Port Arthur, Ont., Local 865, was the Canadian winner.

Steel Gives $25,700

The Chicago-Calumet-Gary District of the Steelworkers and various locals awarded 11 scholarships worth a total of $25,700 to the sons and daughters of members.

The district awarded two $4,000 scholarships and four others worth $2,000 each, while a third $4,000 scholarship was given by Gary, Ind., local unions in honor of the silver anniversary of the district director, Joseph Germano. The remaining four scholarships were provided by locals.

The Germano anniversary scholarship went to Janice Ruth Langan, Gary, daughter of Clay E. Langan, a member of Gary Local 3008. The other $4,000 awards were won by Carolyn Ellen Belko, Calumet City, Ill., daughter of Ollie Belko of East Chicago, Ind., Local 1133, and William H. Bucko, Hammond, Ind., son of Henry S. Bucko of East Chicago Local 1386.

The district's $2,000 scholarships were awarded Cecelia A. Wenger, Barrington, Ill., daughter of Theodore Wenger of Local 3809; Jerry A. Lukach, Chesterton, Ind., son of William Lukach, Gary Local 1066; Thomas L. Leonard, Gary, son of Henry Z. Leonard, Local 1066, and Wayne O. Johansson, Maywood, Ill., son of Victor Johansson, Local 2113.

The $2,000 scholarship given by East Chicago Local 1010 was awarded James Balanoff, whose father is James Balanoff, Sr. Local 2047, Chicago, presented a $1,500 award to Andrew A. Bendel, son of Samuel Bendel. Susan M. Hunter, Harvey, Ill., whose father is John Hunter, received the $1,200 scholarship of Local 1093, and a $1,000 award by Chicago Local 2608 was won by Ronald Wiehle, Addison, Ill., son of Bernhardt Wiehle.

The Seafarers awarded $6,000 scholarships to one member and four children of members.

The member is Bernard A. Maret, Melbourne, Fla., who sails in the steward department. The other winners were Thomas M. Baker, son of James T. Baker, Groton, Conn.; Michael J. McCann, son of Francis H. McCann, Cleveland; Tommy E. Miller, son of Elmer E. Miller, Norfolk, Va., and Dedra Robertson, daughter of Robert F. Robertson, Port Arthur, Tex.

4 Get $2,400 Each

Scholarships worth $2,400 each were awarded six children of workers in the Philadelphia knitgoods industry—four given by Knitgoods Local 190 of the Ladies' Garment Workers and two by the Martin Seligman Foundation, which honors the memory of a late industry leader.

Local honor winners were Suzan Gordon, Bohdan Dombchewski, Arleen Soloman and William Ordine. The Seligman scholarships went to Scott Premack and Bruce Kestelman.

The Pulp-Sulphite Workers presented grants from the John P. Burke Scholarship Fund to 10 children of members.

They were Dorothy Bezan, Kapuskasing, Ont., daughter of Michael Bezan of Kapuskasing Local 89; Linda R. Dube, Berlin, N.H., whose father is Donald Dube, Local 75; Jim P. Bell, Fort Smith, Ark., son of Mrs. Gladys Bell, Local 656; Dorothy J. Moser, Vancouver, B.C., daughter of Peter Moser, Ocean Falls, B.C., Local 312.

Also Larry L. Crawford, Dover, Pa., son of James Crawford, York, Pa., Local 808; Gregory L. Roy, Liverpool, N.S., son of Frank Roy, Local 141; Rick Svehla, Park Falls, Wisc., son of James Svehla, Local 119; Robert A. Delfs, Jr., Long Beach, Calif., son of Robert A. Delfs, Sr., of Wilmington, Calif., Local 341; Margaret M. O'Leary, Savannah, Ga., whose father, J. J. O'Leary, is a member of Local 638, and Jimmy L. Vance, Londonderry, O., son of James L. Vance, Chillichothe, O., Local 731.

Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes announced awards of $2,000 scholarships over four years to nine children of members in the United States. A tenth, from Canada, will be named later this summer.

The winners were Adrian A. Bryttan, Bronx, N.Y., son of Mrs. Theodora Bryttan, New York Local 32J; Joseph N. Kostiak, Bronx, son of Nicholas Kostiak, New York Local 144; James J. Harvey, Philadelphia, son of William Harvey, Local 69; Gerard R. Rucci, Hartford, Conn., son of Mrs. Mary Josephine Rucci, Local 531; Rita Diane Rambo, daughter of Mrs. Mary Alma Rambo, Local 372; Patricia Anne Anderson, Chicago, daughter of Charles C. Anderson, Local 18007; Stephen J. Wontor, Minneapolis, Minn., son of Joseph Wontor, Local 63; Anthony B. Rogers, Venice, Calif., son of William E. Rogers, Los Angeles Local 399; and Bonnie Fran Hugo, Norwalk, Calif., daughter of Ralph H. Hugo, Local 399.

Four children of members of BSEIU Local 32B, New York, received $4,800 scholarships in the union's 16th awards program. Chosen were Patrick J. Horan, son of John Horan; Michael F. Jossa, son of Louis Jossa; Constance Maria Kilmark, daughter of John Kilmark, and Basil Kassian Lucak, son of Wasyl Lucak.

California Labor Drives On Brown Re-Election

San Diego—Organized labor in California will hold a series of political conferences throughout the state as part of a massive effort to re-elect Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown.

The sessions, which were to start Aug. 18 in Wilmington, were worked out in detail at the sixth convention of the California AFL-CIO, where nearly 2,000 delegates heard speaker after speaker warn that all of labor's goals will be in danger if Brown is defeated by Ronald Reagan (R) and his right-wing supporters.

The political conferences, planned by Exec. Sec. Thomas L. Pitts, were formulated in sessions here at the convention in cooperation with Paul Hall, AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Seafarers, and Dir. Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Special stress is being placed on the campaign in southern California, and a joint policy statement was issued by Pitts and Exec. Sec. W. J. Bassett of the Los Angeles County Labor Federation, to emphasize the need for action there.

The local central body must "bear the tremendous responsibility" of registration, education on the issues and getting out the vote, while the state labor federation faces the task of coordinating labor's overall efforts and assuring "adequate manpower and support to all areas of the state," the convention said.

In each community where the political rallies are held, local and state union leaders, along with rank and file activists, will program the door-bell ringing job.

The major thrust of labor's effort will be to show that Reagan is, as speakers charged, a "captive," whose publicly stated programs would emasculate most of California's social insurance benefits and in general block any new advances in social or economic programs.

Delegates concluded the week-long sessions after adopting resolutions calling for a $2 minimum wage, a 35-hour workweek, and major increases in present state jobless pay, workmen's compensation and disability insurance programs.

They also called for a continuation of the drive to organize farm labor, and cheered reports from William L. Kircher, national AFL-CIO organizing director, on progress in the farm labor organizing campaign.

Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, former research director of the California AFL-CIO, warned that Reagan is attempting to discuss his "reactionary positions." And labor must "once again as it did in the anti-right-to-work campaign in 1958, mount an all-out effort to avert the threat that the ultra-right will take over California as it has already taken over the Republican Party in the state."

Henning took note of the calls from some people to mute labor's voice on the controversial issue of race relations.

It would be sinful to remain silent on that issue, Henning said, and he drew the loudest applause of the convention with his address.

Top officers of federation were re-elected, including Pitts, Pres. Albert Gruhn and Vice Pres. Manuel Dias.

N.Y. Contract Talks Go On As 'Trib' Quits

New York—Newspaper union and management negotiators continued their efforts to get two merged publications into print here despite the loss of the New York Herald Tribune and 800 employe jobs. The new corporation announced the venerable morning daily will not resume publication.

The pressmen, only one of the 10 unions previously unable to reach agreement in a new contract with World Journal Tribune, Inc., met with management in further efforts to end a long strike and shutdown. As to the new problems caused by the Herald Tribune's elimination from the merger plan, a spokesman for all the unions said they hope for a prompt solution.

John Hay Whitney, who bought the Herald Tribune in 1958, said that for all the years of his ownership "the paper was never quite able to stand on its own." Whitney said he will continue as publisher of the Herald Tribune in Paris.

Merger of the Herald Tribune with the Journal-American and the World Telegram was announced in March but a Newspaper Guild strike for acceptable contract terms delayed the plan to combine three dailies into two and two Sunday papers into one. After the Guild settled its contract dispute, eight other unions agreed on terms.

Charges by publishers, not including Whitney, that the "unions killed the Herald Trib" were indignantly repudiated by union spokesmen.

Bill Goes to Conference:

Strong Auto Safety Standards Voted Unanimously by House

The House unanimously approved a strong auto safety bill requiring all motor vehicles sold in the United States—whether American-built or imported—to meet federal safety standards.

It is the first major consumer legislation to pass both houses of Congress this year. The Senate passed a similar bill in June, also unanimously. Differences between the two measures — the House bill is considered somewhat stronger — will be resolved in conference.

Both the House and Senate bills direct the secretary of commerce to establish interim safety standards for 1968 model cars. These are expected to be based on standards the government requires on vehicles it buys for its own use. Revised standards, drawn up in consultation with an advisory council, would be issued for the 1969 model year.

The House bill authorizes federal standards for used cars, while the Senate measure merely calls for a study of used car safety. The House included in its auto safety bill tire safety and grading standards similar to those incorporated in a separate Senate-passed bill.

Both the House and Senate bills provide fines up to $1,000 for each violation, subject to a ceiling of $400,000 on any manufacturer. Proposals for criminal penalties were turned down by both bodies.

The House was also expected to pass a companion highway safety bill, requiring states to set up safety programs and standards by Jan. 1, 1968 or face a cutoff of 10 percent of their federal highway aid.

While acting to make autos and highways safer, Congress turned thumbs down on an effort to expand the program of federal grants for mass transit systems designed to improve bus and rail service in metropolitan areas.

First the Senate and then the House rejected committee recommendations to enlarge the program beyond present levels.

The Senate Banking Committee had brought out a bill which would have raised the authorization for mass transit programs from the current $150 million a year to $225 million for the 1968 and 1969 fiscal years.

The Senate chopped the authorization back to the $150 million level by a 47-34 vote after Republicans argued that an increase would run counter to Pres. Johnson's "restraint" policy. The Administration had not sought the higher amount.

House Action

In similar action, the House turned down its Banking Committee's proposal to expand the program to $175 million a year. The vote on the cut was 205-161.

In a move to relieve the critical shortage of home mortgage money, the House voted 314-1 to step up the ability of the Federal National Mortgage Association to buy up existing housing mortgages. This would release private funds for new mortgage commitments.

The House bill would allow FNMA to borrow additional money to finance mortgage purchases and would authorize the Treasury to purchase $110 million in FNMA preferred stock. The overall effect of the changes would pump more than $3.75 billion into available mortgage financing. A somewhat different bill, but with a similar intent, has already passed the Senate.

On the Senate floor, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was the Administration's demonstration cities bill — a major labor-backed measure which would enable cities to revitalize entire neighborhoods through a coordinated program of housing, schools, community and recreation facilities, rapid transit and public works. The Senate bill would authorize $900 million over a two-year period for the program.

Rights Debate Set

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield served notice that the Senate will begin debate on the civil rights bill on Sept. 6, the day after Labor Day.

Southerners decided not to fight to have the House-passed bill referred to the Judiciary Committee and it was placed on the Senate calendar.

Mansfield pointed out that the Judiciary Committee has been considering civil rights legislation for three months with no sign of action. Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) has, Mansfield noted, "repeatedly interposed his towering presence in the procedural corridor between the Judiciary Committee rooms and the Senate floor."

Barring an unexpected development, the Senate faces a grueling battle on the civil rights bill — particularly its fair housing provision — with a southern filibuster considered certain.

Updated Water Rule Urged on Congress

Organized labor called on Congress to overhaul and strengthen the nation's reclamation program to prevent the growth of monopolistic holdings of rich farmlands in the western states.

Representatives of the AFL-CIO specifically urged the Senate Interior Committee to draft legislation that would strictly enforce regulations on excess ownership of land and aid the use of reclaimed land for family farming.

Fostered Monopoly

George Taylor, an AFL-CIO economist, told the committee that current provisions have "fostered land monopoly." These provisions allow water to be delivered to the owner of land in excess of the 160-acre legal limitation if he executes a recordable contract ultimately to dispose of the excess lands. This procedure, Taylor said, has been waived or overlooked by government administrators.

Unless present policies are changed further land monopolization will take place in the Central and Imperial valley of California, in Arizona and elsewhere, he declared.

The California AFL-CIO filed a statement with the committee citing the Westlands Water District in the state where 75 percent of the land is held in excess of the 160 acre limitation under the reclamation law and said that the figure is growing.

It cited also the case of the "supposed divestiture" of excess lands by the DiGiorgio Corp. in the Delano area, where it claimed the lands "were appraised at prices far above their value to the reclamation project" with the result that "potential family farmers have been unable to purchase the land."

Taylor specifically opposed further appropriations for the construction of the Westlands Water Delivery System "until all excess land owners have signed recordable contracts to divest."

The AFL-CIO, he said, recommends strict enforcement of excess ownership provisions without leeway to undo them by "vague administrative discretion" and a program to make it possible to use land thus divested for family size farms.

Policy Cited

Taylor cited the AFL-CIO policy statement adopted at the 1965 convention stating that the federation cannot support any reclamation project that allows the kind of perversion of law and national policy "that is epitomized in the Westlands and Imperial Valley and DiGiorgio situations."

Liberal-Rightist Clash Set in Western States

Two elections offering a clear-cut choice of liberal Democrats or conservative Republicans were set up in the Rocky Mountain States of Montana and Wyoming in party primaries.

Incumbent Democratic Sen. Lee Metcalf was renominated without opposition in Montana, outpolling by a substantial margin the vote by Republicans for Gov. Tim Babcock, who also was unopposed.

Babcock was an open pre-convention supporter of Sen. Barry Goldwater for the GOP presidential nomination in 1964 and he has been reported linked to various rightist groups.

Metcalf has played a key role in advancing liberal legislation as a member of the Senate Finance Committee. He previously was a leading figure, as a House member, in organizing the Democratic Study Group that for years has served a clearing house for members interested in education, medicare and housing programs.

In Wyoming, the Republicans nominated Gov. Clifford Hansen for the Senate seat to be vacated by the announced retirement of Milward Simpson, also a Republican. The Democrats nominated Rep. Teno Roncalio, who had no opposition in the primary. Roncalio is one of the freshmen Democrats, elected in 1964, who on many issues were the balance of power in passing medicare, school aid and anti-poverty legislation.

In Montana, incumbent Democratic Rep. Arnold Olsen was renominated without opposition and will face Richard D. Smiley, who easily outdistanced a lone challenger in the GOP primary. Democrats nominated John D. Melcher in the state's other congressional district to oppose incumbent Republican Rep. James F. Battin.

Wyoming Republicans chose the veteran former Rep. William Henry Harrison as nominee for the state's only congressional seat, which is being vacated by Roncalio's decision to run for the Senate. A close race for the Democratic nomination between Al Christian and Mayne Miller was undecided as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Ernest Wilkerson won a five-man race for Democratic nomination for governor to run against Republican Stan Hathaway.

In Louisiana Democratic primary contests, two incumbent House members—Rep. James H. Morrison and Rep. Edwin E. Willis—were apparently pushed into runoffs when they barely failed to win clear majorities in total unofficial returns. Morrison is in line to be chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in the 90th Congress.

Their leading challengers were a former patent medicine promoter, Dudley Leblanc, and open segregationist John H. Rarick.

Women Pace Expansion of Labor Force

Women workers accounted for more than 60 percent of the increase in the nation's workforce between 1940 and 1964 and now represent 35 percent of the total, according to the Labor Dept.'s new 1965 Handbook of Women Workers.

The handbook, the first published since 1962, includes projections showing that the present 26 million women workers are likely to increase by 41 percent between 1964 and 1980 while male workers are expected to increase by only 27 per cent.

The department also has made available another new publication, Counseling Girls Toward New Perspectives, the report of a pilot conference on counseling girls held last December in Philadelphia at which it was agreed that the more education a woman has, the more likely she is to work outside the home.

The two publications, prepared by the Women's Bureau, can be obtained from the U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402. The price of the Handbook is $1 per copy, that of the conference report 35 cents per copy.

Wage Bill Wins Key Senate Vote

A bill to raise the minimum wage and expand its coverage—described by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as "the single best legislative measure in the war against poverty"—headed towards passage in the Senate.

It would lift the wage floor for nearly 30 million persons now covered by the $1.25 minimum to $1.40 next Feb. 1 and to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1968.

The Senate narrowly defeated a Republican attempt to postpone the $1.60 minimum an additional year, to the Feb. 1, 1969 date fixed in a House-passed bill. The vote was 42-40.

Thirty-five Democrats and seven Republicans voted against postponing the increase; 21 Republicans and 19 Democrats voted for the delay.

The Senate verison was termed "an absolutelv essential improvement" by the Executive Council in a statement issued shortly before the vote.

Farm Coverage

Still pending, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were amendments seeking to chop away at the Senate committee bill's extension of coverage to 7.2 million additional workers. The newly-covered workers would start with a $1-an-hour floor, advancing 15 cents a year to the $1.60 level—with a $1.30 cut-off for farm workers covered for the first time in the history of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

On a kev vote, the Senate rejected 51-37 an amendment which would have eliminated farm workers from coverage.

The Executive Council had

EVERYBODY WAS HAPPY when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany presented a charter to the new United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, formed by merger of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and the unaffiliated National Farm Workers Association. Cesar Chavez and former AWOC Rep. Larry Itliong.

Two Units Merged:

Farm Labor Group Given New Charter

Chicago—The AFL-CIO gave new momentum and drive to the farm workers campaign in California by chartering a new organizing committee made up of the groups that have merged their efforts in the Delano grape strike.

The Executive Council voted a charter for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and called the action "an essential step toward winning a measure of economic justice for farm workers."

The charter was presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Cesar Chavez, director of the National Farm Workers Association, and Larry Itliong, the Delano director for the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee.

The two groups have merged in their efforts to win union recognition in the grape fields and are currently appearing as a single unit in a representation election scheduled for Aug. 30 at the giant DiGiorgio Corp.

Meany termed the granting of the charter an event of "great importance." Chavez said it was a "historic moment" and the beginning of "real unity" and a major effort to organize exploited farm workers.

Chavez said he looked forward to the time when the organizing committee would turn in its charter for one as a national union, emphasizing that the farm workers would be best off in their own union.

Meany pointed out that the AFL-CIO has been actively supporting the grape strikers and will continue its help. AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, who has been active in the strike and assigned AFL-CIO organizers to the current DiGiorgio campaign, participated in the charter cere-

Economic Balance Stressed as Goal

By Saul Miller

Chicago—The AFL-CIO has marshalled the basic weapons of the trade union movement—organizing, free collective bargaining, legislative activity and political action—to win a fair share for the American worker and help keep the economy on even keel.

At its mid-summer meeting here the federation's Executive Council took a close look at the current problems of increased living costs, spiraling interest rates, employer resistance to new contract improvements and civil rights and came up with a comprehensive analysis and program.

It laid the groundwork for a new farm workers organization to help win economic and social justice for exploited agricultural labor.

It found the AFL-CIO in good health and growing, with a gain of 900,000 members over a three-year period and the organization's Internal Disputes Plan functioning smoothly.

In international affairs the council reaffirmed its strong support of Pres. Johnson's policies in Viet Nam, urged union involvement in economic planning in Latin America and strongly commended the work of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

This is what happened at the three-day meeting:

On the organizing front it gave new momentum to the drive to organize farm workers in California by granting a charter to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee made up of groups that have merged their efforts in the Delano grape strike.

Step to Justice

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the charter was an "essential step toward winning a measure of economic justice for farm workers" and termed it an event of "great importance." (Story this page.)

On the bargaining front the council gave its unqualified support to unions in the electrical and communications industries in their current negotiations for new contracts.

It pledged "complete and unstinting support of the efforts of the Communications Workers to achieve an equitable contract for its members at the Western Electric division of the Bell System and reaffirmed its all-out backing "without reservation" of the objectives of the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining with

Meany Hits 'Forgery,' Asks Probe

Chicago — AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany angrily denounced as a "forgery" and demanded a federal investigation of a spurious letter faking his signature and used in an attempted raid by the Teamsters on a 7,500-member bargaining unit of the Railway Clerks at Pan American World Airways.

The Railway Clerks are an AFL-CIO affiliate; the Teamsters were expelled from the federation in 1957 on findings of corrupt domination.

Pan Am employes received a letter with the faked signature of Meany purportedly advising a course of action directly contrary to the position of the Railway Clerks. The clerks union had advised its members to boycott a National Mediation Board election now being conducted on petition of the Teamsters. The spurious letter falsely indicated the union had changed its position.

Meany called for a thorough federal investigation of the "attempted victimization" of Pan Am employes in a letter to Mediation Board Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr.

He sent O'Neill a copy of the faked letter, declaring:

"This letter was not written by me. It was not signed by me. The purported signature is a forgery

Membership Surge Reported to Council

Chicago—AFL-CIO membership has grown rapidly in 1966, with a gain of 347,000 in the first six months of the year, the Executive Council reported.

The sharp gain continues a three-year trend during which the membership of the federation in the United States moved from a low point of 12,464,000 in the 12 months ending June 1963 to 13,385,000 for the same period ending in June 1966.

For the first half of 1966, the council said, membership topped 13.5 million. This does not include about 1 million members of AFL-CIO unions in Canada.

These unions pay per capita on their members in Canada to the Canadian Labor Congress and the figures are not included in the AFL-CIO tabulation, which is based on actual per capita payments to the federation.

The total gain over the three-year period has been about 900,000. About 403,000 of that increase came in the 12-month period July 1964 to June 1965.

The council reported that slightly less than half the 130 national and international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO expanded their membership during the 1963-65 period.

Somewhat fewer than 30 percent

Inflationary Profits Seen Draining Off Pay Gains

Chicago—Increases in the buying power of wages and salaries through both collective bargaining and national legislation are essential to overcome a serious lack of balance in the nation's economy—an imbalance caused by skyrocketing profits—the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council, in statements on the national economy and interest rates as well as a detailed background paper, strongly affirmed the purchasing-power policies and made a flat demand that the government roll back upward-spiraling interest rates.

The council declared that "inflation in America is clearly and directly profit inflation." The result has been to wash out "much of the value of workers' wage gains." Workers have not and are not receiving "a fair and adequate share of the benefits of the economy's forward advance."

The council laid out a basic nine-point program on economic policies and emphasized that "the major mechanism for achieving rising real earnings in America is collective bargaining." It stressed also the need to aid the working poor to increases in their wage levels, for expanded coverage in the wage hour law and for repeal of the 7 percent business

Open Housing Stressed:

Executive Council Pledges Fight on Rights' Filibuster

Chicago—The AFL-CIO will do "everything in our power" to help break a Senate filibuster of the House-passed civil rights bill and called on all Americans "who believe in the principle of open housing" to join in the fight.

The Federation's Executive Council pledged its position in a statement analyzing the House civil rights act of 1966 and warning that it could not become law unless the filibuster is cracked.

Emphasizing the section on fair housing as "probably the single most important section" of the measure, the council declared that the compromise on open-occupancy provisions reached in the House "contains less than we wanted and less than justice demands, but by establishing the principle of fair housing it makes a significant start."

Noting that the provisions of the bill meet the "major objectives" of the recent AFL-CIO convention resolution on civil rights, the council declared that the housing section guarantees the basic principle of fair housing, that it applies to an estimated 40 percent of the nation's homes as well as to all new housing developments and high-rise apartments, and that it was the "strongest possible" section "that could have been passed in the House."

The AFL-CIO "supported without apologies" the compromise, the council said, because without it "there would have been no open-housing section at all."

The House-passed bill also contained provisions assuring nondiscrimination in the selection of federal and state juries, broadening federal laws against acts of racial violence and authorizing federal court injunctions against anticipated violence or intimidation.

Senate Republican Majority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has strongly opposed the open-housing section and indicated he would not cooperate in halting a southern filibuster of the measure.

The Senate is scheduled to begin consideration of the bill on Sept. 6.

In calling for a campaign to break the filibuster the council said:

"We intend to do everything in our power, in cooperation with others who believe in full civil rights, to break the filibuster and pass the bill. We earnestly solicit the support of all Americans who believe in the principle of open housing. Certainly the inhumanity of the ghetto, the injustice of segregated housing, the denial of equal opportunity to Negroes, is just as reprehensible when it occurs in northern cities as in the South."

The objective, the council concluded, was passage of the House bill "with speed and without crippling amendments."

AFL-CIO Charter Given Merged Farm Groups

monies and reported on the current situation.

The organizing committee charter, Meany said in reply to a reporter's query, extends to farm workers in other areas where organizing campaigns may be needed, but for the present and near future the emphasis would be in California.

The NFWA and the AWOC merged organizations have about 10,000 members in the state, Chavez and Itliong said.

The council statement declared that the granting of the charter "symbolizes a welcome fact: the plight of the American farm worker is troubling the conscience of America. It is about time."

It welcomed the progress that has been made but said it was not fast enough nor broad enough. In addition to organizing farm workers, it added, another step is essential—providing the same legislative safeguards to farm workers and the same access to collective bargaining now available to other workers.

This means, the statement said, protection under the wage-hour law, the National Labor Relations Act, and the unemployment and workmen's compensation systems. The AFL-CIO "will not be content" until these protections are achieved, it declared.

The council concluded that "a nation as prosperous as the United States can no longer tolerate the shame of its agricultural workers. America owes these men and women the opportunity to better their lives and we are determined to achieve that opportunity for them."

War on Poverty Role Stressed for Unions

Chicago—The AFL-CIO is strongly committed to the war on poverty program, wants it to succeed and has devised an organization and programs to reach that objective.

This was the theme of a detailed report to the Executive Council by Vice Pres. David Sullivan, chairman of the labor advisory council of the Office of Economic Opportunity, and Miles Stanley, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in charge of coordinating the anti-poverty activities in the labor movement.

Since the passage of anti-poverty legislation in 1964, the report said, the "AFL-CIO has been engaged in programs and activities designed to make this legislation as effective as possible."

The job has had several objectives, Sullivan said: To encourage more direct and indirect participation by AFL-CIO affiliates and representatives in every phase of the programs at all levels. To monitor the programs to determine if they are fulfilling their intended purpose and to discourage programs which may weaken established labor standards.

The report summarized the organization at AFL-CIO headquarters and in the field, and the liaison with OEO both nationally and in seven field offices.

It reviewed the extensive number of conferences, seminars and schools, and the scope of poverty program discussions at labor summer schools. It noted the widespread use of AFL-CIO publications and the labor press to advance the programs, and training activities to provide leadership by unionists.

In terms of community action programs, the report said, more than 500 local labor leaders are actively serving on boards of organizations set up to advance various projects. It cited a number of cases of direct labor sponsorship of programs.

Return to School Urged by Unions

Chicago—All AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local bodies were urged "to do everything possible to encourage the youth of America to return to school" this fall.

The call for action on the school dropout problem came from the AFL-CIO Executive Council in a statement stressing the need for the campaign so that every child can have all the education he can individually absorb to meet the challenges of the new technology.

Disputes Plan Reported As Effective

Chicago—The AFL-CIO's internal disputes plan is continuing along its successful course of settling 60 per cent of the cases filed under the plan by mediation, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported.

Of the 551 complaints filed since the plan was initiated in January 1962 through Aug. 15, 1966, 345 have been settled by mediation or mediation is in progress.

Of the 181 determinations made by impartial umpires under the plan, violations of Article XXI of the Constitution, setting out the details of the plan, were found in 131 cases. The subcommittee of the council set up to receive appeals from the determinations has received a total of 58 and has denied 49.

Of 35 complaints of non-compliance with determinations of the umpires, compliance was achieved in 20, non-compliance found in eight, five cases were withdrawn and one is pending.

Sanctions required by the article for non-compliance are in effect against six unions—the Railroad Signalmen, Typographical Union, Switchmen's Union, Stonecutters, Air Line Pilots and National Maritime Union.

Pensions Increased By Maritime Union

New York—Pension benefits for members of the National Maritime Union serving on deep sea vessels will be increased from $150 to $175 per month effective Sept. 1, Pres. Joseph N. Curran announced.

The increase applies to 4,750 retired members and to about 35,000 men who now form the crews of deep sea ships. Members are eligible for full benefits after 20 years of service regardless of age.

Jobless Aid Standards, Coverage Get Backing

Chicago—Combination of the federal minimum standards on unemployment compensation in the Senate-passed bill and the coverage provisions of the House measure was urged by the AFL-CIO to begin the job of overhauling the jobless benefits systems.

The federation's position was spelled out in a statement by the Executive Council which declared that if the House-Senate conferees move toward "any further watering-down of the standards in the Senate bill it would render the legislation virtually useless."

The council sharply attacked the "smoke screen of confusion" raised by opponents of federal standards who claim the legislation would federalize the system.

"These charges are false," the council said, because the bills leave unchanged the existing set-up under which each state administers its own program. It pointed out also that there are no minimum dollar amounts in the Senate bill, that benefits are directly related to average wages in the states.

The statement emphasized that although the Senate-passed measure "is far short of the original recommendations" of organized labor and the Administration, it is "vastly preferable" to the House version, which contains no benefit standards. Except for the greater coverage provisions of the House bill, the Senate bill is better in "every respect," the Council said.

The key provisions of the House and Senate bills that the AFL-CIO urged be incorporated into the conference committee report are:

- The Senate bill provides that the weekly benefit amount received by an unemployed worker must be at least 50 percent of his average weekly wage, up to a maximum of 50 percent of the state average wage.
- The Senate bill requires that any worker with 39 weeks of employment is entitled to benefits for at least 26 weeks.
- The House bill extends coverage to 3 million workers now excluded; the Senate version, by exempting workers in firms with fewer than four employes, would add only 1.8 million.

"Unemployment," the council emphasized, "is a national problem affecting workers and their communities in every state. The federal government must not dodge its responsibility to assure minimum protection to jobless workers."

AFL-CIO Supports D. C. Transit Pact

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to approve the Washington Area Transit Regulation Compact—an agreement by the states of Virginia and Maryland and the District of Columbia to set up a transit authority for the national capital area.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) that labor "wholeheartedly supports" the planned rapid transit system, including subway lines.

Fast House Vote Sought On Truth-in-Packaging

Chicago—Labor warned that the "truth-in-packaging" legislation passed by the Senate on June 9 is bogged down in House committee hearings and may be filibustered "through the device of prolonged and leisurely interrogation."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called for speedy action by the House Commerce Committee so that final action on the bill can be taken at the present session of Congress.

The legislation has the "overwhelming support" of the American buying public as well as of the trade union movement, the council said, and an exhaustive record has been compiled on the need for the new law over a five-year period.

It is a matter of "fair play," the council stressed, that packages be plainly and honestly marked and that a usable system of weights and measures be re-established so that consumers can make meaningful price comparisons between products. The injury to "retail price competition is of special concern in a period of rising consumer prices generally," the statement added.

Program Set on 'Fair Share' for Labor

Balance in Economy Stressed by Council

The council voiced its support also for strikes of the Boot & Shoe Workers at a Genesco plant in Tennessee and the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild's struggle at the Bureau of National Affairs.

Meany told a press conference that coordinated bargaining in the electrical industry is an effective approach and could well form a pattern in other situations where a number of unions hold contracts with the same company.

The settlement in the airline strike, he said, destroys the validity of employer arguments seeking to hold unions to a wage increase guideline of 3.2 percent.

Fair Shares Urged

On the economic front, the council called for increases in the real earnings of workers to give them a fair share of the economic growth and declared that the "major mechanism" for achieving this is free collective bargaining, supported by legislation to increase the minimum wage and its coverage, cutbacks in prices and interest rates and a restoration of economic balance between wages, prices and profits—now greatly distorted by soaring profits and the capital goods boom. (Story Page 1; text of council statement Page 7.)

The council made it clear that the basic cause of inflation is profits, that there are no shortages or the basic conditions that cause the classic inflation of "too many dollars chasing too little goods," in Meany's words.

As to the role of the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee in the area of economic stabilization, Meany told reporters that the current situation is for the President's Council of Economic Advisers to report to the labor-management group on a quarterly basis, so that the committee could work out answers to the problems, if possible, as they arise.

Specific Guide Unworkable

He pointed out that the committee recently adopted a statement supporting the general objective of wage-price stability but said that a specific percentage figure, such as 3.2, would not work.

The council heard a detailed report also on the AFL-CIO's deep involvement in the war on poverty program and the progress made to aid the exploited, the deprived and the working poor. It gave its support once again to a drive to prevent school drop-outs so that youngsters could gain the necessary education to meet the needs of a modern society. (Story Page 2.)

Legislative Goals Pressed

On the legislative front, the council:

● Called for Senate action on the minimum wage bill reported by the Senate Labor Committee, which it termed an improved version of the earlier House-passed measure to set a two-step $1.60 wage floor. (Story Page 1.)

● Pledged to do everything in its power to help break a threatened Senate filibuster of the House-passed civil rights bill and defended the House measure, with its guarantee of the principle of fair housing, as the strongest that could have been passed. (Story Page 2.)

● Urged a House-Senate conference committee to write both federal minimum benefit standards and wider coverage into a measure on improving and updating the unemployment compensation system. (Story Page 2.)

● Backed strongly the creation of an independent maritime agency to meet the crisis needs of the merchant marine rather than allow the agency to be buried in a new overall Dept. of Transportation. (Story Page 12.)

● Called on the House Commerce Committee to speed hearings on the Senate-passed "truth-in-packaging" bill so that action could be completed at the current session. (Story Page 2.)

On the international front, the council:

● Commended Pres. Johnson for demonstrating political resolution and military strength while making every effort to negotiate the war's end in Viet Nam. It warned also that those who deny U.S. military forces unstinting support are aiding the Communist enemy. (Story Page 4.)

● Urged the free trade unions of Latin America to work for economic integration through participation in national economic development bodies. (Story Page 4.)

● Rejected out of hand a campaign of vilification against the American Institute for Free Labor Development and commended it for its work in carrying out the policies of the AFL-CIO in the international field. (Story Page 4.)

On internal matters, the council:

● Received a report that AFL-CIO membership has grown rapidly in 1966, with a gain of 347,000 in the first six months of the year, continuing and accentuating a sharp upward trend in membership since 1963. (Story Page 1.)

● Found the federation's internal disputes plan continuing to operate successfully, with 60 percent of all complaints yielding to mediation efforts within the AFL-CIO. (Story Page 2.)

● Adopted a report from a subcommitte to approve creation of a council of professional workers composed of members from different unions who fall into that classification and have common objectives and problems. The report specifically recommended a coordinating council of unions rather than the creation of an AFL-CIO department.

● Contributed $366,000 to the Solidarity Fund of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and made a number of contributions to social, economic and welfare organizations that work with the labor movement in numerous fields.

● Heard a report at a meeting of the administrative committee of COPE that funds for the 1966 election campaigns were up to and may exceed levels of other non-presidential year fund drives.

● Attended a special luncheon with Chicago and Illinois labor leaders to cordinate efforts to help Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) win re-election.

● Set the next meeting of the council for Nov. 14 in Washington, with the first major order of business a review of labor's policies in the area of international affairs.

Wage Gains Seen Washed Out By 'Skyrocketing' Profits Boom

tax credit that is fueling the capital goods boom.

It stressed that high and rising business profits and the rapidly increasing productivity of the economy make possible "increases in workers' buying power without raising the price level."

Prices Can Be Cut, Too

"In fact, the profits and productivity of many companies are so high that they could simultaneously raise wages and cut their prices to consumers," it declared.

The council reaffirmed its previous position that if Pres. Johnson determines that "extraordinary stabilization methods" are needed, he can be assured of the support and cooperation of the AFL-CIO in any such program applying equitably to all groups.

The council's statements buttressed the need for a fair share for workers with an analysis that showed:

● Unit labor costs declined 1.9 percent between 1960 and 1965 and in the first half of 1966 were a bare one-tenth of 1 percent higher than in the same period of 1965.

● The spread between unit labor costs and industrial prices has been growing and is now greater than at any time since mid-1951. Most of the spread reflects widening profit margins.

● Corporate profits and dividend payments have soared while weekly take-home pay of factory workers has increased moderately, lagging far behind the other two over a five-year period.

● Soaring profits are fueling the capital goods boom, aided by the 7 percent tax-credit subsidy for business investment and rapid depreciation write-offs.

● The Federal Reserve's attempt to curb the capital goods boom has pushed up interest rates to the highest levels in 40 years, boosting the cost of living and throwing residential construction into a depression.

The council stressed that while the continuing shift in income distribution is creating a serious lack of balance in the economy, there is not an excessive demand for goods in short supply. Auto sales are down, home-building has dropped, there is no shortage of consumer goods or scare-buying or hoarding and unemployment is at 3.9 percent of the labor force—far from full employment.

The nine-point economic policy program advocated by the council called for restoration of balance between wages, prices and profits; increased purchasing power through bargaining and legislation to give workers a fair share without increasing the price level and, in fact, cutting it in some instances; repeal of the 7 percent tax-credit; federal funds for public programs wtih ample funds for the poverty program; and a rollback in interest rates.

Citing the toll of sharply rising interest rates—a 33⅓ percent rise in nine months—the council urged the Federal Reserve not to increase its interest rates; called on Congress to adopt an interest-rate ceiling of 4.5 percent on time deposits of all types, including certificates of deposits of all denominations; urged congressional demands on the Federal Reserve to stabilize the money market and maintain reasonable interest rates; urged curbs on the capital goods boom; asked legislation to provide a gradual and orderly end to the issuance of certificates of deposits by banks; urged a review of the effects on the money market of the government's issuance of participation certificates.

"While the American people pay the price for [the current] interest rate policy," the council declared, "the only beneficiaries are the commercial banks and those who can buy large blocks of corporate and government securities and bank certificates."

The interest rate policy is "generating turmoil and frenzied speculation" that threatens to "undermine confidence in the nation's financial institutions," it warned.

Guild BNA Strike Given Support

Chicago — The AFL-CIO has called on all affiliates "to cease utilizing the services or subscribing to the products" of the Bureau of National Affairs, Washington-based reporting service, until the company reaches an honorable contract and strike settlement with the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild.

The Council declared the strike was made necessary "because of the adamant refusal of BNA to negotiate a collective bargaining agreement satisfactory to Guild member employes."

BNA management has taken an "obstinate position," the council said, and until it offers conditions leading to an honorable termination of the strike, unions should not use its services.

Council Report Shows Surge in Membership

of the affiliates experienced membership losses and the council noted that these unions are mostly involved in "industries which have experienced declining" employment, notably the railroads.

Decreases, it pointed out, were "quite small in both absolute and percentage terms."

Some of the membership increases, the council said, "can be attributed in part to the increase in employment since 1963, involving re-employment of large numbers of laid-off workers. This is particularly true in some of the basic manufacturing industries."

It noted, however, that both in these industries and in others, such as a number of white collar and professional occupations, union membership has increased proportionately more than employment, "which is clear evidence of successful organizing drives by the unions involved."

The council issued a tabulation of membership of all affiiates comparing the 1963 and 1966 figures for each union and showing the unions which have gained membership, those that showed no change and those that lost membership over the three-year period.

DEEP IN CONCENTRATION, members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council are shown around the table at their midsummer meeting in Chicago.

"Ever Ready to Negotiate":

U.S. Policy Backed On Viet Nam War

Chicago—The AFL-CIO commended Pres. Johnson for "demonstrating to the world" that the U.S. is "neither irresolute politically nor weak militarily" and is "ever ready to negotiate" the war's end in Viet Nam.

In a statement on developments in Southeast Asia, the Executive Council emphasized the continuing rebuff to every American effort to negotiate an end to the fighting and the turndown of proposals for ending the war from other non-communist sources.

The Communist rejection of these proposals, the council said, "is rooted primarily in their notion that there can be developed in our country sufficient opposition to cripple the Administration's firm determination" to defeat Communist aggression.

The council noted that the Viet Cong forces have been suffering heavy losses and that the U.S. and its allies "have gained the military initiative." In face of these developments, the council added, the U.S. policy of providing adequate forces to meet the Communist buildup is not an escalation of the war.

Escalation, it said, is not a matter of numbers or arithmetic, but of policy and basic aims and those are to end the Communist threat and preserve the territorial integrity and freedom of South Viet Nam.

The bombing of North Vietnamese oil depots, the council said, is a "phase of the overall strategy of convincing Hanoi that its aggression will not go unpunished and that it is too costly."

Turning to the problem of dissent, the council said the right of dissent is a basic principle that "must be neither abrogated nor abused." But, it added, disruption, "by even a well-meaning minority," can adversely affect democratic strength. It added:

"Those who would deny our military forces unstinting support are, in effect, aiding the Communist enemy of our country—at the very moment when it is bearing the heaviest burdens in the defense of world peace and freedom."

The council declared that "nothing should be left undone" to assure the democratic character of the forthcoming national elections in South Viet Nam. A "strong, representative, civilian government," it said, "in this long-embattled country would vastly improve its prospects for peace and freedom."

Meany Hits 'Fake' Letter, Urges Federal Probe

and constitutes a fraud on the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks and the employes of Pan American Airways."

Queried about the letter at a news conference during the Executive Council meeting, Meany said the forged document was "par for the course as far as the Teamsters are concerned. It reflects the morals and mentality of those people."

Walter Williamson, director of the air transport division of the Railway Clerks, explained how the forged letter and a forged union leaflet would have aided the Teamsters.

Under the Mediation Board rules, the Teamster bid could not be successful if a majority of employes did not vote in the election. The Railway Clerks, therefore, decided not to allow their name on the ballot and asked their members not to vote in the election.

The faked Meany letter, sent out in an envelope that reproduced the signature seal of the air transport division, urged employes instead to write in the name of the Railway Clerks on the official ballot.

Pan Am employes also received a fraudulent leaflet, purportedly signed by the Railway Clerks, urging a write-in vote.

Williamson told newsmen that a comparison of names and addresses on the envelopes bearing the forged letter and leaflet were identical with similar address labels on acknowledged Teamster mailings.

The fraudulent material was sent to Pan Am employes after they had received official Mediation Board ballots but before the deadline for return of the ballots. The votes are to be counted Sept. 7.

Meany noted in his letter to O'Neill that those responsible for the fraud are subject to prosecution under federal law and said he will "insist that this unconscionable act be thoroughly investigated by the appropriate federal investigative agency."

He added: "The purpose of this fraudulent letter is clear. By falsely representing that the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks has reconsidered its action of removing itself from the official ballot, and that the brotherhood and I now urged a 'write-in' vote, the authors of this fraud hoped to induce a majority of Pan American employes to cast a ballot so that the election would be regarded as valid under the Railway Labor Act."

Shoe Union Supported In Strike

Chicago—The strike of the Boot & Shoe Workers at the Chapel Hill, Tenn., plant of the General Shoe Co. was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which urged members of all affiliates to "refrain from purchasing" shoes manufactured by the company.

The firm, known as Genesco, has been unwilling to negotiate an acceptable contract with the union, the council said, and has turned to strikebreakers to continue production.

The council supported the union's campaign to inform the public and trade unionists of the strike and ordered its resolution in support of the union be given "widest possible circulation" with the request not to purchase the company's products.

Genesco produces the following brand-name shoes for men: Fortune, Flagg Bros., Hardy, Safety First, Jarman, Johnston & Murphy, W. L. Douglas and Sentry;

For women: I. Miller, Fortunet, Valentine, Charm Step, Cover Girl, Madamoiselle, Datebook, Fantasy and Gypsies;

For children: Acrobats.

AIFLD Commended By Executive Council

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has strongly commended the work of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and rejected criticism of the organization and its work in helping to develop a free trade union movement in Latin America.

Pres. George Meany said the council heard a detailed report from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who is also secretary-treasurer of AIFLD, on its activities and on the campaign of "vilification" carried on in the Communist press and in other publications against the AFL-CIO supported organization.

After hearing Beirne's report, the council adopted the following resolution:

"The Executive Council commends the American Institute for Free Labor Development for their work in carrying out the policies of the AFL-CIO in the international field and rejects out of hand the campaign of vilification that has been conducted against the AIFLD."

In reply to a press conference query, Meany said the resolution was carried by a vote of 23 to 2, with one abstention.

The AIFLD has been engaged on two fronts in Latin America, training young and promising trade unionists for leadership roles in free trade union groups in their own countries and helping through a social projects program to create housing, cooperatives and other badly needed institutions.

It has worked closely with the U.S. economic aid program on these projects as well as recruiting union funds for investment in the projects.

Bigger Role Urged For Latin Unions

Chicago—The free and democratic trade unions of Latin America were urged by the AFL-CIO to work for economic integration through their participation in national economic development planning bodies.

The Executive Council said it was in accord with the efforts of Pres. Johnson in striving for higher economic growth rates "for our sister republics in the hemisphere." The success and growth of the Central American common market structure and the progress shown by the development of the Latin American Free Trade Association "demonstrate clearly that hemispheric partnership requires unified and coordinated economic planning."

This is the best way to meet the needs of expanding populations as well "as the urgent demands for a progressive and stable political and socio-economic revolution," the council said.

Labor Management Unit Defines Stability Goals

The President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy on Aug. 17 reiterated its support of the "goals" reflected in the Council of Economic Advisers' 1962 report on wage-price guideposts but emphasized that the goals cannot be applied pro forma to "every particular price or wage decision."

The labor-management committee also declared that in a free society any price-stability policy "will be acceptable and effective only if it bears equitably on all forms of income."

The statement of the group recommended that hereafter the Council Advisers should make a quarterly "objective evaluation" of the effective application of the guidepost goals in "the economy as a whole."

The labor-management group should then submit to the President its own report including "recommendations for corrective action," the statement declared.

The 1962 CEA goals "as a whole need and deserve support" through "maximum efforts to restrain, through voluntary procedures, unjustified wage or price behavior," the report stated.

It pointed out, however, that even in 1962 the CEA recognized that average increases in productivity in industry should be treated as a "guide" rather than a "rule" in measuring wage and price behavior.

The labor-management group further noted that in 1962 the CEA acknowledged that guideposts could not be "arbitrary."

It also cited from the 1962 CEA report this sentence:

"Public judgments [on] particular wage or price decisions should take into account the modifications as well as the general guides" set forth for the use of those seeking non-inflationary conduct.

The Labor-Management Advisory Committee is composed of union officials, management executives and a third group named as public representatives, all of them appointed by the President.

Firm's Bargaining Shifts Held Bad Faith Practice

New Orleans—A company which made "marked changes" in proposals tentatively agreed to in a series of bargaining sessions with a union was guilty of bad faith and of triggering a six-month strike of the Steelworkers, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled here.

The court, dismissing a company appeal, agreed to the enforcement of a National Labor Relations Board order against the San Antonio, Tex., Machine & Supply Corp. Under the order, the company must:

- Reinstate with backpay all employes who went on strike May 23, 1963, and who offered to return to work Nov. 13, 1963.
- Establish a preferential hiring list for strikers for whom jobs are not immediately available.
- Bargain with the union on request and embody any understanding reached in a written agreement.
- Reinstate with lost pay a woman secretary who was fired for bringing a sandwich and a soft drink to a picket at his request during her coffee break.

NLRB records show that company owners bought the firm's assets in April 1963 from a predecessor firm of the same name and entered negotiations on a contract due to expire that month. Tentative agreement was reached on some clauses, but management then brought in a newly hired consultant who submitted a proposal May 23 which was "considerably changed" from the old one, the board related.

CWA Board Summoned:

Contract Deadlock At Western Electric

New York—Pres. Joseph A. Beirne called the Communication Workers executive board into emergency session here to receive a report on lagging negotiations with the Western Electric Co.

The union, backed by the "complete and unstinting support" of the AFL-CIO, is seeking a new contract for some 17,000 equipment installers who have been working on a day-to-day basis since the last agreement expired July 28 and who have voted 7-1 to authorize a strike against Western Electric, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Bell System.

Bargaining sessions brought what a union spokesman called "minor" progress, with management offering to improve health and hospitalization provisions.

The AFL-CIO leadership in backing the CWA reviewed the situation and declared that negotiations "have been hampered because of Western Electric's apparent abdication of its managerial responsibility."

"If this had not been the case," the council added, "agreement could have been reached by July 28.

"As it was, CWA received the company's first offer on wages a scant 27 hours before the contract expired, and then the offer was for a pittance of 5 cents an hour. A zero-hour offer was still so pitifully inadequate that any chance of an honorable settlement by CWA was out of the question."

The Executive Council recalled the union's reluctance to take a strike vote because the workers in the bargaining unit "are key figures in our nation's need to maintain and expand communications in a period of intense global crisis."

Bell System profits, it observed, are at an all-time high of $2 billion a year, and the productivity of CWA members has been rising at a rate of more than 3.6 percent annually.

"Despite all this, Western Electric management elected to shield itself behind a 'guideline' concept permitting a mere 3.2 percent increase," the council went on, "thus endangering meaningful negotiation leading to a contract and industrial peace and security."

In voting "complete and unstinting support" to the CWA, the Executive Council also called on Western Electric "to recognize its privileged position in private enterprise and fulfill its responsibility to its employes, to the union and to the nation."

GE Bows to U.S. Court Order, Meets with 8-Union Committee

New York—General Electric management—bowing "under protest" to a federal court order—met here with a bargaining committee from the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers which included members of seven cooperating AFL-CIO unions.

The committee will bargain for the 80,000 GE employes represented nationally by the IUE; the seven other unions negotiate locally at plants where they hold bargaining rights for some 35,000 workers. But the makeup of the IUE committee reflected what the AFL-CIO Executive Council described as the "unity of spirit and purpose" among the workers and their unions.

The eight unions are also coordinating their bargaining goals at Westinghouse, where IUE negotiations opened Aug. 25 in Pittsburgh. Their joint effort, the Executive Council said, "will demonstrate, on a large scale, that voluntary cooperation among unions having contracts with the same employer can be beneficial to all."

As the two sets of negotiations got under way, the council assured the 180,000 workers at the two giant corporations that the entire AFL-CIO is "solidly behind their quest for economic justice."

The opening session of the GE-IUE negotiations was marked by:

- A GE statement reiterating its opposition to the makeup of the union committee and reserving the right to appeal the court order and contest the NLRB complaint.
- Presentation by the IUE of its contract proposals, including a "substantial" wage increase; an annual improvement factor based on productivity; a cost-of-living escalator; improved holidays, vacations and other fringe benefits; job security items including overtime restrictions, higher premium pay, supplemental unemployment benefits and gradual shortening of the workweek; elimination of geographical differentials; a full union shop and a job retraining program.
- A promise by GE to "study" the union proposals, coupled with an attack on the union's demands as "past all borders of reality and practicality."
- An agreement by the two parties to bargaining three days a week until Sept. 12, and then five days a week.

Contracts covering workers represented by the eight unions expire at midnight Oct. 2.

The seven other cooperating unions are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers and Flint Glass Workers. They also have the support of three other unions representing smaller units of GE and Westinghouse workers, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings, who heads the bargaining team at GE, told newsmen that "a fair and equitable settlement can be reached without having to resort to a strike."

Management Cautioned

But he stressed this would require management "to abandon its old-fashioned take-it-or-leave-it method of dealing with unions and bargain in good faith."

Jennings said the biggest barrier to reaching an agreement by the contract deadline would be "the refusal of either party to modify an unsatisfactory proposal."

He said union negotiators were willing to continue to bargain even during the period of the IUE's convention, Sept. 5-9.

Senate Vote Approves 'Floating Firetrap' Curb

The Senate approved a strong ship safety bill designed to protect Americans from the hazards of foreign-flag passenger vessels, many of them "runaways" from U.S. safety requirements.

AFL-CIO maritime unions led the fight for effective legislation to curb "floating firetraps" sailing from American ports.

The Senate strengthened a House-passed bill which would merely have required passenger-ship operators to provide financial guarantees against the standing of passengers abroad.

The House bill was passed during the first session of Congress, before disastrous fires on the Yarmouth Castle and Viking Princess cruise ships focused attention on inadequate safety standards for foreign-flag ships.

Despite Administration opposition to some provisions, the Senate approved the strengthening amendments by unanimous voice vote. Its bill includes these provisions:

- A requirement for full disclosure of vessel safety standards in all advertisements and promotional literature offering passage on ocean voyages.
- Authority for the Coast Guard to bar from U. S. ports foreign and domestic vessels considered unsafe.
- Requirement that owners and charterers of passenger vessels establish their financial responsibility to meet liability incurred by death or injury of passengers.
- Financial guarantees against stranding of passengers.

Labor Backs International Study Bill

The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its support of the Administration's International Education bill in a statement to a Senate Labor subcommittee.

The three-part bill would authorize federal grants to help establish undergraduate programs of international studies, graduate centers for specialized research and training, and 100 percent federal financing of language and area study programs under the National Defense Education Act. A similar bill has passed the House.

Participation in the programs should not be limited to college students and graduates, the AFL-CIO suggested in its statement.

"Many of the U.S. trade unionists working in other countries are not graduates of high school, much less college," the federation noted. "Their practical experience has been invaluable in preparing them for their present assignments. The artificial barrier of a college degree should not stand in the way of others like them receiving training to prepare for international work."

The AFL-CIO urged also that grants be made available to public agencies and non-profit organizations to give greater flexibility to the program.

Johnson to Reappoint Brown to Labor Board

Pres. Johnson has announced that he will reappoint Gerald A. Brown, a career civil servant, to a second five-year term as a member of the National Labor Relations Board.

Brown joined the NLRB staff in February 1942. He served as a field examiner in the Chicago, Atlanta and Memphis offices and from 1947 until his first appointment to the board by the late Pres. Kennedy in 1961, as San Francisco regional director. He took time out for three years of Army service during World War II, rising from a private to a captain.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce strongly opposed his reappointment, accusing him of being improperly pro-union but not submitting evidence to back the charge. Several businessmen wrote Johnson opposing Brown, and the CofC was reported to have suggested five other candidates to the President.

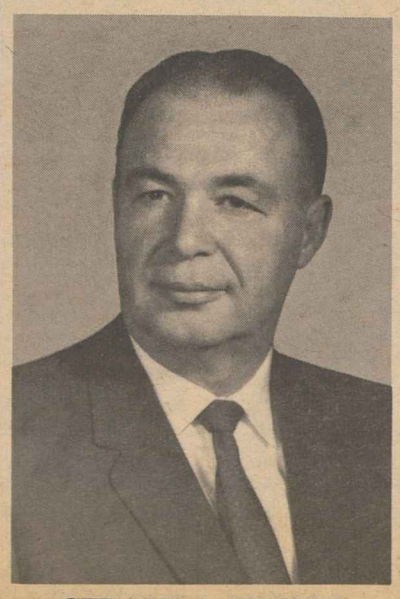
Brown, 52, was born in Olustee, Okla., attended public schools in Amarillo, Tex., and went to Amarillo Junior College, West Texas State Teachers College, the University of Texas and the University of North Carolina.



GERALD A. BROWN

Standard Oil Unions Map Bargaining Plans

Richmond, Calif.—Unions representing 15,000 employes of the Standard Oil Co. of California have joined to form the Standard Oil Unions Coordinating Committee and to support each others' bargaining and organizing programs.

The committee was organized in June at a meeting of six unions called by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. Fourteen international and local unions, representing a great majority of the giant oil company's non - supervisory workers, sent delegates to a recent meeting in the hall of Machinists Lodge 824 here at which it was agreed that:

- Unions bargaining with the employer will advise the others of company moves in negotiations and will consult on how they may best achieve contract goals.
- All the unions will help unorganized workers get in touch with the appropriate union representing their division within the company.

A joint leaflet listing the names and telephone numbers of the member-unions has already paid off in new members, the meeting was told. Another session was scheduled for Sept. 16 in Los Angeles.

The coordinating committee's headquarters are in San Pablo. Additional affiliates are: OCAW Locals 1-547, El Segundo, Calif., and 1-561, Richmond, Calif.; Operating Engineers Local 552, El Paso, Tex.; Boiler Makers Locals 317, Richmond, and 251, El Segundo; Intl. Union of Petroleum Workers, an affiliate of the Seafarers with contracts in Richmond, San Francisco, Bakersfield, Calif., Salt Lake City, Utah, and elsewhere; Carpenters Local 642, Richmond; Pipe Fitters Local 159, Richmond; Sheet Metal Workers Local 216, Richmond, and two unaffiliated unions: the Petroleum Workers Union, representing marketing employes, and the Western States Service Stations Employes Union, representing Standard of California service station employes but not those of its affiliated Chevron stations.

The Economic Contrast

WITH A LARGE AND GROWING spread between costs and prices and with real wages lagging behind the nation's rapidly increasing productivity, it is no surprise that profits have been increasing at a much faster pace than wages and salaries.

The record reveals that profits have moved far out of line with every other major type of income. Between 1960 and 1965, profits soared 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after taxes, and dividend payments to stockholders increased 43 percent.

In sharp contrast, the weekly after-tax, take-home pay of factory workers increased only 21 percent (13 percent after accounting for the rise of living costs).

Total wages, salaries and fringe benefits of all employes in the economy increased only 33 percent—reflecting increased employments as well as advances in wages and salaries. And total after-tax personal income in the entire economy increased merely 34 percent.

This unbalanced condition continues in 1966. Between the first half of 1965 and the same period of 1966, profits rose an additional 11 percent both before and after taxes, and dividend payments to stockholders increased another 13.5 percent.

But the after-tax weekly take-home pay of factory workers increased only 2.7 percent in that period—with almost no improvement at all in buying power. Total wages, salaries and fringe benefits of all employes increased merely 9.5 percent and after-tax income in the entire economy rose only 9 percent.

AS A RESULT of these sharply contrasting trends, the wage and salary earners' share of the value of national production has been going down, while the business share has been increasing.

Inequities in income distribution have been developing and widening. And these social inequities are creating a growing lack of balance between the economy's increasing ability to produce and the lagging buying power of the workers and consumers.

The government expects business investment in new plants and machines to rise 17 percent this year—about twice as fast as the Gross National Product for the third successive year. On the basis of government estimates, business investment in the newest automated plants and equipment in 1966 will be 55 percent greater than in 1963 when the super-boom began.

The large-scale installations of these plants and machines are expanding industry's capacity to produce at a much faster pace than the economy's sustainable demand for goods and services under ordinary circumstances. If permitted to run its course, this capital goods super-boom will collapse and generate an economic decline.

THIS BOOM OF PROFITS and business investment should not be confused with a general, economy-wide condition of inflationary shortages. Despite increased military spending, there are no widespread shortages of goods, productive capacity and manpower.

There is no excessive demand for goods in short supply. There is no consumer scare-buying or hoarding. On the contrary. Auto sales have declined. Home building has dropped sharply. The buying power of most workers' take-home pay has hardly increased in the past year.

If there is inflation in the American economy in 1966, it can be found in lopsided profits and business investment booms.

'When Daddy Comes Out, Too, We'll Go'

Msgr. Higgins Says:

Anti-Strike Law Backers Want To Eat Their Cake and Have It

Msgr. George H. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Council, writes a weekly column called "The Yardstick." This is his latest entitled "The Price of Freedom."

ON JULY 27, 1897, the Sheboygan (Wis.) Herald editorialized rather plaintively on the evil of strikes and wistfully expressed the forlorn hope that a modern St. Patrick would rise up and miraculously banish them from our midst.

"The whole strike business in whatever locality or form," the Herald lamented, "is almost always a curse to all parties connected with it and indirectly to every citizen to a certain extent. Oh! for some St. Patrick to banish the whole strike business into the Atlantic."

A month later the editor was still wringing his hands in despair.

"Sometimes we feel," he wrote in a follow-up editorial, "that we would like to live under a monarchy, where there is not so much liberty, where one man or a company cannot have liberty enough to take away the liberty of others. Probably liberty is a good thing, but it seems to be overworked in places." (Cited in "Kohler on Strike: Thirty Years of Conflict," by Walter Uphoff, Beacon Press, Boston.)

It is interesting to note, in passing, that the strike which occasioned these two editorials was called in protest against an ultimatum by the Kohler Co. that its employes accept a 50 percent wage cut or the plant would be shut down. How the then editor would have reacted to future strikes against the company—which dragged on intermittently for the better part of three decades—or to the recent airline strike, is difficult, of course, to say, but presumably he would have taken a very dim view of them.

Whereas, he still thought in 1897 that liberty was "probably" a good thing, he might have concluded by 1966 that it was probably not such a good thing after all. And seeing no real hope that "the whole strike business" would ever be banished into the Atlantic by a latter-day St. Patrick, he might well have begun to advocate, not vaguely and uncertainly but in all seriousness, that we switch from our smaller republican form of government to a no-foolishness, no-monkey-business form of monarchy.

Maybe not—but if a relatively insignificant molders' strike which took place at a time when the labor movement was still in rompers left him so frightened and dejected, one can only surmise that the present power of organized labor would literally scare him out of his wits.

Be that as it may, many of his 1966 counterparts in the Fourth Estate [reacted] to the airline strike in much the same way as he reacted in 1897 to the first of the many Kohler strikes. While they are still persuaded that liberty is "probably" a good thing, even for organized workers, they are beginning to suggest that its exercise—especially by organized workers—is proving to be harmful to the public interest and should be severely restricted.

THIS IS understandable, of course. Liberty in the field of labor-management relations can be and undoubtedly has been abused by workers as well as by employers—or, to repeat the words of that 1897 Sheboygan editorial, has been "overworked in places." Of course it has been.

But what to do about it? Shall we try miraculously to banish "the whole strike business" into the Atlantic by the simplistic device of enacting anti-strike legislation? That would be one way of going about it, but any school boy could tell us that the next step would have to be price and wage control.

That's what AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was trying to say when he warned that anti-strike legislation would be a step in the direction of "socialism." Some columnists and editorial writers who have been inveighing against socialism for years laughed out loud at Mr. Meany, but I have yet to figure out what they were laughing at. Surely they are not unrealistic enough to think that organized labor would supinely roll over and play dead if Congress were to enact anti-strike legislation in peacetime.

Quite obviously organized labor wouldn't do anything of the kind. On the contrary, it would demand—and properly so, in my judgment—that Congress balance the scale by enacting companion legislation which would control prices and put a limit on profits.

You can bet your bottom dollar that Mr. Meany's critics in the Fourth Estate would move heaven and earth to try to stop the Congress from enacting such legislation. I can't say that I would blame them. But what in the world makes them think that they could possibly have their cake and eat it, too?

'Profit Inflation':

Statement of Executive Council On Status of National Economy

Herewith are excerpts from a statement on the national economy approved on Aug. 23 by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

INFLATION in America is clearly and directly profit inflation. Profits have skyrocketed—moving up, far out of line with wages and salaries.

The result has been increased living costs that have washed out much of the value of workers' wage gains. In the past year, the buying power of most workers' take-home pay has hardly advanced, at all. Wage and salary earners have not received a fair and adequate share of the benefits of the economy's forward advance.

In the key manufacturing sector, unit labor costs actually declined 1.9 percent between 1960 and 1965. But the companies increased the wholesale price level of manufactured goods by 1.7 percent—almost as much as the decline in unit labor costs. In the first half of 1966, the unit labor costs of manufactured goods were only one-tenth of 1 percent higher than in the same period of 1965, but the wholesale prices of industrial products jumped 2.8 percent.

The spread between unit labor costs and industrial prices has been growing. It is now greater than at any time since mid-1951. Most of this spread reflects widening profit margins. And with the rising volume of sales, profits have soared.

The inequity and injustice of these trends is crystal clear to all who wish to know the facts. Between 1960 and 1965:

- Corporate profits soared 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after payment of taxes.
- Dividend payments to stockholders rose 43 percent.
- Weekly take-home pay of factory workers increased only 21 percent, and in terms of buying power, merely 13 percent.
- Total wages, salary and fringe benefits of all employes in the entire economy increased only 33 percent—reflecting increased employment, as well as gains in wages and salaries. This trend continues in 1966—with wages and salaries lagging behind the sharp rise of profits and dividends.

The continuing shift in income distribution is creating a serious lack of balance between the economy's rapidly rising ability to increase production more efficiently, and sustainable advances in the demand for goods and services.

Soaring profits—aided by the 7 percent tax-credit subsidy for business investment and rapid depreciation write-offs—are fueling the fires of a capital goods super-boom.

The new installations are increasing industry's productive capacity much faster than the demand for goods and services can be expected to rise, on a sustained basis.

As a result, there is a growing danger of excess capacity, eventual collapse of the investment boom and a general economic decline. Moreover, in combination with rising military expenditures the capital goods boom is creating a price-boosting psychology among businessmen throughout most parts of the country.

This one-sector boom, however, should not be confused with generally excessive demand for goods in short supply. Auto sales are down from last year; home-building has dropped sharply; there are no shortages of consumer goods; nor is there any scare-buying or hoarding. Unemployment at 3.9 percent of the labor force—with joblessness rates of over 12 percent for teenagers, nearly 8 percent for Negroes and 4.6 percent for blue-collar workers—is far from full employment.

The Federal Reserve's attempt to curb this capital goods boom has pushed up interest rates to the highest levels in 40 years.

BECAUSE of all these factors, the AFL-CIO Executive Council advocates the following economic policies:

1. Restoration of balance between wages, prices, profits and business investment is essential, as well as much lower interest rates.

2. Increases in the buying power of wages and salaries are needed to provide workers with their fair share and provide a healthy advance in mass consumer markets, the foundation of the economy.

3. The major mechanism for achieving rising real earnings in America is collective bargaining—within the framework of the thousands of different markets, industries and occupations.

4. Special attention to lift the real wages of the working poor requires the extension of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to millions of low-wage workers and an increase in the federal minimum wage.

5. High and rising business profits and the economy's rapidly increasing productive efficiency make possible such increases in workers' buying power without raising the price level. In fact, the profits and productivity of many companies are so high that they could simultaneously raise wages and cut their prices to consumers.

6. Achievement of economic balance also requires an effective curb on the capital goods super-boom—through repeal of the 7 percent tax-credit subsidy for business investment in new equipment and/or an increase in corporate taxes. This will also make more funds available for housing, the rebuilding of cities and expanded public facilities.

7. Continued growth of the economy is required to achieve and maintain full employment. This means increased real wages and growing consumer markets, as well as sufficient federal funds for the planned expansion of programs to meet the needs of America's growing urban population.

8. We urge the Administration and the Congress to provide ample funds to finance an effective war against poverty.

9. Interest rates must be rolled back.

Finally we reiterate our position.

If the President judges the situation to warrant the adoption of extraordinary stabilization methods—designed to bring all costs, prices and profits, as well as wages and salaries, under evenhanded restraint—he can be assured of the support and cooperation of the AFL-CIO. At the present time, there is no such equity, and any such program must apply equitably to all groups in the population and to all components of the cost of living.

We are prepared to sacrifice as much as anyone else, for as long as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A GLIMPSE OF TRUTH came to a Senate subcommittee, headed by Sen. Ribicoff of Connecticut, when it invited various mayors of major cities to advise what might be done to heal the deep wounds of the battered urban communities.

The insouciant Republican mayor of New York City, John V. Lindsay, the handsome young man who made it all the way in his first bid for a position of potential national GOP leadership, startled the senators out of their boots by suggesting, blandly, that maybe an additional $50 billion in federal funds across the next 10 years would help solve his city's problems.

Both Ribicoff and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York seemed to think Lindsay might be joking, Kennedy commenting that the mayor's suggestion was totally "unrealistic."

That may well be, but Lindsay assuredly was not joking. He made it clear that he was offering what to him appeared an educated guess of the money that might be needed for housing, parks, recreation, rapid transit and other things that might make New York City "livable and exciting" again.

Lindsay clearly has begun to think deeply about the desperate financial needs of his city, to realize that he can't raise enough in local taxes or from state aid to start doing massive redevelopment, and that there is no possible source except the federal treasury.

NEXT WAS Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh of Detroit, also a young man but a Democrat, with special credentials equipped to speak of urban needs. He has served more than four years and been reelected (Lindsay's experience is only nine months), and he is president of the U. S. Conference of Mayors.

Cavanagh said that the federal government should appropriate $113 billion across 10 years to finance "the rebirth of the American city."

The money should go into a special urban development fund on which cities could draw for "a myriad of purposes on the basis of approved, comprehensive social and physical renewal plans."

It is a matter of what we consider national "priorities," he remarked, pointing out that $70 billion had been effectively set aside for our "commitment" of landing a man on the moon by 1970 and another $43 billion set aside previously for the "commitment" of completing the interstate highway system by 1971.

A "similar commitment is needed," he declared, to see that "the rebirth of our cities is accomplished." At least $250 million, he pointed out, was urgent for his own community to clean up the Detroit River, and "there is no way we can finance this locally," so the river keeps pouring its pollution into Lake Erie to turn it into a "giant bog."

Mayor Samuel Yorty of Los Angeles, a third witness, irked the subcommittee because he seemed to shrug off any sense of responsibility for his own community, but Yorty is known to be a maverick political figure, perhaps insensitive to anything except what he guesses will promote his own future according to familiar paths.

But Cavanagh and Lindsay gave the subcommittee something to think about—and maybe something to support an administration that first finds a way to plan an overall program and carry through with the federal financing.

IT IS FASCINATING, surely, that spokesmen of the cities don't shrink from the prospect of getting more federal money, that they show no fear that federal aid is less moral somehow than state aid, that the enterprise and initiative of local leaders would be lulled and blighted.

In short, they sounded like natural spokesmen for the needs of the people where most of the people live rather than an outmoded veteran politician who hasn't looked at the realities of people's needs for half a century.

During at least two of his major campaign speeches of 1964, Pres. Johnson told audiences that he looked for a new and "creative" relationship between the federal government and the great cities, with a new kind of partnership developed that would be fed by federal funds although depending on creative local leadership in planning and execution.

Labor News Conference:

Priority Urged for Agreement On 1968 Date for $1.60 Wage

RESTORING the Feb. 1, 1968, effective date for a $1.60 national minimum wage is the most important and constructive change in the Fair Labor Standards bill voted by the Senate Labor Committee, the AFL-CIO's top legislative spokesman said.

Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the Dept. of Legislation added the prediction that the earlier date could be held in a Senate-House conference committee. His statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, aired weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The measure, as unanimously approved by the Senate Labor Committee, would raise the present $1.25 an hour minimum wage to $1.40 on Feb. 1, 1967, and to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1968. Coverage would be extended to more than 7 million additional workers. The House bill set the date for the last step on Feb. 1, 1969.

ALTHOUGH "very few union workers" would be affected by the improved minimum wage, Biemiller said, the AFL-CIO has fought hard for the measure because of its conviction that it will be "the most effective weapon . . . in the war on poverty."

"Wages in some industries today are just ridiculously low and they certainly must be brought up," he declared. "We think the minimum wage legislation is the most effective and most direct method of getting purchasing power into the hands of the lowest-paid Americans."

Questioning Biemiller on the AFL-CIO produced public service program were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

THE MOST IMPORTANT issue on the pending minimum wage bill is to hold the Senate committee action making a second-step $1.60 minimum effective Feb. 1, 1968, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller (center) said on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

Cost of Living Slated to Reach Inflationary Peak in September

By Sidney Margolius

YOUR LIVING COSTS will hit their inflationary peak this September. Clothing always costs more in September at the start of the season, but prices will be reduced gradually, beginning with the Columbus Day sales in October.

The real problem is the higher prices of food. City families have been shocked by the large jumps on such necessities as bread and milk, and are voicing noticeable anger. Farmers are equally bitter about their low earnings, especially in the dairy industry, and sensitive to any criticism that higher farm prices may be responsible for the leap in retail food prices.

Now the Federal Trade Commission has started an investigation of food prices, on top of the probe just completed by the National Commission on Food Marketing.

Actually, there is extensive evidence that the jump in the price of some staples is much greater than warranted by the increase in farm prices.

The most glaring example is the recent rise in the price of bread. It has gone up 3 cents a pound loaf to a new high of 30 cents in some large cities such as New York. But U.S. Agriculture Sec. Orville Freeman has pointed out that the farm cost of the ingredients (wheat, skim milk, etc.) has risen only one-half of 1 cent. In fact, the entire cost of all the ingredients in that loaf of bread amounts to less than 4 cents.

In 1950, the farmer got about 2.5 cents for the wheat in a pound loaf. The bread retailed for about 14 cents. This year the wheat costs 3.2 cents. But the bread costs 22 cents (nationwide average).

The second controversial item is the jump in the price of milk which is as much as 3 cents a quart in some cities. Freeman reports that the rise in the farm price in such areas amounts to just 1 cent. The dealers tacked on the other 2 cents.

There are some curious differences in prices in various cities, indicating the degree of control by distributors. Midwest families pay as little at 20-22 cents for bread. In large seaboard cities such as New York, Los Angeles and San Francisco, you pay 28-30 cents. Milk costs as little as 20-21 cents in half-gallons in midwest cities, but 27-30 cents in the East.

Even in close-by cities there are strange differences. Milk costs 5 cents more in Philadelphia than in Pittsburgh. Bread is 4 cents more in Cleveland than Detroit. Bread is cheap, but milk unusually expensive in Washington and Philadelphia.

The cruelest blow is that some of the biggest jumps have been on foods used most by moderate-income families. One of our readers, Mrs. M. H., of Lutsen, Minn., has kept close records of her costs. She writes:

"There are seven in my family. My last year's income was less than $2,000. I do not think the Labor Dept.'s figures reflect the true impact of inflation on lower-income people because they represent middle-class buying habits, and the inflation is greater on lower-cost items. Of course, I am not able to shop around for specials because I live in an isolated location. But poor people in cities are seldom able to, either. They do not have cars, and who can afford bus fare for the amount you can carry on a bus? According to my account book, this is how the price rises have affected me" (partly because of the disappearance of some bulk packages):

|---|---|---|---|
| Powdered milk (50 lb.) | $4.00 | $7.50 | $8.25 |
| Ground beef (lb.) | .29 | .39 | .59 |
| Frying chicken (lb.) | | .29 | .49 |
| Weiners (10 lb.) | 1.90 | 3.98 | 6.65 |
| Dried beef (4 lb. box) | 2.20 | (not available) | |
| Rolled oats (5 lb.) | .37 | .49 | .65 |
| Molasses (5 lb.) | .45 | .80 | .87 |
| Lard (1 lb.) | .10 | .19 | .24 |
| Liver (lb.) | .19 | .29 | .69 |
| Soup meat (lb.) | .10 | .24 | .59 |

MRS. H. is certainly using every cost-cutting technique. The rest of us can learn from her bulk buying and the items she selects, with the possible exception of the franks (relatively low in protein for their cost). Somehow, more comparison shopping also is needed to use specials. Meat prices at least should come down a little later this fall as more supplies arrive on the market.

Her analysis that the lower-cost items have gone up most is absolutely right. We checked nine low-cost meats and cheese (ground beef, chuck, end chops, lamb breast, liver, etc.), against nine fancy cuts (sirloin, round, veal cutlet, center chops, etc.). The nine low-cost items have gone up 5 percent in 12 months. The high-cost cuts average exactly the same.

There have been especially big increases in such moderate-income staples as franks and hamburger, up 8 percent, and bologna, up 12 percent.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR: A drop in prices of turkeys, now in heavy supply, will help restrain your climbing food bills. Beef has been relatively cheaper than pork this year, and both will be in larger supply later this fall. Medium-size eggs are better buys than large at this season.

Lots of Things Are Just as Sure As Death and Taxes, Life Shows

By Jane Goodsell

WHOEVER SAID that nothing in this world is certain but death and taxes was talking through his hat.
Lots of things are just as inevitable as that.
Admittedly, I have no statistics and, therefore, I can't
Back up my assertions with percentile graphs unless some foundation offers me a grant.
Nonetheless, I think it's safe to say that it's an absolute cinch
That the length of string with which you attempt to tie a package will be too short to go around it by a fraction of an inch.
Just as it is an ineluctable certainty that when you arrive at the airport 40 minutes early, your plane will take off two hours late,
But if you arrive five minutes before plane time, your seat will have been sold to a standby passenger, sure as fate.
Likewise, it is an inescapable and foregone conclusion
That when the hotel maid unlocks your door with her passkey to check the linen supply, she will find you heading for the shower and covered with nought but pretty confusion.

WHEN YOU NEED a dime to put into a stamp machine, you find only nickels and pennies in your coin purse nine out of 10 times,
But when you need a nickel for a parking meter, all your coins have been converted into dimes.
When you are looking your very best, fresh from the hairdresser and outfitted in your new fall suit and lizard pumps, you can be sure you won't meet a soul you know,
But should you dash out in curlers and pedal-pushers to pick up a sack of peat moss, you not only encounter your mother-in-law and your least favorite friend, but you inevitably bump into an old beau.
So you see, there are plenty of things about which we can feel cocksure,
Which probably explains why we all feel so insecure.

Physicians Urged to Use Medicare Payment Plan

Doctors who bypass the normal medicare procedure and insist on billing their elderly patients directly will be creating unnecessary financial hardships, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman warned.

Seidman suggested in a letter to AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies that patients covered by the $3-a-month voluntary medical insurance program be encouraged to discuss fees and billing procedures with their doctors before treatment begins.

Doctors should be urged to use the medicare machinery for billing and accept the government's criteria for "reasonable charges" for services, he said.

The American Medical Association has recommended that physicians bill patients directly. This would require the patient to pay his bill and submit an itemized receipt with a claim for reimbursement for the portion covered by medicare. In many cases, Seidman noted, it would "result in unnecessary problems and additional expenses" for the patients.

The voluntary medicare program—which supplements the free hospital insurance provided persons over 65—requires the patient to pay the first $50 a year. The program then pays 80 percent of the additional cost for covered medical services.

End Waste of Human Resources:

Revolution Proposed In Manpower Policy

THE MAN STANDS IDLE on the streetcorner. He stares vacantly at passing traffic. Many people walking by with a sense of purpose may mentally label him "bum" or "no-good" or "lazy" or worse.

The truth is, he is America's most wasted resource. For too long we have been complacent about the waste of our human resources. Now we know that human resources can be identified and developed and conserved—to the benefit of each individual and the nation.

To enable each person to develop his abilities to the fullest is a goal worthy of America's highest ideals. But to end the tragic waste of manpower in a period of record employment opportunities makes good economic sense as well.

Achieving the full and proper use of our human resources will require changes in the ways we traditionally approached the manpower problem.

Technological and social advances are occurring so rapidly that the needs of employers and the demands on workers are altered continuously. It seems obvious that the imagination which creates change must be expanded to embrace its consequences.

Our answer is nothing less than a revolution in manpower policy. This means a combined effort of government, labor and management to give top priority to our human resources.

We used to be concerned with protecting jobs. Now we have to turn our attention to upgrading them.

Where we once paid most attention to keeping men at work, we must now find new men to put to work.

AS WE FORMERLY concentrated on the existing labor force, we now look toward preparing people to enter the working world for the first time.

All these changes reflect the new directions of the economy. They reveal the need for more and more people, in different jobs, and often in new locations.

These new directions bear on every aspect of our economy. They require the understanding participation of everyone in it. The main avenues of change clearly include:

- Upgrading the presently employed—giving new skills with a long-term future to many of today's workers.
- As an outgrowth of upgrading, opening new opportunities in every industry—and new ones—for the vast reservoir of discouraged, ignored and disadvantaged people of every background.
- Reaching out to the people bypassed over the decades to gather them into the unfamiliar life of regular employment.
- Translating civil rights into employment rights for a large number of men and women whose race alone has barred them from a chance to work and earn.
- Coupling the existing public and private programs to fit the needs of individual workers and specific industries.
- Preparing today's youth for tomorrow's jobs.
- Bringing to bear the whole spectrum of federal services in a single effort to get ahead of the emerging manpower problems of a given community or employment area.

Exciting and productive things have happened within this framework recently; more will be needed and more will be done. In the Dept. of Labor, we can make a contribution, but ultimately the cooperation of labor and management will tell the tale of long-term success.

Labor Day Weekend Broadcasts Set For AFL-CIO Public Service Film

The AFL-CIO television film, "When the Day's Work is Done," showing how union members give of their time and talents to public service, will be shown on more than 110 stations, with coverage in 36 states and the District of Columbia, over the Labor Day weekend and during the following week.

The documentary film is narrated by Dave Garroway and carries comments by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne on the role of union members in public service. The film also is available for use at local union meetings and conventions.

Meany to Tell About Aid to Labor Abroad

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will discuss how American unions help labor abroad on the Georgetown University Forum, carried by some 300 radio stations and two Washington, D. C., television stations.

In Washington, the half-hour television program will be carried Sept. 4 at 12:30 p.m. by WRC-TV, Channel 4. It will also be seen Sept. 5 at 10 p.m. on WETA, Channel 26. Radio broadcasting dates vary around the country.

Appearing with Meany will be Georgetown University Prof. James D. Atkinson and John Fisher, president of the Institute of American Strategy. Wallace Fanning of NBC News is the moderator.

Living Cost Index Rises, Factory Pay Declines

Living costs rose a sharp four-tenths of 1 percent in July, while both the take-home pay and buying power of factory workers dropped.

The Labor Dept.'s Consumer Price Index climbed to 113.3 percent of the 1957-59 price level. This means that the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 about eight years ago was priced at $11.33 last month.

At the start of 1966, the CPI was 111; a year ago it was 110.2.

A seasonally shorter workweek in July was largely responsible for a drop in after-tax earnings of about $1.15 a week for factory production workers — to an average $98.57 for a worker with three dependents and $90.73 for a single worker.

The rise in prices, added to the loss in earnings, resulted in an over-the-month drop in buying power of $1.37 a week for the family man and $1.29 for the single worker. Despite higher wages, buying power over the past year has dropped one-half of 1 percent because of higher social security taxes and the rise in prices.

The July price index showed sharp over-the-month increases in both public transportation and used car costs. Hospital and doctor bills continued their sharp rise. Tight mortgage money boosted the cost of home ownership. Meals cost more in restaurants. Food costs—other than dairy products — increased less than thesy usually do in July.

The July CPI index will also bring automatic cost-of-living increases for about 1.14 million workers. More than a million — in auto and automotive parts, farm equipment and aerospace — will get a 2-cents-an-hour hike based on the rise in the index since April. Others will receive increases ranging from 1 to 5 cents, based on monthly, quarterly or semi-annual changes in prices.

To illustrate the nature of the over-the-year price change, the Labor Dept. gave this breakdown of the $2.80 increase in a $100 basket of goods and services from July 1965 to July 1966.

It showed that $1.35 of the increase was in the services category —including medical care, mortgage interest, barber and beauty care, public transportation, laundry and insurance.

Higher food prices accounted for 71 cents of the increase.

Another 62 cents covered clothing, fuel, newspapers, household supplies, tobacco, gasoline and other nondurables.

The remaining 12 cents of the year-long analysis was accounted for by durables such as houses, furniture, appliances and autos.

The Labor Dept. announcement said "in a longer time perspective, the gains in real dependable earnings have been large. Since July 1946," the department said, "they have risen by 41 percent, with more than one-fourth of that improvement concentrated in the July 1961 to July 1966 period."

UAW Board To Meet on Pay Turndown

Detroit—Higher pay for skilled workers in the auto industry will be "at the top of the agenda" when the Auto Workers executive board convenes Sept. 7, the UAW said.

The board will consider the flat rejection by the major automobile manufacturers of the UAW's request to reopen its contracts a year in advance of the September 1967 expiration date. The union asked a 50-cent hike for skilled workers in the auto plants.

General Motors, Ford and Chrysler management all turned down the UAW request for a contract reopening, declaring that they expected the workers and their union to abide by the existing agreement.

Only once—during the Korean war inflation period—did the auto industry agree to reopen an unexpired contract.

Auto workers will, however, receive "annual improvement factor" increases ranging from 7 to 13.5 cents an hours on Sept. 5, plus a 2-cent hourly cost-of-living increase.

Training Plan Seeks Leaders From Poor

The Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty — aided by a grant from the Ford Foundation — will launch a three-year, $4 million program to train 1,000 leaders from the ranks of the poor.

CCAP Chairman Walter P. Reuther said the goal is to end the "isolation" of the poor from the rest of the community, "a barrier that can and must be removed."

Reuther said a special effort will be made to bring into the training program "the natural leaders of youth among the poor."

The Ford Foundation is giving a $375,000 grant to start the program and Reuther said sufficient "funds and commitments are on hand" to assure its continuation.

Injunction Parley Scheduled by CLC

Ottawa, Ont.—A national trade union conference on labor legislation, with the emphasis on relieving unions of injunctions, will be held Sept. 27 and 28 in Ottawa, Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress announced.

Also to be discussed are compulsory arbitration and the so-called residual rights of management. The conference is expected to make recommendations for future action, although it will not create policy.

Lafayette, Ind.—Apprentice training programs are the foundation of free labor and free industry and there must be no surrender in standards of qualification, Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning declared here.

Henning was the principal speaker at the awards banquet of the 13th annual apprentice contest and instructor training course of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters at Purdue University Aug. 14-19.

"There is nothing in the nation like this training program, which is a tribute to union and management," he said.

Union Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, praising the personal sacrifices the apprentices had made the last five years and the instructors "who are the life blood of the program," charged those graduating into the ranks of journeymen to "do your work faithfully and honorably and always give your employer a good day's work."

Largest and most successful of the summer institutes held through the joint efforts of the union, Purdue and industry, the courses certified a record 707 plumbing, pipe fitter and sprinkler fitter instructors and saw 114 apprentices compete for $5,250 cash and additional bonus prizes in three categories.

In the plumber contest, Kurt M. Werber of New York Local 1 captured the $1,000 first prize with the second prize of $500 going to Harold W. Otten of Chicago Local 130 and the $250 third prize to William R. Watt of Cleveland Local 55.

Philadelphian Winner

The pipe fitting apprentice contest $1,000 top prize was awarded Edward Murray of Philadelphia Local 420. Arthur C. Hombsch of Milwaukee Local 601 took the $500 second prize and Robert F. Hosch of St. Paul Local 455 won $250 for third.

Thomas M. Collins of Chicago, Local 281 was the $1,000 top prize winner in the sprinkler fitter competition. Second was Danny R. Pavey of Evansville, Ind., Local 669 and third was Henry E. Stoepker of Comstock Park, Mich., also from Local 669.

Henning said he was proud of all building trades unions for their efforts in ending discrimination and pointed out that of the 8,600 complaints filed with the federal Equal Employment Opportunities Commission in its first year, only 10 had involved any building trades union.

"If a man is qualified, he has the right to work where you work," he declared. "Churches, businesses, newspapers, television and American industry are led and staffed by white men. A tragedy of the times is that organized labor has been cited by some as one of the villains of discrimination. But all must see that the qualified are not prevented from working or advancing because of their race, creed, color or national origin."

Comparably, he asserted, "there must be no surrender of standards, no lowering of qualifications because of ethnic identity or membership in a minority group or any other reason."

Improved Delivery Service Urged By Letter Carriers Convention

Detroit—Unionized letter carriers are just as concerned about improving postal service as they are about winning an adequate wage scale.

Pres. Jerome J. Keating of the Letter Carriers called a bid for improved postal service one of the three major actions taken at the union's convention here.

Keating stressed that the two other major union goals—enactment of a federal labor-management bill and raising of wage scales—would reflect themselves in better service since they would result in the retention of qualified employes.

He said the low pay scale is a factor in the manpower shortage which faces many areas. He placed the difference at about $400 between present pay for carriers and clerks and the higher level the union is seeking.

Keating called on the Post Office Dept. to do away with the use of temporary carriers "so that you don't see a different letter carrier delivering your mail each day of the week."

The theme of labor-management legislation, good service and adequate pay dominated the week-long convention which drew some 3,500 delegates and an almost equal number of guests, spouses and members of the union's ladies auxiliary.

Keating called on the delegates to send information to the union's research department on all cases of curtailment and impairment of service. He also urged that similar complaints about bad service be forwarded to the director of the Bureau of the Budget—an office which Keating said is responsible for most of the service deficiences since it has cut $300 million from postal appropriation in recent years.

"All of you—and your brothers back home—interview the candidates for Congress in your districts. Ask them if they are going to support our program on labor-management, service and pay.

"And, if they will not promise to support us — no matter what party they belong to — no matter how nice people they are — don't vote for them."

Keating was re-elected to another two-year term by acclamation as were Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher, Sec.-Treas. J. Stanly Lewis and other officers.

A resolution was adopted which calls for continued exploration of possible merger of the National Association of Special Delivery Messengers and the National Rural Carriers with the NALC. Othere resolutions adopted by the convention dealt mostly with working conditions or internal union affairs and procedures.

Legislative Goals Set By PO Vehicle Union

Minneapolis—The National Federation of Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes approved four major legislative proposals at their 20th biennial national convention here, re-elected top officers and hailed assurances that jobs are safe despite mechanization.

The legislative program calls for:

- Accumulated sick leave to be credited toward an increase in pensions at retirement.
- Retirement after 25 years of service with no decrease in pension. The requirement now is 30 years of service for a full pension.
- A 35-hour workweek to replace the 40-hour workweek.
- Performance by government employes of the mail-hauling work now handled by private contractors.

Pres. Gibson Re-Elected

Delegates re-elected Everett G. Gibson of New York City to a new two-year term as president. Gibson has headed the 7,000-member union since 1957 and has served on the executive board since 1941.

Also re-elected were Chester W. Parrish of Miami as secretary-treasurer and Leon S. Hawkins of Detroit as first vice president.

Other officers chosen were: Paul Jameson, St. Louis, second vice president; Robert Bond, Seattle, third vice president; Leon Hoptown, Los Angeles, fourth vice president, and Hartwell Macon, Richmond, Va., fifth vice president.

In the convention's major address, James J. LaPenta, Jr., deputy assistant postmaster general, said the Post Office Dept.'s $100 million mechanization program will not displace postal workers, but instead will give them the tools to move a tremendous increase in mail volume.

LaPenta said there has been a net increase in employment of 55,000 in the Post Office Dept. in the past year and there probably will be slight increases in the future.

He disclosed that the volume of mail handled by the department is now running at a rate of 76 billion pieces a year—more mail than in the rest of the world combined.

The mechanization includes the installation of optical scanners and letter-sorting machines in the nation's larger post offices.

LaPenta explained that the optical scanner reads printed addresses and then automatically dispatches the mail to the letter-sorting machine, which sorts mail to 1,000 separation points.

The postal official deals with 14 unions representing 675,000 Post Office employes in his capacity as head of the industrial relations and personnel-management divisions.

Postal Union Spells Out Fringe Goals

Houston, Tex.—Top officers of the Special Delivery Messengers were re-elected at the union's 17th biennial convention here, and delegates approved a legislative program stressing improved fringe benefits for postal workers.

The 2,000-member union represents one of the smallest crafts in the postal service, but bargains nationally with the government's largest civilian department and has exclusive recognition for its craft in 14 of the 15 postal regions.

During the past two years, Pres. Michael J. Cullen reported, the union's membership has grown nearly 25 percent.

Cullen was elected unanimously to his first full term as president. He had been filling out the term of George Warfel, who died in office early in 1965.

Delegates also re-elected Sec.-Treas. John K. Dunning.

Among the resolutions passed were calls for optional retirement after 25 years of service, payment for unused sick leave on retirement, full government payment of health and life insurance premiums and a 35-hour workweek.

The delegates voted down officers' recommendations for a per capita tax increase. A resolution to raise the amount from $1.50 to $2 a month and a compromise amendment for a $1.75 per capita both were defeated.

WARM OVATION was given Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.) by delegates to the Letter Carriers 45th biennial convention in Detroit. Morrison, who faces a runoff election in September following a hot primary, is expected to become chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee in January if he wins re-election.

New Objectives Set:

Organizing, Contract Goals Moved Upward by Teachers

By Eugene A. Kelly

Chicago—Delegates to the 50th anniversary convention of the American Federation of Teachers set new high goals in organizing and collective bargaining and redefined policy for the union's leadership and its more than 120,000 members.

Encouraged by reports that the AFT has won most of the 60 collective bargaining elections it engaged in during more than two years of intensive effort, the delegates considered these additional objectives on the convention floor, in conference and committee sessions:

Uniting all teachers in one "powerful professional union"; continuing teacher efforts to become "full partners" in the educational process, intensifying an AFT pilot program aimed at providing more efficient schools.

A program in 21 "disadvantaged" areas of New York City has worked well in its first year of operation and will continue as a cooperative venture of the city school system and AFT Local 2—the United Federation of Teachers—a seminar headed by Simon Beagle, New York City assistant principal, reported.

Pres. Johnson and Vice Pres. Humphrey sent messages to the opening session and welcoming talks were given by Mayor Richard J. Daley, Pres. Frank M. Whiston of the Chicago Board of Education, Pres. William A. Lee of the Chicago AFL-CIO and others.

Pres. Charles Cogen, in his "State of the Union" report, said the AFT can "at last see a clear road ahead to the goal set by the founders" of uniting all teachers in one union working with all organized workers to "achieve a better society." He called for doubling the nation's teaching force and spending at least twice the present amount for instruction, better equipped schools and teachers and smaller class sizes.

Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.) warned against any "mammoth centralization" of education. Executive Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute told a civil rights luncheon that demonstration marches had done great good. But, he added, "If we ever get proper class sizes, adequate pay for teachers, an improved curriculum and a satisfactory building program, it will be not because the Negro marched but because you teachers inculcate these factors into the contracts you sign."

"The right to withdraw your services" is the key to these goals, he emphasized.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Randolph himself reminded the luncheon that "Freedom is never given, it must be won. The marchers of the civil rights revolution are comparable to the strikes and picket lines" of early union organizing drives.

The convention got a report that the AFT sponsored 29 "freedom schools" in a dozen Mississippi communities this summer, with 22 volunteers from major cities teaching academic subjects along with citizenship rights and Negro history to 2,500 youth and 1,500 adults.

The schools, run by Arthur and Carolyn Reese of Michigan, encountered more community "violence and opposition" than ever before, AFT Vice Pres. Richard Parrish said.

Also announced was the signing of a first contract by the Ecrose, Mich., local covering 9,144 school employes, after a four-week strike.

AS A RESIDENT of Indianapolis, Pres. Joseph DePaola (left) of the Barbers warmly welcomed Pres. William D. Buck (right) of the Fire Fighters as the latter moved into town with delegates to the union's 28th convention. Buck later was re-elected.

Fire Fighters Set Study Of Strike Ban Policy

Indianapolis—A national commission of prominent figures in public life, government and the labor movement will be sought by the Fire Fighters to review the status of the union's ban on strikes and determine whether it should be altered to meet changing conditions and viewpoints in the public service.

Decision to create the commission, which had been recommended by Pres. William D. Buck in his report to the Fire Fighters 28th convention here, was approved in the closing minutes of the final session.

The vote followed rejection, by about 2-1 margins, of four separate resolutions proposing in various ways to eliminate or alter the union's longstanding constitutional barrier to strikes in the fire service.

Triggering interest in the strike question were a recent two-day walkout by a break-away group in Atlanta, a threat of mass resignations from the fire department in St. Louis, and a heavy concentration of sick reports by fire fighters in Kansas City.

While some officers of the union dispute that the three demonstrations brought tangible results, a majority of the delegates indicated that the trend toward collective bargaining by government employes clearly requires a fresh look at the union's tactics in cities around the nation.

Pres. Buck's report to the convention of the 120,000-member union said the commission could "bring a fresh look and a fresh viewpoint to the fact-finding process—with no pre-commitment to a 'no-strike' policy or a 'pro-strike' policy. It should study the proposition deeply and objectively."

Proposals Due by 1968

The convention proposal called for the commission's report and recommendations to be in the hands of the IAFF locals well before the union's 1968 convention in Toronto.

In the long debate over the various proposals, delegates from a number of cities argued the strike weapon is necessary for fire fighters to keep up with other workers in government and private industry. Others argued that removal of the no-strike ban might invite legislative retaliation in some states, or a public opinion "backlash" if lives were lost by fire during a walkout.

Before acting on the strike issue, the 800 delegates—largest number ever to attend a Fire Fighters' convention, had taken the following actions:

- Re-elected Pres. Buck, Sec.-Treas. Albert E. Albertoni and all but one of the union's 15 vice-presidents.
- Raised per capita tax from 50 cents a month to 60 cents this year and 65 cents next year. In doing so, the delegates rejected a unanimous recommendation of the executive board to raise the per capita in two steps to 80 cents a month.
- Renewed the union's strong opposition to "consolidation"—the merger of police and fire departments—and to "disparity," through which the historic equality of police and fire pay scales has been tilted in some cities in favor of the police force. The union noted, however, successes in restoring parity in a substantial number of cities which had pushed police salaries to a higher level than the fire fighters'.
- Instructed the union's officers to write to national civil rights organizations—the NAACP, CORE, the National Urban League, and others—and point out that fire fighters have only one interest: to protect the community from fire or other natural calamities.

Protection Sought

Other resolutions called on the union to notify city governments that fire fighters should not be used for police duty in riots, and another urged federal legislation to make a criminal offense of an attack on a fire fighter performing his duty.

The IAFF statement noted that in many cities, fire fighters are being made "the butt of attacks by irresponsible individuals and groups" and that "unprovoked attacks" have been made on fire fighters responding to alarms.

Much of the attention of the convention was focused on the contest for the union's two top posts.

Challenging Buck, who has held the presidency since 1957, was John A. Kabachus of Boston, a former IAFF secretary-treasurer who unsuccessfully sought the top post two years ago.

Sec.-Treas. Albertoni was elected to his second term by a margin of 466-319 over Jack Waller of Spokane, Wash.

Ralph Burden of Columbus, Ohio, was elected vice-president representing the union's big eighth district. He defeated Leonard C. Cook of Gary, Ind. and the incumbent, Cornelius Shea of Chicago.

Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, the honor guest at the convention banquet, said it was time city council and other government agencies recognize the perils faced by fire fighters and rewarded them.

Senate Votes to Step Up Attack on Urban Slums

The Senate voted to launch a massive new attack on city slums through a new program which would mobilize federal and local resources to rehabilitate entire neighborhoods.

Passage of the Demonstration Cities bill by a 53-22 vote was a significant victory for the Administration. The bill was the major new Great Society program advanced by Pres. Johnson this year. It came under sharp Republican attack and still faces a hard battle in the House.

The AFL-CIO expressed its "stout support" and urged its enlargement. As passed by the Senate, it would make available $1.2 billion over three years to cities which come up with comprehensive plans to reverse the decay of older neighborhoods.

Existing federal programs would be used to improve existing housing and build new homes, build and modernize schools, hospitals, recreation facilities, public works, transit service, community centers, expand job training, provide child care facilities and other social services.

Most of these federal programs now require a degree of matching local funds. The incentive under the new program would be additional federal grants to cover 80 percent of the non-federal share of the cost. Additional urban renewal and public works funds would be made available for cities undertaking demonstration projects.

When he proposed the program early this year, Johnson suggested that a typical program in one of the nation's large cities would improve the housing and living standards for 100,000 people.

The original Administration bill contemplated a $2.3 billion program over five years. While cutting the authorization to three years, the Senate bill is similar in scope. For the current fiscal year, the only expenditure would be $12 million in planning funds with the large-scale spending slated for the 1968 and 1969 budgets.

Conservative Republicans, led by Sen. John G. Tower (Tex.) and GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), sought to rally a bipartisan ecnomy bloc behind an amendment to slash $900 billion from the bill. Dirksen charged that the program would be a colossal "boondoggle."

Economy Move Beaten

The money-slashing amendment was easily beaten, 53-27. Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), floor manager for the bill, put together a majority of 43 Democrats and 10 Republicans against a coalition of only 17 Republicans and 10 Democrats.

The mammoth problems facing cities were pointed up by mayors of a number of large cities who testified at hearings being conducted by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.).

New York Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) said his city has 2 million people living in poverty, needs to replace or rehabilitate 800,000 substandard apartment units, and would require "$50 billion in new federal" money over the next decade to make the city "livable."

Utility Local Sets Charities Mark

New York—Members of Utility Workers Local 1-2 contributed a total of $250,550 in the 15th annual charities drive conducted jointly by the union and the Consolidated Edison Co.

Business Manager Michael Sampson of the union and Con Ed Vice Pres. Bernard Gallagher pointed out that the total given was an all-time high and raised the amount collected in the past 15 years to more than $2 million—more than half of it in the last five years.

Mailmen Snap Back At 'Obnoxious' Pets

Detroit—The letter carriers' major occupational hazard—dogs that bite—came in for attention in a resolution adopted by the mail men's biennial convention.

The delegates called for federal legislation which would make the owner of vicious or offensive dogs subject to a fine plus liability for any and all damages and loss of compensation and time resulting from a carrier being bitten by such dogs.

The resolution was amended to include not only dogs but all other "obnoxious animals and pets."

Guam Passes 'Work' Law Over Veto

Agana, Guam—The unicameral Guam legislature has passed a so-called right-to-work act over the veto of Gov. Manuel F. L. Guerrero and sent it on to Pres. Johnson, who has until Oct. 14 to veto it or let it become law.

The measure was the first "work" bill to be enacted under the American flag since the Wyoming legislature approved one in February 1963.

The island has a civilian labor force of about 10,000 Guamanians. Only a handful are organized into three AFL-CIO affiliates—the Government Employes, some 600 members employed at nine locations; the Teachers and the Marine Engineers. There are no indigenous unions, and no unaffiliated mainland unions.

The territorial legislature is composed of 13 Territorial Party members and seven Democrats, with one vacancy. The two-thirds majority that passed the "work" bill over Guerrero's veto was made up of the 13 Territorial Party members and a lone Democrat.

The act not only outlaws security but seeks to put the federal courts back into the injunction field by asserting that "any person injured or threatened with injury by an act declared illegal by this title shall, any other provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding, be entitled to injunctive relief."

Guam is administered by the Interior Dept. Its 1960 population was put at 60,000.

In Council Resolution:

Independent Agency Urged for Maritime

Chicago—The concept of an independent Maritime Administration—free from control by any overall government department—was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The Maritime Administration is presently under the Commerce Dept. The Administration has asked Congress to put the agency under the proposed new Dept. of Transportation. The Transportation Dept. bill had been taken up in the House as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Subordination to either department, the council said, would result in the "essential needs" of the maritime industry "being continually ignored and submerged."

The council resolution traced the "neglect" of America's commerical sea power to the point where the country has fallen to "third-rate status" and it called for a reversal of the trend through upgrading of the agency charged with overseeing the merchant marine.

"Today the American merchant marine is being called upon to meet a war situation for the third time in 25 years," the council said. "Owing to the neglect of this industry by the government since the end of World War II, and the failure of the Defense Dept. to foresee and admit the need for merchant ships to transport troops and supplies across the seas, the condition of the merchant fleet, its supporting shipyards and available skilled manpower has reached the point of crisis." The statement added:

"Merchant shipping has played a vital part in American history. Today, as the result of short-sighted policies on the part of government officials with no understanding or sympathy with the significance of commercial sea power, we have fallen to third-rate status among maritime nations."

The resolution warned that the third-rate status "which gravely threatens the security of the nation," will continue "if the Maritime Administration is permitted to be buried in another government department, whether Transportation or Commerce."

The council urged that responsibility for "this vital interest" be placed "in an agency which has the status and authority necessary for the performance of its duties."

Minimum Wage Bill Near Victory in Senate

hailed the "noteworthy" inclusion of the farm workers, describing them as "a particularly low-paid and exploited group, long needing protection."

The biggest newly-covered groups are in retail trade, hotels, motels and restaurants, laundries and dry cleaning establishments, hospitals and nursing homes, construction and logging operations, transit workers and agricultural processing employes. The House and Senate bills largely overlap in coverage.

"All these improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act are essential to assure those who work at least a minimum fair standard of living," the Executive Council said. "In addition, they will provide the national economy a needed increase in purchasing power to sustain economic health and growth. All can easily be absorbed out of record-breaking business profits and rapidly rising productivity."

The council termed the Senate bill "a modest but important beginning in raising the level of living of the least fortunate of America's working poor."

Disputes Section Added

Early in the debate, the Senate added an unrelated amendment to the wage bill—an instruction to the Secretary of Labor to make recommendations to Congress by Jan. 15 on "improved permanent procedures for the settlement of emergency labor disputes."

Senators Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), sponsored the amendment.

Chelsea, Mich.—Woodrow C. Artz, active in establishment of Auto Workers Local 1284 at the Chrysler Proving Grounds and recording secretary of the local from 1954 through 1963, was accidentally electrocuted at his home in Gregory, Mich., while sanding his boat on the first day of his vacation.

Teacher Shortage Seen Critical to Nation's Poor

U.S. schools need at least 1.5 million more qualified teachers and "much more" federal aid to do their job adequately. Pres. Charles Cogen of the American Federation of Teachers told a National Conference on Educating the Disadvantaged.

Many of the 1.9 million persons now teaching in U.S. schools are administrators and a large number are inadequately trained —some even lack a college degree or permanent state certificates, Cogen said in a "position paper" given to a panel of which he was a member.

To fill the need, Cogen declared the schools must have increased federal funds earmarked specifically for training additional teachers, reducing class size and providing more school space.

The shortage of qualified teachers is so critical, he said, that the federal government should consider establishing a teacher-training "academy" like the Army, Navy and Air Force academies.

Cogen and David Selden, his assistant, told a press conference that the AFT strongly supports federal aid to education but believes that, as funds are increased, first priority must be given to "solving basic school problems."

PICKET SIGNS were turned into victory signs over the Machinists' airlines contract settlement when members of Lodge 1487 greeted IAM Pres. P. L. (Roy) Siemiller on his arrival at Chicago's O'Hare Airport.

Airline Mechanics Approve Pact, Planes of Five Lines Fly Again

Airline Machinists voted by a 68 percent margin to accept terms of a new three-year contract and return to work after a 43-day strike against five major commercial carriers.

IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller announced the results at union headquarters after secret ballot votes of ground crewmen employed at 231 airports. The tally was 17,727 in favor, 8,235 against the settlement.

Planes began flying again after picket lines came down and flight crews returned to work. Regular flights were resumed on all lines, although Trans World Airlines said it might take a few days to activate all its overseas runs.

The settlement involving 35,000 mechanics and ground service crews contained a cost-of-living clause, three consecutive yearly wage boosts of 5 percent each, and improvements in holidays, overtime pay, vacations, job classification stepups and premium pay for line maintenance workers.

The strike was successfully concluded despite a Senate bill to order the workers back without a contract and government refusal to approve in advance any contract "package" breaking the area of 3.2 percent.

Federation Pres. George Meany warned legislators at the time that a back-to-work law would strangle democratic principles and asked why only wage increases are considered inflationary.

Commenting after the settlement, Meany told reporters covering the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Chicago that the "validity" of employer attempts to hold wage increases to a 3.2 percent level had been destroyed.

He also pointed out that the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee in its most recent meeting reiterated the desirability of voluntary action to maintain wage-price stability but said that a specific percentage figure could not be applied in all cases.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz on Aug. 21—two days after Machinists ratified the proposed contract—told a television audience on the ABC program, "Issues and Answers," that the airline pact was not likely to affect the economy as much as the recent rise in steel prices, or the increase to 6 percent in prime interest rates set by leading U.S. commercial banks.

The union-management agreement was the third proposal since the walkout started July 8. The first, based on a proposal by a Railway Labor Act emergency board, was rejected by IAM negotiators. The second, worked out with the aid of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and announced by Pres. Johnson, was voted down by union members themselves by almost 3-1.

The third, agreed to after a 20-hour bargaining session with the aid of Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds and other mediators, was recommended by Siemiller and others on the union bargaining team.

At a press conference following the settlement announcement, Siemiller said "no inflation is involved" in the new pact "if a boost in wages brings these workers up to a point where they can buy groceries."

New Goals

He said the contract is "satisfactory, but it should have had more in it." In the next pact the union will seek full paid pensions "and a lot of other thangs," Siemiller assured newsmen.

Wirtz told his TV listeners that the cost of the increase in steel prices will be $90 million, "every single penny of it in violation of the guidelines." Asked why the Administration had not tried harder for rescindment of the price hike, he said advisers felt the effort would not have been successful.

Reynolds said on "Reporters' Roundup," a television interview, that "the basic idea of the guideline has taken a beating" and "we probably have to re-examine it very carefully."

Another government figure, Chairman Gardner Ackley of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said he "greatly regrets that this settlement so substantially exceeds" the 3.2 percent wage guidelines but added that the pact will not require higher prices to passengers or shippers.

Ackley put the cost of the new contract at 4.9 percent, not the "6 or 8 percent which some reports have inaccurately claimed."

A trend toward lower airline prices, Ackley continued, "would be consistent with the guidepost for prices." The guidelines, he said, "specify that, in industries with higher than average productivity gains, prices should be reduced to share the gains with the general public."

8-27-66

Government statisticians reported that the airline industry productivity of all employes rose 9.8 percent in the 1960-65 period and 11.2 percent for the last year alone. Profits of all airlines were put at $179.5 million before taxes in 1964, $309.4 million in 1965.

Strike's end halted action by Congress on bills to break the walkout. The Senate voted 54-33 to send the strikers back to work and to extend the no-strike period of the Railway Labor Act for up to 180 days while mediation continued. The House Commerce Committee voted for a similar bill with minor amendments, but further action was delayed when members learned that a settlement might be reached.

Painters Give $8,000 For Political Action

The Painters, Decorators & Paperhangers have presented the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. with $8,000 for the promotion of local and national legislation benefitting the building trades, Pres. S. Frank Raftery announced.

The funds came from the union's Political Action Together (PAT) program, a nonpartisan political arm which was established, Raftery said, to assist candidates for public office who support building trades legislation.

TWA Scores In Pepperell Vote

Lindale, Ga.—The Textile Workers Union of America won a major organizing victory at the Pepperell Mills here, its third southern success in recent weeks.

The vote in the NLRB representation election was 1,139-917 for the TWUA. Earlier the union had won bargaining elections among more than 600 workers at Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., North Charleston, S. C., and in a 300-worker unit at Spofford Mills in Wilmington, N. C.

New AFL-CIO Farm Union Scores Breakthrough Win

Labor Day Message:

Union Strike Right Basic to Freedom

By Gervase N. Love

Labor Day 1966 finds peace based upon agreements reached through collective bargaining "the prevailing condition in union-management relations," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in his annual Labor Day message.

Two elements help bring about the peaceful negotiation of a good contract, he said. One is the fact that each side has the same general objective—"a fair share from a prospering enterprise," with a bargain always possible despite sometimes great initial differences. The second is the workers' right to strike.

"It is the right to strike that gives meaning to collective bargaining," Meany emphasized.

"It is the right to strike that gives a union's spokesman some measure of equality at the bargaining table. The word 'strike' may never be mentioned, and usually isn't, but both sides know the right is there.

"The right to strike is almost universally accepted, in theory, as a fundamental right of free workers. But it is not just a theoretical right. It is an operating right. Anyone who says he believes in the right to strike must accept the fact that strikes will sometimes occur."

The right to strike, Meany maintained, is what gives the American labor movement its strength.

"Without a strong labor movement, wages would be lower, consumer purchasing power would be lower, and another economic col-

House Bars Maritime Unit Shift

A labor-supported amendment to keep the Maritime Administration independent of a new Dept. of Transportation won by a 260 to 117 vote as the House passed and sent to the Senate a bill creating the new cabinet-level department.

The House bill would create a 12th department in the federal government to consolidate transport promotion and safety functions of agencies dealing with air, rail and highway transportation. The Maritime Administration was specifically excluded from the new department's functions.

GOP Plans Last Fight:

$1.60 Pay Minimum Nears Final Passage

A new minimum wage, rising in two steps from the present $1.25 hourly level to $1.40 and $1.60 and applying to millions of previously unprotected workers, seemed assured when Senate-House conferees agreed on compromise provisions of two slightly different bills passed by the two houses.

The key decisions in the conference committee were these:

● House conferees accepted the Senate version of the bill setting Feb. 1, 1968, as the date for application of the second-step increase to $1.60 an hour.

The House had voted to postpone the application date for the $1.60 minimum until 1969—a full year later for the second-step increase—but yielded to the Senate. The Johnson Administration and labor had strongly supported the 1968 date for the second-step rise.

House Republican leaders said they would seek to send the bill back to conference committee with instructions to House conferees to insist on the 1969 date.

● Senate conferees agreed to a compromise that threw out most limitations of coverage that had been cut from the House-passed measure.

They dumped, specifically, a section eliminating protection for about 900,000 employes of grade schools and high schools, specifying the coverage did not include teachers.

They also agreed to drop a Senate floor amendment, sponsored by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), setting $350,000 as the gross volume for an enterprise to determine

Cracks Into Anti-Union Stronghold

San Francisco—Field workers at two major farms of the giant DiGiorgio Corp. have chosen the AFL-CIO as their collective bargaining representative in a crucial and historic farm labor election.

Unofficial returns indicated that the two unions of farm workers which have been on strike at DiGiorgio since last September and who made up the single AFL-CIO entry on the ballot defeated the Teamsters in a unit of nearly 900 field workers.

Official results of Aug. 30 voting at the firm's Delano and Borrego Springs farms were delayed until arbitrators could rule on 332 challenged ballots.

But observers were convinced that the challenged ballots could not upset the unofficial result. Nor would they change the choice of the Teamsters in a smaller unit made up of truck drivers and helpers and shed workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, Cesar Chavez and Larry Itliong, its leaders:

"Warmest congratulations on a great victory. The road is now open to a new era for farm workers, not only in California but all across the nation.

"You are the pioneers who opened that road and you will be gratefully remembered for generations by those who will benefit from your efforts.

"But let us now move forward. As you know this triumph is not an end in itself but only a beginning. I again assure you that

Job Bias Ruling Sustains Charge Brought by Union in Mississippi

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has sustained the first complaint ever filed by a union under the equal employment provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The commission ruled that a Mississippi cottonseed oil firm violated the law in a number of ways, most notably by paying Negro workers inferior wages because of their race.

The Chemical Workers Union, which joined five Negro members in the complaint first filed last December, said the ruling could establish a "yardstick" leading to justice for thousands of workers.

The EEOC report said Planters Manufacturing Co. of Clarksdale, Miss., violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act by:

● "Maintaining segregated restroom, locker room and drinking facilities.

● "Maintaining a discriminatory wage differential between Negro and white employes who perform essentially the same duties.

● "Excluding Negroes from the job classifications of solvent plant operator, solvent plant trainee and in clerical positions.

● "Maintaining a discriminatory system for awarding paid vacations to its employes based upon race."

Commission investigators also concluded that the company "unlawfully discharged" one of the workers as an act of reprisal for filing complaints with EEOC.

Chemical Workers Pres. Walter L. Mitchell said: "The decision could become a veritable Magna Carta for southern workers. The commission is saying that the lack of a rational wage rate structure at a plant can be evidence, on its face, of racial bias.

"The traditional pattern of discrimination has been to provide different rates of pay for Negroes and whites who perform identical jobs, but to divide jobs into 'white' jobs and 'Negro' jobs and to pay Negro

Teachers Elect Full Cogen Slate, Endorse 'Responsible Militancy'

By Eugene A. Kelly

Chicago—The American Federation of Teachers started its second half-century of union existence by returning its top leaders to office and endorsing their call for "responsible militancy" in organizing, collective bargaining and crusading for better schools.

Delegates to the 50th anniversary convention of the AFT re-elected Pres. Charles Cogen for his second two-year term and elected all 16 candidates for vice president on Cogen's Progressive slate.

Cogen defeated John M. Fewkes of Chicago, AFT president in 1943-44, by a vote of 1,506 to 683. Four of Cogen's caucus teammates ousted four incumbent vice presidents who ran on the Fewkes ticket. The outcome was a one-caucus Executive Council—the first in many years.

The convention called for free public education for every student for no fewer than 16 grades or through the 21st year of age. It urged a doubling of present national expenditures for schools and for twice the present number of public school teachers. It set goals of an $8,500 to $17,000 wage range for teachers with a bachelor's degree, $10,000 to $30,000 for college faculty members. It invited members of the Classroom Teachers' Dept. of the National Education Association to join the union and the U.S. labor movement.

Striking out in new directions, the delegates also:

- Amended the AFT constitution to make administrators "from principal up" and any organization of non-teaching personnel ineligible for membership unless they previously were members. The vote, 240-137, climaxed 20 years of effort by amendment supporters.
- Voted 219-159 to "support every effort of the Administration to achieve a lasting and honorable peace in Viet Nam." Another resolution opposing escalation of the Viet Nam conflict was defeated, 292-173.
- Established a college department with a full-time director and staff to maintain the organizing pace that already has produced more than 50 AFT college locals.
- Gave its second annual award for outstanding school service to Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.). Pres. Johnson was the 1965 recipient.

The delegates called on every union local to help return liberal Congress members to office and demonstrated their interest by presenting COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan with $4,800 for the fall voter registration campaign.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a message of fraternal greeting saying all who believe in free public education "have reason to be gratified" at recent aid-to-education legislation but that "much more must be done" to provide free and equal educational opportunities for all Americans.

Keynote banquet speaker was Harold Howe II, U.S. commissioner of education, former history teacher and school superintendent. Howe said he views the "rather sudden emergence of teacher militancy" on the American scene as "one of the most hopeful developments" in education. He added: "I sympathize completely with the teacher's drive for a larger share of our society's affluence."

Goals Defined

For the years ahead, Howe urged AFT members to "seek the professional's habits of life as well as his rewards: a willingness to appraise his fellows and to be judged by them; a personal alliance with significant areas of man's knowledge; and finally, an intelligent dedication to the concept of service."

Convention balloting was by voting machine. The new vice presidents—Albert Shanker, New York; Patrick Daly, Dearborn, Mich.; Veronica B. Hill, New Orleans, and Thomas Bull, South Bend, Ind.—replace John F. Desmond, Chicago; James E. O'Meara, Cleveland, O.; A. James Heller, Minneapolis, and Edward A. Irwin, Los Angeles, on the AFT council.

Cogen told the convention that a teacher shortage, oversize classes, slum schools and segregation are problems requiring the united action of all teachers. As he spoke, Chicago and suburban schools reported a shortage of nearly 1,000 teachers before school opening.

The convention adopted policy resolutions that:

- Rejected economic guidelines that would limit wage increases to a fixed percentage.
- Opposed teacher evaluation solely by administrators and called for a survey of evaluation practices nationwide.
- Advised locals to seek written contracts providing complete academic freedom, the right to hold office in community organizations, and the right to job security when the teacher joins any form of nonviolent protest, including "civil disobedience against any immoral and unjust laws and policies" of any public agency.

The delegates upheld the right of teachers and students to follow their own conscience in taking positions on American foreign policy. They urged that 18-year-olds be given the right to vote and that college grades not be used as a criterion for fixing student draft status.

The AFT executive council, at its first post-convention meeting, set up a new union civil rights department with Arthur Reese of Detroit, who heads the AFT's Freedom Schools program, as the first director.

Also the Council budgeted $1.8 million for union expenses during the year, an increase of about $300,000; and set aside $50,000 for the union's first strike fund. Locals may borrow up to $10 per member per day for the first two weeks of a strike, lesser amounts after two weeks, the council decided.

18% Raise Proffered:

Canada Rail Strikers Resist Legal Threats

Toronto, Ont.—The threat of massive disobedience by 122,000 striking railway workers has forced the Canadian government to pledge them an 18 percent pay raise over two years if they will end their week-long walkout.

The strike of 17 unions has already triggered layoffs in many industries. No trains are moving, air freight shipments cannot be delivered, and the telegraph system is closed across the country.

The government of Prime Minister Lester Pearson first proposed to order the men back to work with an 8 percent raise. The unions responded that the men would defy the law and would not return to their jobs.

After a blistering debate in the House of Commons, the government upped the wage offer to 18 percent, but railway union leaders say members will not obey any law ordering them back to work.

The key part of the return-to-work law is that railways and unions must negotiate a new contract by Nov. 15 or face compulsory arbitration. This has been denounced by union officials, who also point out the 18 percent raise contains no fringe benefits and falls far short of the 25 to 30 percent sought by the workers.

Leaders of the 16 non-operating rail unions and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen said the settlement offer was too little and too late. They noted it had no fringe benefits although a government-appointed conciliation board had recommended an 18 percent raise over two years plus improved life insurance, vacations and bereavement pay.

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress warned the government that the settlement by legislation would be rejected by the 122,000 striking railway, ferry and communications workers across Canada. He also denounced the government decision to remove the future right to strike from railway workers.

Eight-Month Effort

The strike at 1 p.m., Aug. 26, came after 8 months of bargaining by four major railway groups: eight non-operating unions with 55,000 members; the Associated Railway Shop Crafts, which includes 23,000 members in 7 unions; the 23,000 members of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport & General Workers on the Canadian National Railways, and the 22,000 members of the

The non-operating unions proposed an average 25 percent raise on wages that range from $64 weekly to $100.40. The BRT rates are higher, but that union wants job security provisions against the threat of longer train runs and the right to negotiate if work rules are changed by automation.

The Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways refused to accept the conciliation board recommendations because their freight rates have been frozen for seven years. Previous wage boosts were paid from $100 million a year subsidies.

The walkouts that stopped 98 percent of the freight and passenger trains in Canada, silenced the Canadian telegraph system and cut off some maritime ferry service were orderly with union officials making sure railway property was protected.

Some Ferries Running

The CBRT, which represents seamen on ferries that link two provinces—Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island—to mainland Canada, reluctantly ordered members to keep the service operating.

The Pearson government's plan to force a return to work was in two phases: an interim settlement combined with sweeping changes in railway freight regulations that would give the railways the right to charge whatever they wanted for goods.

Richard Smith of the Transportation & Communications Employes Union heads the non-operating unions which include the Maintenance of Way Employes; Railway & Steamship Clerks; Firemen & Oilers; Commercial Telegraphers; Railroad Signalmen and Sleeping Car Porters.

The crafts group includes the Machinists, Plumbers and Pipefitters. Boilermakers, Railway Carmen, Molders, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Sheet Metal Workers.

Automation's Impact on Jobs Poses Major Problem for Bakery Union

Chicago—Job losses caused by automation constitute a continuing problem that must be solved, Pres. Daniel E. Conway of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers reported at the opening session of the union's third constitutional convention.

Since the 1962 convention the ABC added 17,608 new members and chartered 17 union locals but 5,802 jobs were "wiped out" in 227 plant closings and consolidations, plus an uncertain number of jobs affected by the introduction of new production equipment and methods, Conway said.

He and the other officers—Sec.-Treas. Curtis R. Sims and Executive Vice Pres. John DeConcini—were re-elected without contests. They reported that the ABC won 149 of the 298 representation elections held since July 1, 1962, by the National Labor Relations Board, for a 50 percent average.

They said contract improvements have added an average of 37 cents an hour to members' hourly wages during the period; that strike benefits and donations totaling nearly $455,000 have been paid despite the fact that most negotiations were settled peaceably; that ABC fund balances were improved and welfare and pension systems strengthened.

Speakers included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers; Vice Pres. Stanley Johnson, Illinois AFL-CIO; Sec.-Treas. John Swift of the Irish Bakery Workers' Union; Union Counsel Henry Kaiser; COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan; Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis, AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Daniel J. Healy.

Meany said labor likes the democratic system and strives always to make it better. It supports the battle to contain Communism abroad. On the domestic front, unions note that the nation has a booming, high-profit economy with almost full employment but many problems remain, he observed.

The major current problem, he said, is that we have the highest interest rates in history—so high that the housing industry is being smothered by the rates. The answer lies in the political field, by the election of "friends who believe in the same principles and ideals that we do," he declared.

Conway told the delegates that no one union and no industry can solve the problem of vanishing jobs. Commissions named to seek solutions have confined themselves to working with statistics but labor's job, he said, is "to impress upon them that this problem relates to human beings" and requires solution now.

The union also hopes for the reunification of all workers in the baking industry and still seeks an honorable merger with the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 for domination by corrupt interests, Conway said.

Contract Proposals Detailed:

32c 'Catch-up' Raise Tops Unions' GE Bid

New York—Union negotiators started bargaining talks with the General Electric Co. here by spelling out proposals that include a "catch-up" raise of 32 cents an hour, a wage formula tailored to the cost of living, elimination of geographic wage differentials and an annual wage boost based upon productivity.

The 32-cent increase is needed to bring GE workers to the level they would have achieved if the corporation had raised them by 3.2 percent every year since 1960, the union men said. They represent 80,000 workers covered by contracts negotiated nationally by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and 35,000 others represented by other AFL-CIO unions which bargain locally with GE.

GE changed its mind about meeting with the all-union committee when a federal court ordered it to do so. It took part in the talks while continuing to seek a legal way to block union collaboration.

Meanwhile the IUE, with a multi-union committee present, opened contract talks in Pittsburgh for 65,000 workers at Westinghouse Corp. plants. Management said its contract with IUE forbids "outsiders" to attend negotiations but that it will proceed until the legal issue is settled by the National Labor Relations Board and the courts.

Union Proposals Listed

The IUE proposals to GE include a cost-of-living escalator calling for 1 percent more pay for each 1 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index; nine paid holidays; vacations of one week to five weeks; a vacation bonus keyed to 25 percent of wages, and these income and employment security measures:

- A plan for supplementary unemployment benefits during layoff.
- Restrictions on overtime when workers are laid off.
- No contracting out of unit work when skills, manpower and facilities are available.
- The right to move with the job, with reasonable expenses paid.
- Progressive shortening of the workweek and year.
- Six days of paid sick leave a year for hourly employes, with proportionate increases for salaried workers.

The union also proposed improvements in pension and insurance coverage, a full union shop, and other changes.

Opening the talks, IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said a fair and equitable settlement can be reached before contracts expire Oct. 2 if GE will abandon its "old fashioned take-it-or-leave-it" method of bargaining.

Western Electric Talks

In another major contract meeting, the Communications Workers continued bargaining with the Western Electric Co. after rejecting an offer of a 3.4 percent wage boost for 23,000 phone equipment installers. The CWA board gave Pres. Joseph A. Beirne the power to call a strike unless management agrees to give the workers a "fair share of the increased profitability" they helped make possible.

In full-page ads in 22 newspapers, the union said 3.4 percent is not enough in a year when living costs, company profits and worker productivity keep going up.

On the election front, the CWA won a bid to represent more than 500 clerical employes of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co. and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers won a place on a separate runoff ballot. CWA ousted an unaffiliated union, 223-163. The IBEW is seeking to gain bargaining rights for 9,000 telephone operators of the same firm.

N.Y. Pressmen Settle, But New Snag Develops

New York—The Pressmen came to terms with the publishers of the World Journal Tribune with approval of an agreement including a seven-hour shift on Saturday nights. But a new snag developed in the 19-week-old dispute that has prevented publication of the merged afternoon and Sunday paper.

Leaders of the 10 unions involved, through their spokesman, Pres. George Macdonald of the Allied Printing Trades Council, made it clear that agreements they had previously reached would have to be renegotiated in the light of the Pressmen's settlement and the announced death of the morning Herald Tribune with a loss of some 800 more jobs.

Publisher Turndown

Macdonald said the publishers had rejected a proposal by the other union presidents that they meet jointly on the main issue, the half-hour reduction in the Saturday night shift won by the Pressmen and the amount of money to be paid back to the publishers out of the supplemental severance pay funds they had previously agreed to.

The Pressmen, as part of their package, had accepted a seven-hour Saturday shift, including a flexible lunch hour, in exchange for a repayment of $14,000 to the publishers out of their severance pay fund.

In the earlier negotiations, during which five weeks of extra severance pay were granted to all of the nine craft unions, some of them set up a special fund out of which they planned to pay extra benefits to discharged members unable to obtain other jobs. Both the Pressmen and the printers—Typographical Local 6—established such funds.

The other craft unions now want the same terms as the Pressmen. They point out that Matt Meyer, president of the World Journal Tribune, Inc., had said during the earlier negotiations that the publishers could not grant any extra concessions to the Pressmen in the form of shorter hours without granting them to the other unions as well.

"But now," said Macdonald, "he is saying that they will not grant similar concessions to the other unions."

He said there is "a chance" the merged papers will be able to publish on Monday, Sept. 12, "provided, of course, they negotiate the remaining differences seriously."

Thomas J. Murphy, executive vice president of the Newspaper Guild of New York, agreed with Macdonald's assessment of the situation.

He said the Guild faced the loss of between 250 and 255 jobs as a result of the death of the Herald Tribune. And instead of approximately 1,000 guildsmen going back to work, he added, there would now be only 745 or 750.

AFL-CIO Farm Union Scores Breakthrough Victory in Election

the whole AFL-CIO will be enlisted in the battles ahead, as it was in the battle just won."

Sources close to the election reported that the AFL-CIO unit received 528 votes, the Teamsters 328, no union 12 votes in the "white ballot" unit made up of field workers. The vote in the other, smaller unit was 94 for the Teamsters, 43 for the AFL-CIO, seven for no union.

Final Tally Delayed

Arbitrators Sam Kagel and Ronald Haughton announced Aug. 30, that there would be no final count of the 1,349 ballot cast until 332 challenged votes had been decided.

By far the greatest number was held up on claims that the voter's name did not appear on the list of workers who had worked at least 15 days for DiGiorgio since the start of the grape strike.

To rule on whether the challenged votes would be counted, Kagel said, would take at least two days, perhaps as much as a week. Pending that determination, no official count would be announced, he said. The two arbitrators were to start hearings on them Sept. 2.

The arbitrators' announcement was given to a score and more reporters, television and still cameras, reflecting some part of the national attention that has been focused on the fight of the Delano grape strikers for union recognition and collective bargaining.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, who headed the election campaign, said in Delano:

"The DiGiorgio victory has a message for every farm worker in America—it can be done. Farm workers can unionize, they can use collective bargaining as a base for building a better life and a greater share of America's abundance for themselves and their families, even when powerful forces enter into a conspiracy to defeat them.

"What hapened in Delano has a message for every AFL-CIO member also. It is a timely reminder that the unity and solidarity of all union workers still provides the best pavement for the road to a better way of life for those who have long been denied."

The crucial, pathfinding vote had few precedents in farm labor history and none of the legal procedures that surround the usual National Labor Relations Board representation elections.

It involved, too, one of the state's largest and most influential farm corporations, as well as a head-on contest between the AFL-CIO and the Teamsters, the latter a late entry in the effort to win bargaining rights for DiGiorgio farm workers.

And it climaxed, just days short of a year, the strike by grape pickers in the National Farm Workers Association and the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee.

It was Sept. 8, 1965, that AWOC launched its strike in the Delano vineyards, joined days later by the NFWA. They fought side by side through a long winter, but with growing support from the labor movement and from a variety of church and civil rights groups.

The grape strikers capped a 300-mile march from Delano to the state capitol at Sacramento last Easter with the announcement that their strike had won union recognition at the Schenley vineyards, second largest of the Delano growers.

The way was opened, too, for negotiations with DiGiorgio that ultimately led to last Tuesday's vote.

Election Last June

The corporation had conducted an election of its own last June. That was set aside after AWOC, NFWA and others protested the almost total absence of impartiality. The Teamsters had been the nominal "victor" in the company-sponsored ballot.

Gov. Edmund G. Brown appointed Haughton, head of the University of Michigan Institute of Industrial Labor Relations, as fact-finder in the disputed vote.

Without passing judgment on the DiGiorgio-sponsored vote, Haughton won agreement of all parties to an election on Aug. 30 conducted under jointly-agreed rules by the American Arbitration Association. Haughton and Kagel, a University of California law professor, would stand by to decide disputes.

The rules for the new election met the principal objections of the two unions of grape strikers who joined forces in the election: they recognized the right of strikers to vote and they insured impartial conduct of the balloting. Both safeguards had been ignored by DiGiorgio in its balloting.

DiGiorgio had been the target of a long, bitter, and unsuccesful strike nearly 20 years ago. With that exception the Delano grape strike was the first significant union activity in California's vast corporate agriculture since the Thirties.

Victory at DiGiorgio marks a major milestone not only for the year-old grape pickers' strike but for the state's—and the nation's—farm workers.

Kircher said that in the final weeks of the campaign representatives of AFL-CIO unions came to Delano to help in the campaign. Five special representatives of the national AFL-CIO staff were there for the last five weeks of the campaign, he added.

Panel Urges More Talks by TWU, Airline

New York—Refusal of a presidential emergency board to recommend wage terms of a contract between American Airlines and the Transport Workers should make a negotiated settlement possible before a Sept. 27 strike deadline, the union said here.

Stressing the line's "exceptionally high profits, low wage rates and inferior pension and hospitalization benefits," Dir. James F. Horst of TWU's air transport division said management "must now recognize TWU's demands as not exaggerated but reasonable and long overdue."

The three-member board named July 27 by Pres. Johnson to mediate the dispute reported a month later that the parties are not deadlocked, have had only one strike in 20 years and should be permitted to resume bargaining without interference.

Union and management have been negotiating since April on new contract terms for 12,000 mechanics, stores employes and communications personnel. A union strike deadline was delayed when the President named a disputes board headed by John T. Dunlop, veteran arbiter.

Key Wage Bill Sections Kept By Conferees

applicability of the wage-hour law. The accepted version includes the House-passed figure of $250,000 beginning Feb. 1, 1969.

The effect of the Senate floor amendment would have been to knock out of protection about 185,000 employes of small hotels, retail stores and restaurants.

Both houses had agreed already to cut the present $1 million volume-of-business test to $500,000 effective Feb. 1, 1967.

And both had passed bills applying wage-hour protection for the first time to farm workers. It applies to large farms employing the equivalent of seven or more employes working full time during a calendar quarter.

The farm worker protection does not carry any provision for overtime pay, and the wage scales laid down provide for a gradual rise from $1 an hour to $1.30, halting at that level. The inclusion of farm workers nevertheless marks the first time that Congress has covered them in a major measure designed for the well-being of workers.

The House-Senate committee agreed to eliminate an amendment by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) and Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) adopted by voice vote, instructing the secretary of labor to develop alternative plans for handling "emergency" strikes under the Railway Labor Act and Taft-Hartley Act and report to Congress by next Jan. 15.

Conference committee agreement on the main elements of a compromise bill followed swiftly Senate floor action on the wage-hour measure reported by the Senate Labor Committee.

The major Senate battle came on an amendment offered by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.), the GOP floor leader, to freeze the volume-of-business test for coverage of employes of an enterprise at $500,000 after the original reduction from $1 million. The amendment lost on a 41-41 tie vote.

The closeness of this vote encouraged Prouty, however, to offer his $350,000 volume-of-business test as the second-step reduction after the $500,000 level had been applied, and this carried on the floor by 41 to 38 before being thrown out in conference.

House Acts to Keep Ship Unit Separate

transport policies, an independent agency. It is currently part of the Commerce Dept. The bill is expected to come up later in the session.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its recent meeting in Chicago, called for an independent maritime agency free from control by any government department to meet the "essential needs" of the maritime industry which are "being continually ignored and submerged."

The amendment to exclude the Maritime Administration from the Administration's transportation agency bill was sponsored by Rep. Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.) chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee, and carried first on a teller vote of 190 to 63 before the 260 to 117 rollcall vote. A majority of both Democrats and Republicans supported the amendment on rollcall.

The regulatory functions on rate and route determinations would be left in the hands of the independent agencies now handling these matters.

The Senate Government Operations Committee has been waiting for the House to act before taking the Administration plan up. The new department is expected to have an annual budget of about $6 billion and about 88,000 employes.

In other congressional actions:

- Both houses passed and sent to the President legislation requiring federal safety standards for new autos starting with 1968 models. Action came on a conference committee report compromising differences on bills passed previously by each house. Another conference report on a bill providing federal funds for driver training, vehicle inspection and highway design also cleared both houses.
- The Senate approved a two-year extension of the food for peace program and a new $5 billion authorization to pay for it.
- Senate-House conferees agreed on a $3.5 billion one-package foreign aid authorization for one year for most programs, but set up three-year programs for development loans and the Alliance for Progress
- Both houses approved a conference committee report and sent to the White House a measure to raise health and safety standards in mines other than coal mines. It would give inspection and enforcement powers as well as authority to prescribe health and safety rules to the Federal Bureau of Mines. States would be permitted to develop their own programs subject to approval by the Secretary of Interior.

Truman Cites Danger In Interest Rate Spiral

Kansas City—A "drastic rise" in interest rates "works a hardship on the consuming public" and only "benefits the privileged few," former Pres. Harry S. Truman declared here.

If the policy of higher interest rates persists, he warned, "the result could be a serious depression."

Truman, who noted he rarely comments on public issues, said he thought the problem of spiraling interest rates has reached the point where "it became necessary for me to speak."

The continuing increase in interest rates—the price of money—and warnings that higher rates are still to come, the former President said, are likely to bring on a "precipitous deflation." Higher rates are a burden at all levels of government, he added, and they end up as a "further tax on the consumer."

Pres. Johnson issued a reply from the Texas White House declaring that "I cannot agree with Pres. Truman that our economy is in danger of recession or depression." The tightness of money, he said, reflects the "extreme buoyancy of our economy and the resulting sharp rise in the demand for credit."

Truman recalled in his statement that during his Administration the nation faced a similar threat of an arbitrary raise in the rates of interest, at the time of the Korean war, and that "we rejected" the imposition of "an additional non-productive tax burden on the public."

Interest rates have skyrocketed to their highest levels in 40 years and in the past nine months have increased 33⅓ percent. The President has expressed his "concern" and has recommended legislation to give bank regulatory agencies greater authority to control interest rates paid on savings.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its meeting in Chicago late in August, called on Congress to adopt a 4.5 percent interest-rate ceiling on time deposits of all types, urged the Federal Reserve to maintain reasonable interest rates and to help stabilize the money market. Federation Pres. George Meany had earlier called for a rollback on rates.

Long Moves to Halt Investment Credit

Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, announced he would sponsor a bill suspending the 7 percent investment tax credit for business organizations spending money for new plants and equipment

The tax credit was a "magnificent weapon" when it was devised in 1962 to spur a lagging economy, Long said, but now it is helping to push interest rates up as corporations complete for funds in the tight money market.

The AFL-CIO has said repeatedly—most recently in the Executive Council meeting in Chicago Aug. 23— that the business tax credit is fueling "the fires of a capital goods super-boom" and of "profits inflation."

Under Presidential Executive Order:

Government Employes Show Sharp Spurt in Membership

By David L. Perlman

Miami Beach—Delegates to the American Federation of Government Employes convention were urged to match the union's "explosive" membership gains of the past two years with equal progress on the collective bargaining front.

AFGE Pres. John F. Griner told the delegates that the union has grown to 215,000 members—up 75,000 since its 1964 convention and more than double the AFGE's membership four years ago. It has won elections giving it bargaining rights for more than 300,000 federal workers.

The emphasis on organizing will continue, Griner told the 800 delegates. But he called for a parallel effort to make unionism pay bigger dividends for newly organized federal employes through contracts providing meaningful improvements in working conditions, benefits, job security and promotion opportunities.

To symbolize the union's new emphasis on collective bargaining, the entire convention witnessed the signing of a nationwide contract covering all field employes of the Dept. of Labor —some 3,700 non-supervisory employes in every state and territory. The 4,000 Labor Dept. headquarters employes are already covered by an AFGE contract and the field offices voted last fall by a 9-1 margin for union representation.

The contract was described as a "historic landmark" in government labor-management relations by both AFGE leaders and Assistant Sec. of Labor Leo. R. Werts, who headed the management negotiators signing the agreement.

Among its provisions are a mediation procedure whenever negotiations reach an impasse, a significant role for the union in overseeing promotion policies, an unlimited use of the grievance precedure on any matter affecting employe welfare and improvements over existing practices in a broad area of working conditions. One notable gain was the surrender by management of its present right to decide whether higher grade employes must take compensatory time off instead of extra cash for overtime work. The choice will now rest with the employe, not the agency.

The contract also marked the first time in the brief history of collective bargaining in the federal government—dating to a 1962 presidential executive order—that a single union has held exclusive bargaining rights for all employes of a government department.

The workings of the executive order came in for considerable scrutiny during the opening days of the convention. The chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, John W. Macy, Jr., told the delegates that the order has resulted in federal employe unions "receiving recognition, acceptance, attention and respect through the government to an extent unheard of before 1962."

The result, he noted, has been that unions in the government field have "made tremendous gains in strength, size and stability." He added a prediction that "these gains will continue."

'A Stepping Stone'

Griner acknowledged the progress but viewed the executive order as a starting point, "a stepping stone" to further progress toward meaningful collective bargaining with the largest employer in the nation.

The convention gave a standing, cheering ovation to Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.). Morrison, a longtime champion of federal employes, is in line to become chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee in the next Congress —provided he survives a bitter runoff primary in his Louisiana district.

Before the convention was a resolution—strongly supported by the AFGE's officers—for revision of the Hatch Act to give greater political participation rights to federal employes. Revision is essential, Griner told the convention, to make government workers "first-class citizens."

Also before the convention was an executive council recommendation for a substantial increase in the per capita payment to the union—now 85 cents a month. The goal, the council said, is establishment of field offices in each of the union's 14 regions for organizing, servicing and assistance in contract negotiations.

A stronger dues structure was also urged in a convention address by Executive Dir. Jack T. Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which has worked closely with the AFGE staff on a number of cooperative organizing campaigns.

The AFGE's growth, he told the delegates, has been "phenomenal." but he cautioned that the problems the union must deal with "will grow in direct ratio to your expanding membership." The training and expansion of staff and resources to meet these needs, Conway stressed, can't be obtained "at a cut-rate drug store."

A study of the union's membership growth pointed up one unique aspect of the AFGE's expansion. Its biggest district and the area of its most rapid growth is the deep South—a sharp contrast to the experience of most unions.

Contests were scheduled for the top union offices as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Griner had one challenger for the presidency; there were two contenders nominated against Sec.-Treas. Esther F. Johnson, and four in the race for executive vice president—a position being filled by election for the first time.

Delegates voted overwhelmingly to change the convention rules to conduct the voting by written ballot rather than rollcall.

WARM WELCOME to Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.) at Miami Beach convention of Government Employes brings an answering salute from Morrison, ranking Democrat on House Post Office & Civil Service Committee. Also shown are AFGE Sec.-Treas. Esther F. Johnson and Vice Pres. Dennis Garrison.

South Carolina Labor To Seek 'Greatest' Vote

Greenville, S.C.—The South Carolina AFL-CIO called on all affiliates to help muster the "greatest off-year vote in political history" Nov. 8 and to start work "immediately" to reverse the "traditional off-year" trend toward voter apathy.

Meeting here in their 10th annual convention, 192 delegates from affiliated unions pledged to help maintain the current favorable balance in the House of Representatives, to battle the "big business-conservative coalition" and to maintain and support active and effective COPE committees.

COPE Program Backed

Voicing "continuing and unswerving support" of AFL-CIO's political education programs, the convention called on the legislature to enact these changes in South Carolina laws:

- A compulsory education law to keep more pupils in school in a state where adults have a median of 8.7 years of education.
- A statewide minimum wage of at least $1.25 an hour.
- Assistance to the medically indigent who cannot afford to meet hospital and health care costs.
- Freedom for county and municipal employes now forbidden to join unions of their own choosing.

The convention also urged Congress to investigate the "shameful interference" of southern textile firms with the right of their employes to organize without coercion or intimidation.

The delegates asked six Taft-Hartley law changes to make collective bargaining a reality for all workers. They urged action to strengthen the wage-hour law and reduce standard working hours to 35 a week; to increase U.S. medical manpower and improve health services.

The convention also re-elected its three top officers, approved continued membership in the Southern States Apprenticeship Conference, and urged all locals to support the Tri-State Labor School sponsored by North and South Carolina and Virginia labor.

Starting new terms in office are Pres. Sinway Young, Sec.-Treas. E. T. Kirkland and Vice Pres. L. B. Knox. Billy G. Henderson was elected to succeed H. M. Rowe as second vice president.

In a major talk, Vice Pres. William DuChessi of the Textile Workers Union of America scored U.S. Representatives John L. McMillan, L. Mendel Rivers and William J. B. Dorn for taking the side of J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., big textile chain, against workers whose rights it had violated.

Washington State AFL-CIO Adopts New Action Programs, Dues Hikes

Tacoma, Wash.—Project '66, the most ambitious package of action programs ever to be presented to labor in Washington State, was overwhelmingly endorsed by the more than 500 delegates to the ninth annual convention of the State AFL-CIO here.

Keyed to an increase of 5 cents in per capita payments to finance the program, the resolution carried by about a 75 percent vote of the delegates. A two-thirds vote was required for ratification, since a constitutional amendment was involved.

Highlights of Project '66 promise increased efforts in these fields:

Education—A full-time specialist will be assigned to work out union education programs for high school and college students and for new members of the state's highly organized labor force.

Political Action—There will be a strong drive for increased COPE funds for registration, information programs and get-out-the-vote campaigns among union members.

Legislative Action — Authoritative research facilities will be developed for the use of labor representatives assigned to the state legislature in Olympia.

Government Programs — a staff member will be assigned to work closely with administrators of both federal and local programs affecting working people, so that labor's voice will not go unheard in the day-by-day operations of the programs.

Pres. Joe Davis of the 190,000-member state organization told the convention that labor in Washington could rightfully take pride in having the highest percentage of union members in relation to the total work force—43.1 percent—of any state in the union.

He warned, however, that the percentage might not stay that high at a time when the state is undergoing a tremendous population growth and a very rapid rise in industrial development.

Political Action Urged

The Association of Washington Industry is stepping up its political efforts in the hope of blocking labor's legislative and even its organizing programs, he said.

"If we do not increase our own efforts we will slip backwards," he said.

He also criticized the state leadership of Gov. Daniel J. Evans, often described as a rising figure in Republican national politics, with a suggestion that Evans seemed highly responsive to what Davis labeled "big business." Evans earlier had been a convention speaker.

The convention heard several members of the Washington state delegation in Congress.

Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D) reviewed the record of the 89th Congress in economic and human rights legislation and added in regard to one of its failures:

"I'm one senator who has not abandoned the fight to repeal Section 14(b)."

Rep. Julia Butler Hansen (D) of the 3rd Congressional District praised labor's contribution in 1964 in helping elect four new liberal congressmen from the state and one of these freshmen members of the House, Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D) of the 2nd District, said:

"I have supported labor's programs not because I am a captive of labor but because you delegates and I stand for the same things."

Nelson H. Cruikshank, formerly director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, spoke about operations of the medicare program, which he had helped draft, and urged that labor play a "watchdog" role in its actual administration.

State-County Fills California Post

Sacramento, Calif.—Hugh MacColl, a former international representative of the State, County & Municipal Employes, has been appointed to direct the union's education, research and legislative programs in California.

MacColl, 45 and a Sacramento resident, also has served the SCME as assistant regional director for Washington, Oregon, Montana and Idaho. In addition, he represented the American Federation of Teachers in assignments ranging from New York to Texas, and also as California legislative representative.

For the past five years he has been consultant to the State Senate Fact-Finding Committee on Governmental Administration and state coordinator of pre-school compensatory education programs for the State Dept. of Social Welfare.

Union Upheld On Complaint Of Job Bias

jobs at a lower rate than the skills required would justify.

"The Commission took the commendable step of comparing job skills and ratings on a national basis to determine whether the wage differentials in the Mississippi plant were racially motivated. If the agency continues to apply the same yardstick, it will provide justice to thousands of workers in situations unions have been powerless to remedy through collective bargaining."

The next step in the EEOC procedure will be to attempt to conciliate the differences between Planters and the union.

The Chemical Workers and five members of its Local 795 filed suit in federal court last March 10 when EEOC action on their complaint seemed stalled.

Mitchell said the union intended to continue to press the suit, but would be "willing to meet with the company any time to work out an agreement."

The Chemical Workers won a National Labor Relations Board election to obtain bargaining rights for some 120 Planters workers, but have been unable to gain a contract because, it said, the company insisted on retaining those employment practices the EEOC has now called illegal.

The union is represented in the proceeding by the Washington law firm of Feller and Anker.

Labor Day 1966

THERE IS "no aspect of American society that is not also a matter of concern to the AFL-CIO," Federation Pres. George Meany writes in his Labor Day message.

And on this Labor Day 1966 one of the real concerns is the education of our youth, the generation that will in a few years join the ranks of one of the nation's greatest assets—its labor force.

Labor Day coincides in many areas of the country with the end of the summer vacations and the reopening of schools. This year, despite the federal aid programs adopted by Congress, there will be shortages of able and qualified teachers for the public and private school systems.

There will be in many areas overcrowding and classes too large to allow quality education.

And in the slums and ghettos of the cities there will be ancient and crumbling schools, poorly equipped and poorly staffed—the schools serving the youngsters that most need proper schooling so that they can break out of the cycle of poverty.

IT IS IN these latter areas, to a great extent, that the school dropout problem exists. In 1965 there were more than 10 million 16-24-year-olds out of school and in the labor force. Three million —almost one-third—had not completed high school.

If the same situation prevails in the 1966-67 school year nearly 1 million youngsters will walk out on education they badly need to survive in the American society of the 1970s.

If the dropout rate continues by 1975 the labor force will contain 32 million adults with less than a high school education.

The dropout is more likely than the graduate to be unemployed or to hold a low-paying and undesirable job, the basic statistics disclose. The unemployment rate for school dropouts, 16-21, is 15 percent compared to 8.4 percent for graduates. The jobless rate for everyone in the labor force over 18 who did not finish school is 7.4 percent compared with 4 percent for those who graduated.

More than half of the dropouts are boys who leave school in the 10th grade and soon after their 16th birthday. Most of them have intelligence quotients indicating that they could finish school if they wanted to. Many have unemployed or underemployed parents, or come from families where school attendance and achievement are not considered as having much value.

THE CHALLENGE to the nation is to make every effort to insure that every youngster has every possible opportunity to complete school and obtain a diploma. If he has the ability he should be encouraged to continue his education further.

Labor has long led the fight for better and more extensive education for all American youngsters as a public responsibility. Education for all, especially the disadvantaged who tend to become the dropouts, is a "matter of concern" to the AFL-CIO.

The federation will make every effort at all levels of government to continue building a nation with an educated labor force and citizenry.

The Picket

Labor Day Messages:

Major Faiths Cite Unions' Role In Drive for Equal Opportunity

LABOR DAY GREETINGS were extended to America's workers by the nation's three major religious groups in statements that also called on organized labor to increase the help it has been giving the least advantaged.

It is "sobering" to recall, wrote Msgr. George G. Higgins in the message of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Council, which he directs, that Scripture relates that the ancient city of Sodom was destroyed "precisely" because its citizens "lacked the will and the generosity" to "put forth their hand to help the needy and the poor," as the Book of Ezechiel recounts.

"May God grant that our own material abundance and phenomenally high standard of living will not tempt us to make the same tragic mistake," he added.

The statement commended organized labor for its role in aiding migratory agriculture workers and in the fight for interracial justice not only within its own ranks but in the community at large.

It deplored what it called "a growing rift" between organized labor and the Negro community, and called on labor to take a "self-critical and ruthlessly honest look" at the problem. But the record of industry in the field of race relations and civil rights, it added, "may not be quite as good" as labor's.

"We are all in the same boat—all of us, clergymen included," it said, "and unless we make up our minds to bring about complete racial equality now—and not 10 years from now—we may be heading for a national catastrophe."

THE SYNAGOGUE COUNCIL of America hailed the labor movement for the "responsibility which it has assumed willingly," a social responsibility to the total community beyond the immediate economic needs of members.

"The labor movement has been a force for social awareness and social consciousness in American society," it said. "Though we live in a bountiful land and millions enjoy a high material standard of living there is a fifth of our people who suffer from debilitating and oppressive poverty. Oppressive poverty deprives man of a proper knowledge of God and reduces his own effectiveness as a human being. The expansion of automation and the use of the computer will bring material blessings, but their use will create a residual problem for those who become unemployed because of these technological advances. Those unfortunate men and women will look first to their fellow laborers to help them find significant and meaningful roles."

The labor movement has a central role to play in the area of race relations, the statement continued—"in the leadership of those who translate the ideals of American society into the stuff of everyday life." In addition, it went on, labor "must lift up both whites and Negroes alike from the ugly abyss of racism."

The Synagogue Council called on labor to expand apprenticeship programs so as to train the disadvantaged. It also pointed to an additional task for labor—"helping to restore the moral quality now so rapidly disappearing."

ALL AMERICANS were called on "to engage in fresh thinking about the meaning of stewardship under God and of man's 'dominion' in the world" in the statement of the National Council of Churches of Christ, which dismissed as "pure fantasy" talk of human work being abolished.

It stressed urgency in five areas of concern:

- "The need of persons and society is for new and imaginative processes and institutions that will encourage wide democratic participation in establishing national goals and in giving rational direction to our economic life."
- "The ethical imperative to respect the right of all mankind, including future generations, to enjoy the resources and fruits of the earth is clear. Private owners together with national and international governmental agencies have a responsibility for resource policies and controls."
- "Our burgeoning productivity now makes possible, and our Judeo-Christian ethic of justice makes mandatory, the development of economic policies by which all people, regardless of their employment status, are assured an adequate income."
- "All the economic goals which we have and hope for . . . must be pursued with the aim of global sharing of our goods. . . ."
- "In the light of . . . human needs to be met, both here and abroad, our immediate task is twofold: to equip the present and oncoming generation to be the kind of workers society now needs and will need, and to match work to be done with jobs at wages which provide an adequate family income."

Morgan Says:

'Legacy of Greatness' to World Marred by Seamier Elements

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

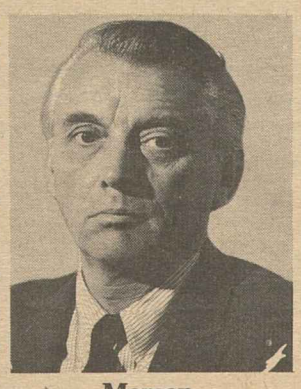
TOKYO—Back in the early 1940s, even while the struggle with the Axis powers was still very much in doubt, Time magazine's Henry Luce, complacently but not necessarily unprophetically, proclaimed this to be "the American century."

A couple of weeks ago Newsweek noted that the 20th century has the bloodiest record of all the centuries of history. There have been 100 million casualties in more than 500 wars and insurgencies at a total cost, said Newsweek, estimated as high as $10 trillion.



Morgan

In the last third of these agonized 100 years which remains, the question is whether the United States will have the wisdom, given a certain amount of good luck, to use its staggering power to exert the maximum positive influence on this unhappy, but not yet totally depraved, planet.

This is a rather large order. Some would argue that it would be utterly frivolous and arrogantly presumptuous even to think about filling it. No nation, singlehanded, can predetermine its own history, let alone the fate of the rest of the world. And yet, as the leading exponents of that delicate and intricate organism called the open society, we Americans ought to take at least a squinting look at the prospects.

Without doubt the impact of American materialism and even mannerisms on the world at large has been wide if superficial. Charles de Gaulle won't like this, but the American language is replacing French, undiplomatically, as a kind of universal dialect. The teeming Ginza of downtown Tokyo is a fluid monument to the American merchandizing art of stimulating the consumer appetite. And yet these and countless similar measures fall short of bridging the gap of misunderstanding, suspicion and ignorance.

In the Rocky Mountain region, Pres. Johnson preached a reasonable political gospel. He said American foreign policy, realistically, could only be an extension of domestic policy. In effect, that meant we couldn't preach one thing abroad and practice another at home. But there, as Shakespeare said, is the rub.

We are perhaps no more shortsighted or inconsistent than some nations and people, and it is just possible that as human beings and their governments go, we are more perceptive than others. The danger is that we too often translate that qualified generality to mean that we are the tops, and that what we say goes, because it is reasonable, and because we said it and because we know that the American way of life is better than anything anybody else ever invented.

The trouble is that there are drastic differences in living the American way of life and they range from desperate poverty to incredible oppulence, from narrow prejudice to civilized broadmindedness, and too often both our friends and enemies see not the best but only the worst in us. This is not entirely our fault but a great deal of it is. A great deal more in fact, than we are conscious of or care to admit.

On the journey from Denver to Tokyo, this traveler picked up a Seattle Times and encountered a double-page color spread advertising a new real estate development intriguingly called the "Useless Bay Colony." "Here," the breathless copy lyricized, "on the sunny shores of South Whidbey Island, overlooking the inland sea that is Puget Sound, majestic Mt. Rainier, and the rugged snow-capped Olympic Mountains, is to be found a distinctive new concept of living. Here protective covenants and restrictions assure overall excellence of the community to perpetuate its natural and developed attractions as a place in which to build a home, to live and to relax."

IT IS JUST such specious exclusivity that has been operating as a major curse to blight the realization of a truly great society. It is the snobbish monotony of that kind of white middle-class living that has propagated and perpetuated the ghettos and slums in our American cities. There is a vulgarly moving picture of a white noose tightening around a metropolis condemning its racial minorities to a sterile existence in what are rapidly becoming urban ghost towns.

To the Japanese, Chinese, Mexican, Filipino, Negro and other non-white American citizens, the message of the Useless Bay Colony is clear, despite court rulings against restrictive covenants. It is "Keep Out," "No Trespassing."

Well, the fact is that that superior Caucasian majority is a minority itself as far as the human race is concerned. Of the more than 3 billion people in the world's population, two-thirds couldn't qualify for residence at Useless Bay because their pigmentation is not pale enough. Our strength, such as it is, stems in large measure from our American diversity.

But if the white majority insists on defying reason, reasonableness, and world realities in order to carve out little enclaves for itself, the whole country will become a kind of "Useless Bay Colony" and we will leave for ourselves no legacy of greatness in this or any future century.

Lesson Seen for U.S.:

Employer Acceptance of Union Mark of European Bargaining

THE WILLINGNESS of European employers to recognize and negotiate with unions has made the strike a "less important instrument" there than in the United States, an AFL-CIO spokesman has said.

"Unfortunately, in this country, we still have employers who very reluctantly . . . accept the existence of the union," said AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, who for several years was the federation's European economic representative.

"Good faith bargaining between labor and management," taking into account "the needs of the community, each other's problems and each other's needs" is a "lesson we can learn from the European experience," he said on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, a weekly public service production of the AFL-CIO on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Seidman said the "constructive record of collective bargaining" in western Europe has been achieved with "very little interference with the right to strike."

"On rare occasions, we have seen something of this in France, where there is now something similar to the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act," he said. Strikes are comparatively rare in Europe "not because there is government interference, but because the problems are worked out in collective bargaining," he noted.

SEIDMAN SAID that western Europe's trade unions are putting new emphasis on plant-level wages and local issues rather than national or industrywide minimums.

Workers there are interested in the "same bread-and-butter issues that workers are interested in all over the world"—wages, hours, working conditions, fringe benefits and "the security of the union as an organization," he said.

To continue making gains on the collective bargaining front and maintain the loyalty of the workers, the unions must "pay more attention to issues at the plant level—and not be content with national collective bargaining patterns," he said.

Reporters questioning Seidman were Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post and Alexander Uhl of Press Associates, Inc.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A GRIMLY CANDID analysis of the present state of the Republican Party, issued by a multi-group Council of Republican Organizations, concedes that former Sen. Goldwater may have been just about right when he stated that the GOP convention in 1968 will look very much like the 1964 convention that nominated him.

Founded in November 1964 after the Goldwater disaster at the polls, the Council of Republican Organizations—most of them small—lamented that "fully one-half the time available" before 1968 has been "forfeited."

Unless there is a "dramatic improvement," the analysis stated, "moderate Republicans will have failed once again to bring leadership to their party and nation."

Citing a Congressional Quarterly report that in six congressional districts identifiable conservatives have defeated moderate or liberal Republicans in party primaries, the Council of Republican Organizations listed a number of findings its surveys had discovered as responsible for the failure of party moderates to make headway:

1. The moderates have lacked a national leader and a "sustained voice" in party affairs, whereas Goldwater has been continuously active and has just pulled together four conservative groups competing for the conservative dollar.

2. Former Vice Pres. Nixon and National Committee Chairman Ray C. Bliss have persistently urged party "unity," thus undercutting the "motivation" of moderates to fight for party control. In California this took the form of "Parkinson's Law" ("Thou shalt not speak ill of any Republican"), thus guaranteeing the nomination of rightwinger Ronald Reagan over moderate former Mayor George Christopher of San Francisco for governor.

3. Bliss, although elected by moderate GOP leaders, has not had the benefit of "continued attention" from these leaders.

4. The Republican Governors Association, founded to provide an effective voice at national headquarters for moderates, never got off the ground and was further weakened when its chairman, Gov. Robert Smylie (Ida.) was beaten by a conservative in the primary.

5. Moderate leaders have developed no continuing liaison in Congress. The famed House Wednesday Club was decimated through loss of John V. Lindsay, now mayor of New York, and election defeat of two or three others. In the Senate even Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.) is believed to face a "serious challenge" to his position as party whip.

6. Moderates have made no attempt whatever to challenge the solid Goldwater strength in the South.

7. The Reagan primary victory in California puts him in control of the 100-odd delegates to be named to the 1968 convention.

8. The election losses of 1964 impose heavy costs in attempting to rebuild moderate Republican strength in northeastern states, and those states will suffer losses in delegate weight for failing to carry their states for Goldwater in 1964.

9. The moderates are having trouble getting enough money to operate.

In a companion release the Ripon Society, a member of the Council of Republican Organizations, mourned that at the Governors Conference in Los Angeles in July, the Republican Governors Association could have had "center stage" but "nothing happened."

"They decided to defer all organizational questions of future leadership until December—six [more] months lost," the society said.

"They bypassed a rare opportunity to look good against Johnson and the Democrats by initiating their own resolutions in such areas as open housing in civil rights and revenue sharing with the states."

"There wasn't one [Republican] governor who would pick up the phone and get some action started," the society observed.

On Capitol Hill, meanwhile, GOP leaders began talking of a possible gain in House seats ranging from 40 to 60, the latter of which is almost undoubtedly high. A Republican gain of 40 might be enough, however, to threaten the 21-day rule under which major legislation has been pushed through, over and around the Rules Committee in the 89th Congress.

WESTERN EUROPE'S record of industrial peace has resulted from the willingness of employers to "accept the union and negotiate with it on a reasonable basis," said AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman (center) on Labor News Conference over the Mutual Radio Network. Seidman, for several years the federation's European economic representative, was questioned by Hobart Rowen (left) of the Washington Post and Alexander Uhl of Press Associates, Inc.

Meany On Labor Day:

The New Challenge to Free Trade Unions

By George Meany

ON THIS LABOR DAY it is appropriate, I think, to discuss the labor movement in perspective. It is especially appropriate because in recent weeks and months, some of the basic precepts of free trade unionism have been challenged.

First, let us look briefly at the nature of the American labor movement. The one word that best describes its day-to-day operation is "practical." We deal with one problem, or one set of problems, at a time. We avoid pre-conceived notions, and we do not try to fit our program into some theoretical, all-embracing structure.

This down-to-earth, one thing at a time approach is uniquely American. And it can be said, I think, that this same pragmatic approach is a unique feature of the American legislative system.

But this does not mean—as our friends overseas sometimes say—that the United States or the American labor movement have no basic principles, no fundamental beliefs or no philosophical perspective.

All of us who are Americans know, almost instinctively, what our country stands for. We may disagree on specific issues, but we were raised in a free society, and we have no need for a handbook to define it for us.

The same is true of us who are in the labor movement. We also know, almost instinctively, what the labor movement is, and why. But this is not true, unfortunately, among many Americans who are not trade unionists. So a few lines of history may be useful.

FROM THE EARLY YEARS of the republic it was apparent to wage-earners that there was a need for collective bargaining. Maybe they didn't use those words, but they realized that workers had to stand together in order to win fair terms of employment and to protect themselves against arbitrary and capricious decisions by management.

By now, an overwhelming majority of the American people also realize this fact. But it was not until 1935 that the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively was written into federal law—a law that was unanimously upheld by the Supreme Court two years later.

For more than a century before that time, workers had been trying to organize—sometimes successfully, but more often unsuccessfully—without any legal protection, and often in the face of government hostility. They persevered because they knew collective bargaining was both necessary and right. They knew it was necessary, simply by their experience as workers. They knew it was right, because their instincts as free Americans told them so.

So eventually, what was necessary and right became, by law, the policy of the United States. There are still some who seek to evade or frustrate that policy, but in general it is accepted.

Now let's see what is involved in collective bargaining.

There is nothing complicated about the basic idea. The workers get together and decide what they want and what they need in the way of wages and working conditions. They elect representatives to discuss these proposals with the employer, who may have other ideas. Then the two parties bargain until they come to an agreement which is reasonably satisfactory to both sides.

This may sound too simple to be true. But in actual fact, something very much like this is what actually happens. This is how the overwhelming majority of the 150,000 labor-management contracts now in force are negotiated.

In other words, the prevailing condition in union-management relations is labor peace, based upon agreements reached through collective bargaining.

THIS IS DUE in part to the common sense of the employers. There was a time when some trade union leaders failed to acknowledge this fact. They painted every employer as a symbol of total selfishness. While it is true that there are still too many employers who fit that description, it is also true that there are many others who genuinely want to be fair and many more who recognize that fair wages and working conditions are the best way to build a productive workforce.

Bargains can be reached because each side has the same general objective—a fair share from a prospering enterprise. The union has no desire to take over the enterprise from management. The union does not want to abolish profits or dividends. The union is seeking only what the workers believe is their fair share, just as management is seeking a fair share for those who have invested in the enterprise. Obviously, then, a bargain is always possible, even when there are great initial differences over what these shares should be.

However, there is another factor that helps to bring about the peaceful negotiation of good contracts. That factor is the right of workers to strike—to refuse to work under conditions that are not acceptable to them.

It is the right to strike that gives meaning to collective bargaining. It is the right to strike that gives a union's spokesman some measure of equality at the bargaining table. The word "strike" may never be mentioned, and usually isn't, but both sides know the right is there.

Let me emphasize a point I have made many times. The right to strike is almost universally accepted, in theory, as a fundamental right of free workers. But it is not just a theoretical right. It is an operating right. Anyone who says he believes in the right to strike must accept the fact that strikes will sometimes occur.

I have pointed out that the vast majority of union-management contracts are negotiated peacefully. But there are times when the differences—and they may be honest differences—are too great to be overcome by ordinary means. That is when strikes take place.

EVERY STRIKE, of course, is a form of economic warfare; like all wars, it is wasteful, and some people suffer from it. No one is happy about a strike—least of all the strikers, who bear the brunt of the battle. And when a strike affects the lives of persons who are not directly involved, there is often an outcry about the supposed damage that is being done to the public interest.

Because they are conflicts, strikes make headlines, while peaceful settlements often pass unmentioned. It is not surprising that many Americans think strikes are far more frequent, far bigger and far longer than they are. Actually, in the last 20 years, there have been about 3,500 strikes each year, as against the 150,000 labor-management contracts in force. They have involved about 1.5 million workers each year—against a total non-farm work force of some 63 million—and have lasted an average of about 12 days.

The time lost by strikes, all added together, amounts to far less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the total time worked. It is only about half as great as the time lost by on-the-job accidents.

Moreover, every American who is inconvenienced by a strike—even those few non-participants who suffer from one—should remember that annoying as a strike may be, there is no alternative to the right to strike which is consistent with a free society.

That is by far the most important basis for preserving a free labor movement strong enough to strike if necessary, but it is not the only one.

Without the right to strike, there would be no strong labor movement in America.

Without a strong labor movement, wages would be lower, consumer purchasing power would be lower, and another economic collapse like that of the Great Depression would be inevitable.

Without a strong labor movement, much of the social progress of the last generation would not have been made.

It is as simple as that.

It seems to me that the right to strike—a right that is so seldom exercised that it consumes far less time than coffee-breaks—is a small price to pay for a prosperous, progressive, and above all, a free society.

LET ME CONCLUDE with a few words about the other role of the labor movement—the AFL-CIO's function as the "people's lobby."

Trade unions do not function solely to raise the wages and improve the working conditions of their members. True, that is their primary function. That is what they were created to do. But many years ago, the labor movement recognized that it had much broader responsibilities. It recognized—as the AFL-CIO has said from its foundation—that the best interests of union members can be served only to the extent that the best interests of all the American people are served.

We fight for a better minimum wage law, not because union members stand to gain by it (hardly any union member is paid only the minimum wage), but because it is a basic weapon in the war on poverty—a war we have been fighting for generations.

We fight for civil rights, not just for ourselves but for everyone.

We fight for ever-wider educational opportunities, freely available to all Americans, not just to our children.

There is no aspect of American society that is not also a matter of concern to the AFL-CIO.

WE WANT A BETTER SOCIETY in America. We are committed to the endless pursuit of perfection.

This is our philosophy.

To be sure, there are those who disagree with us. There are those who believe that the measures we support, the proposals we advance, will not produce the benefits we seek. They have every right to disagree. And the disagreements should be brought, in the spirit of Thomas Jefferson, to the free marketplace of ideas, where the American people will make a decision.

For nearly 200 years, trade unions have contributed to this marketplace of ideas. We believe our contributions have been greater as our movement has grown stronger. And we believe that the life of every American, and the hopes of every child, are brighter as a result.

They should grow brighter with every passing year. That is our goal. And as we start from this Labor Day to the next, and all those that will follow, we pledge our utmost efforts toward its fulfillment.

ORIT Message

Excerpts from the Labor Day message of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) to the workers of North America are given below.

THE CELEBRATION of your eighty-fourth Labor Day is as joyous an occasion for ORIT and the Inter-American labor movement as it is for you, the workers of the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico.

That first Labor Day, in 1882, provided you with the sweet smell of success, for at last a day had been marked on the calendar which commemorated no battle or conflict, no conquest of a man by man, no glorification of an individual, but rather the contribution of the workers to a free, progressive society.

The first Monday in September of every year has given you renewed dedication in pursuing the goals of bread, peace and freedom. The holiday has served to inspire your brother workers in the rest of the Western Hemisphere, for they have seen the strength it has given you and your countries.

In turn, they have been encouraged to continue their own struggle, secure in the knowledge that the difficult path ahead to a better way of life is passable and that others have successfully negotiated it.

On behalf of the 28 million workers of the Americas affiliated to ORIT, we wish you a most rewarding and happy Labor Day 1966.

ICFTU Greets American Labor

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions sent Labor Day greetings to North American workers, excerpts from which are given here.

ON BEHALF of 63 million workers in 94 countries of the free world, united in the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, we send fraternal greetings to all the workers in North America on the occasion of Labor Day.

The free trade union organizations in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in Latin America and in Australasia, grouped in the ICFTU family of many nations, take stock of the manifold advances achieved on the North American trade union scene.

As freedom and democracy are bound up with the international free trade union movement forever, we all also pay homage to the fight led by the American and Canadian trade unions for universal peace, for controlled disarmament, for the ban of nuclear weapons of destruction.

As a world movement, we stand fully behind you in your condemnation of all totalitarian or dictatorial regimes, be they Communist, Fascist, military or colonial.

We admire wholeheartedly all you have done and are continuing to do in the struggle for civil rights, for the entire elimination of racial discrimination. We mark our gratitude and appreciation for your activities in the field of aid to the workers in developing countries, your generous devotion of resources to help the trade unions in Latin America, Asia and Africa in their fight against poverty and hunger and for economic and social progress.

The free trade union movement fellows with close attention the tireless day-by-day struggle, and the achievements of the American and Canadian trade unions, for the improvement of working conditions, for shorter hours, for higher wages — including the increase of the minimum wage — for longer holidays and decent housing, for better pension and medical care.

'66 Elections Vital to Continued Progress

By William F. Schnitzler

MOST AMERICANS AGREE that we are the most fortunate people in the world, living in an ever-improving society with a future as limitless as our vision.

But how many of us can enumerate the gains in recent years that have given us this great forward progress? How many of us can separate from the torrent of daily events those which measure our historic progress as a nation? Our usual problem is time, of not having the few moments it takes to gather together the great accomplishments of this era we live in.

Labor Day 1966 is a good time for perspective-taking, particularly because the labor movement in America takes pride in the fact that much of this forward progress came about with our help. What is it that makes America greater today than it was yesterday?

Never have we Americans been more prosperous and affluent;

Never have our state legislatures been more clearly representative of our citizens;

Never have we been more truly represented in Congress;

And never have our rights been more clearly articulated by the courts of the United States.

These are the broad over-all gains that we have made during this moment in our history. We can all be grateful for these improvements in our economic and political democracy.

BUT ALONG WITH these accomplishments there is the knowledge that much more is in our nation's future.

True as it is that these are the best of times, there is in the midst of this affluence much poverty.

There is in our Congress much that is obstructive;

There is about our state legislatures much that is undemocratic;

And there is in our courts much that fails to reflect the conscience of the Sixties.

No one is more aware of our achievements and our national shortcomings than is the American labor movement. We trade unionists are fully aware of how far we have to go.

Furthermore, the fact that we have made tremendous accomplishments does not mean that these gains are safe — that they are written in stone, to endure forever.

The plain fact is that the gains of recent years are in real danger. There is genuine fear that the forward progress of legislation will be halted and, even worse, many past accomplishments cancelled out.

Already there are mutterings about economy cuts and retrenchment in deference to the war in Viet Nam. It is being suggested that the federal budget be cut by $4 or $5 billion and the cuts be in many of those areas where new programs have been initiated.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT INSISTS that these new programs that we helped initiate in this most affluent period of our nation's history cannot be shelved or dismantled because of the fears of a few who did not want the programs to begin at all.

We in the labor movement maintain that the nation's wars against poverty, against ignorance, against disease, blight, pollution and discrimination cannot become casualties of the Viet Nam war. We are a nation that is wealthy enough to carry on every one of these commitments without any particular strain on our economy or the needs of Americans.

The problem facing Americans now is to express our faith in the future by choosing as lawmakers men who have a similar faith.

The moment that this nation halts its forward progress and chooses to rest on its past accomplishments, then national senility has claimed us.

We are a young nation — one of the youngest in the history of nations — with the leadership of the free world thrust upon us because we have an economic and social greatness far beyond anything in the world today.

But leadership goes only to those who truly lead and who remain ahead. If we abdicate this leadership, we will soon find that the world's leaders may be those who represent all that we are fighting against in Viet Nam.

It would be a hollow victory indeed for us to triumph in Viet Nam in behalf of democracy only to find that we have forsaken our fellow man because we didn't want to meet the cost at home.

Labor Day 1966 is not far from Election Day 1966.

When that day comes, we can elect men who will protect our gains and go on to greater accomplishments or we can listen to the voices of frightened men who have lost faith in the greatness that is America.

The decision in this democracy is up to us.

Pres. Jodoin's Message:

Strengthened Labor Canada Union Goal

The Labor Day statement of Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress is excerpted herewith:

THE FACT THAT LABOR DAY is a holiday which is enjoyed by most Canadians need not detract from the fact that it marks recognition of the place of organized labor in modern society.

Nevertheless, particularly this year, Labor Day must be a time for trade unionists to consolidate their forces, strengthen their ranks and express their collective views in a loud and clear voice. This is an occasion on which many observers make profound statements about the recognition of unions and the established place of organized labor; and this is often followed by the suggestion, at least by inference, that unions should soft-pedal some of their activities.

We cannot accept this kind of suggestion. Every single advance that labor has won over the years, and there have been many, has been the outcome of struggle, often, bitter struggle. This has been true in both collective bargaining and the legislative field. But it would be highly dangerous to assume that because we have made progress, the gains we have won will automatically remain.

We have seen the courts used to try to prevent workers from openly expressing support for fellow-workers engaged in a struggle to break their way out of a sub-standard wage structure.

We hear renewed efforts to raise the old bogey of compulsory arbitration as a miracle cure for disputes.

WE SEE OTHERS attempting to break down the Canadian national bargaining pattern that has been established in a number of industries and which is the only practical method of meeting the needs. To replace this system with regional or district bargaining would deprive thousands of workers of the benefit of national standards and would do very great damage in regionalizing the country at a time when one of our greatest national needs is unity.

During the past few months many of our organizations have been successful in concluding contracts which have provided marked increases. These have been long overdue. The pattern of profits has been steadily rising and it is not surprising that Canadian workers are insisting on obtaining their share. This is a trend which is going to continue.

At the same time we must press toward our legislative targets. The long and tortuous struggle to win such a worthy objective as a health plan for all Canadians is evidence of the fact that this is a continuing struggle. The story of medicare can be applied in many other fields.

Nor must we allow our very proper concern with these domestic matters to detract from our concern about international affairs. There is evidence of a tightening of ranks among workers who are members of free and democratic trade unions.

We must use this strength internationally and within our own country to press for every measure that can contribute to world peace and to aiding those in developing countries. Great moral and financial strength must be given to the United Nations so that it can become a greater and more effective force for peace.

Thus, in keeping what we have gained and in moving on to greater things, we should dedicate this Labor Day to strengthening our movement, for there is no doubt it will be called on to make as great a contribution in the future as it has in the past.

Pres. Haggerty Says:

The Time Has Come to Attack Building Craft Job Seasonality

Following are excerpts from the Labor Day statement of Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

FOR MILLIONS OF CITIZENS, Labor Day marks the end of the vacation season and the termination of the comparatively leisurely pace of industry and commerce. Back to the schools go the young people and their teachers; back to offices and stores and factories go workers and customers.

But for the craftsmen in the building trades and, to a certain extent their employers, Labor Day constitutes an entirely different signal. It is a grim reminder that fast approaching are the harsh days of winter and, with them, the customary four-month "off-season" of less work or no work.

Hasn't the time now come for America's best business, government and labor minds to undertake a coordinated effort that could solve one of our nation's most irksome, damaging and unnecessary problems—the seasonality of construction employment?

One-fifth of total unemployment in the United States is seasonal. Unemployment in the construction industry alone accounts for half of this one-fifth.

Intermittent and interrupted work means high costs and wasted resources. Beyond these economic considerations, it means human insecurity and the tension which comes with uncertainty.

Reliable spot-check studies show that the average work year of a construction worker runs between 1,300 and 1,400 hours. If he worked 40 hours a week and were entitled to a two-week vacation, which is the pattern of most employed Americans, he would have a 2,000-hour work year or 700 hours more annually than he now has.

If some are inclined in rebuttal to say that the construction worker's "high" hourly pay makes up for his shorter year, may I point out that $4.20 is the average hourly rate for a building trades craftsman? Multiplied by 1,400 hours, this makes his pay $5,888 for the year—not a very large amount for the man who has to live and raise his family in any large city.

Obviously, the worker is not the only individual involved in the situation. The development of some method of meeting, or at least reducing, the problem of seasonality in the construction industry would aid the contractor and, indeed, the entire tax-paying population. Aside from the almost inestimable lift a steady income gives all segments of a community, there is real saving inherent in the fact that unemployment benefits in the construction industry approximate two-thirds of a billion dollars a year, of which only half is covered by taxes.

Weeks, perhaps months, of additional work each year are obtainable if there is a conscientious attempt to achieve them. And even a few weeks' slice out of the four-months "off-season" would tremendously reduce the problem.

Winter construction has come to be a well-accepted feature of the construction industry in Canada. A number of great engineering projects, including the St. Lawrence River power programs, have been carried out during severe winter periods.

The government of Canada is so convinced that seasonal unemployment can be drastically reduced that it has set up a winter homebuilding incentive plan which gives a $500 bonus to owner-builders or first purchasers of winter-built homes. More than 25,000 applications have been filed for these bonuses. This means jobs for 75,000 construction workers and 90,000 other individuals in associated industries.

IT WOULD SEEM from the experience of Canada and of certain Scandinavian countries that the root of the solution to the seasonality problem is the organization and scheduling of work. Bluntly speaking, this means better planning, especially by the public agencies responsible for construction. It means institution of modern management systems by contractors. And it means use of advances in technology.

Many construction men agree that additional costs of winter construction would be negligible if the job were closed in before the winter months arrive. In fact, there are cases where lower costs result because of the availability of labor, building materials and equipment, not to mention uninterrupted work and quality control.

A great deal of research already has been done to provide a greater knowledge of concrete, which is used in construction throughout the world. It has been demonstrated that if concrete is not allowed to freeze and is placed and cured at low temperatures above freezing it develops higher ultimate strength and greater durability than concrete placed at higher temperatures. Other materials may offer this same potential.

On this Labor Day of a year which finds men walking in space, television cameras sending back pictures from the moon, doctors and scientists daily coming up with miracle drugs and procedures, is it not asking very little to have established a plan that would keep trained craftsmen working in cold weather?

Organizing Highlight of Labor's Year

Medicare Act Tops Legislative Gains

By Harry Conn

LABOR DAY—the workingman's holiday—inevitably tells us that the summer season is drawing to a close.

Traditionally the change of seasons is the time for reflection, to take stock and to plan for the future.

Trade unionists spend their labor-won holiday in many ways. Perhaps they relax at home or visit friends and relatives or enjoy their last warm weather holiday.

If they are reflecting on the past year, as unionists—but foremost as citizens—the critical situation in the Far East stands out as the most significant and far-reaching development.

The leadership of the American labor movement has supported Pres. Johnson's position that only by halting aggression in Viet Nam do we have a chance for world peace. And peace is what most Americans want.

On the domestic front there have been decisive forward steps, the product of years of work on the part of trade unionists and others. These include:

Medicare—Thirty-one years after Pres. Roosevelt first proposed it, hospital and nursing care for our elderly citizens went into effect. It covers some 17 million oldsters. In addition, there is Title 19 under which some 35 million indigent, ill or crippled persons can receive medical aid.

Organizing—The labor movement is encountering more successes in organizing than at any time, perhaps, since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947. Not only are the established unions chalking up more representation election victories but significant stirrings are taking place among workers who heretofore have not been receptive to organization.

Membership Spurts

These include the working poor—farm workers, medical technicians and others who have been among the most exploited in our society. Professionals, too, are showing increased signs of militancy—teachers, social workers, for example. And government unions—federal, state and local—are rapidly building up their memberships, too.

A Decade of Merger—The AFL-CIO, at its convention last December, marked its 10th anniversary. Despite some differences that have always existed, the merger is solid.

The old craft and industrial differences which had split the labor movement in the 1930's have been blurred out of existence. Old loyalties remain but most union leaders are taking a broad view—a full trade union view.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed this in his opening address to the convention:

"Now, at last, I believe that we can fairly say that the merger, begun in form in 1955, has been largely accomplished in substance and spirit as well. That, in itself, is one of the most important products of the past 10 years."

The failure of the Senate to support repeal of Section 14(b) unquestionably has top priority on the list of labor's disappointments during the past year.

Next to defeat of Section 14(b) repeal, the labor movement was most disturbed by efforts to enforce a 3.2 percent ceiling in wage increases.

The 3.2 percent ceiling was first worked out by Pres. Kennedy's Council of Economic Advisers to combat a possible threat of inflation. If the same formula had been used in the last year the ceiling would have been lifted to 3.6 percent. However, the formula was discarded and the 3.2 percent remained policy.

Spokesmen from all sections of the labor movement, joined by many noted economists, protested this. They pointed out that there were no effective ceilings on prices and none whatsoever on executive salaries, dividends, interests, etc. It was argued that if the inflation threat was serious, there should be ceilings in all sectors. If it was not serious, applying ceilings to only one sector was grossly unfair.

Despite the slowing down of the growth rate of the economy through such measures as higher interest rates, there was overall prosperity in the country. Unemployment dropped to 4 percent.

Cost of Living Up

The cost of living caught many workers. Higher prices for such items as food and medical costs, particularly, hurt the working man.

Trade union leaders saw no compelling reason to use this, even if it were related to the war in Viet Nam, as an excuse for cutting back on social welfare programs.

In fact, the volatile situation within the country as a whole demanded a step-up in the war on poverty, in massive manpower retraining programs, and new action in the civil rights field.

The tempo of the civil rights movement was stepped up and despite differences within it, registration and voting drives given impetus by legislation were initiated among Negroes on a scale never before attempted.

Particularly in Southern states, the labor movement has aligned itself with the new Negro voters and vast changes are taking place.

The tie-in between labor and civil rights groups has resulted in more union organization in the South.

The labor movement, internally, is undergoing some face-lifting which could well be a prelude to major structural changes to meet the changing industrial complex of the country.

The old days of each union fighting its own war with an industrial giant appears to be a thing of the past. Coordinated bargaining is emerging as an accepted pattern. Nowhere is this better illustrated than in the action of the eight unions uniting their efforts in bargaining with General Electric and Westinghouse.

Changes were also evident in the election of eight new vice presidents at the AFL-CIO convention. William L. Kircher was named director of organization of the AFL-CIO, replacing Jack Livingston who retired. Kircher immediately moved to assist the dramatic strike of grape workers in Delano, Calif.

Contract Gains Won

Gains took place all up and down on the bargaining front although it took strikes at the New York Times, in the New York subway system, Boeing Aircraft and five major airlines to accomplish it.

Possibly the most dramatic final clean-up of a strike was the 11-year dispute between the Kohler Co. and the Auto Workers. When the U.S. Supreme Court turned down Kohler's appeal the union had finally won the long struggle.

Strikes which continued into their fourth year are against the Florida East Coast Railway and the Kingsport Press.

November Election Holds Key To Achievement of Union Goals

By Alexander Uhl

ASK YOURSELF what the American labor movement can expect after this Labor Day and the answer invariably hinges on what happens on Election Day—Nov. 8.

The presidential election of 1964 saw a dramatic battle between Lyndon B. Johnson and Barry Goldwater—the one a representative of Democratic liberalism, the other a hard-core representative of right-wing Republican conservatism that had rejected everything American liberals and organized labor have stood for during the past 30 years.

Goldwater was crushed in one of the most overwhelming repudiations of the political Stone Age ever seen in the United States. He pulled down with him scores of other Republicans—some of them as reactionary as himself, others belonging to the Republican moderate wing. The upshot was a powerful Democratic sweep with liberals dominating the Senate and House.

Out of that sweep came social and economic history. The 89th Congress enacted a whole host of liberal bills that already have left their mark on the nation's life—medicare, launching of the "war on poverty," better Social Security benefits, civil rights legislation, creation of a new Cabinet post dedicated to improving the nation's housing. . . .

The question now is whether these great advances are to be implemented or whether they will be emasculated. As the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education has put it:

"1966—Beginning or End?"

Liberals in Danger

The 89th Congress saw the election of more than 50 young, liberal freshmen, mostly Democrats, whose votes largely were responsible for the solid record of achievement that has marked the past two years. They will run on that record.

If they are defeated "it will be two years and more before Congress can be convinced that it pays to vote for the workingman's family and for the future of America," COPE has predicted.

By every rule of political logic, the Goldwater extremists ought to have faded from the political scene after their 1964 defeat. Instead, they have stunned moderate Republicans and Democrats alike with the strength they have shown within the GOP during the summer primaries.

Tied in closely with the political struggle is the question of the nation's economic growth with its vital impact on jobs.

For the past six years, the nation has enjoyed a period of immense expansion. One result has been a sharp cut in unemployment. It was more than 6 percent when the Kennedy Administration took over in 1961. It is now around the 4 percent mark.

Yet there is much uneasiness—particularly among labor economists—as to the state of the economy and the direction it will be going in the year ahead. While national growth has reached unprecedented heights, there is still far from full employment—the 2 or 2.5 percent that labor economists accept as the best that can be expected.

Worse still, unemployment among minority groups—notably Negroes—is still at twice the rate that exists for the rest of the population.

Only continued growth of the economy can be expected to provide jobs for the almost 4 million workers who need them.

By mid-year, there were ominous signs that the economy was beginning to slacken. Housing starts were down. Consumer purchases were dropping. Worst of all was a battle over interest rates reminescent of the days of the Eisenhower Administration's "tight money" policies which produced three recessions in eight years. As the summer wore on, interest rates were going up all along the line, reaching the highest point in recent history.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed alarm at the spiral of interest rates and demanded that legislation be enacted to bring them back into line.

One of the still unanswered questions as Labor Day approached was what the Johnson Administration would do to meet the problem.

For organized labor itself, the future held high hopes.

Organizing Picks Up

Organization of the unorganized, which for many years has been in the doldrums, was beginning to pick up, notably in the South, so long the stronghold of anti-unionism.

The year 1967 will see some major contract negotiations, notably by the Auto Workers, whose 1964 contracts will expire. The UAW convention of 1966 made it clear that an annual salary to replace the present hourly wage system for blue collar workers will be a top goal.

Other major AFL-CIO union contract negotiations during the year will involve the Intl. Ladies' Garment Workers, Communications Workers, Rubber Workers and the Packinghouse Workers.

Labor Day Message:

Right to Strike 'Small Price' For Prosperity and Freedom

lapse like that of the Great Depression would be inevitable," he said.

"Without a strong labor movement, much of the social progress of the last generation would not have been made.

"It is as simple as that.

"It seems to me that the right to strike—a right that is so seldom exercised that it consumes far less time than coffee-breaks—is a small price to pay for a prosperous, progressive and above all a free society."

Labor's primary function is to improve the lot of its members, Meany said, but the AFL-CIO long ago recognized that their best interests can be served "only to the extent that the best interests of all the American people are served."

The AFL-CIO wants a better society and is "committed to the endless pursuit of perfection," he added. Those who disagree—and "they have every right to disagree"—should bring their disagreements to "the free marketplace of ideas, where the American people will make a decision," he urged.

"For nearly 200 years trade unions have contributed to this marketplace of ideas," Meany said. "We believe our contributions have been greater as our government has grown stronger. And we believe that the life of every American, and the hopes of every child, are brighter as a result.

"They should grow brighter with every year. That is our goal."

The social and legislative gains of the past few years are in "real danger," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler warned in his Labor Day message, adding that there is "genuine fear" not only that progress will be halted but many past accomplishments will be "cancelled out."

He pointed to "mutterings" about economies and retrenchments in some of the new programs because of the Viet Nam war, and added:

Fears Decried

"The labor movement insists that these new programs that we helped initiate in this most affluent period of our nation's history cannot be shelved or dismantled because of the fears of a few who did not want the program to being at all.

"We in the labor movement maintain that the nation's wars against poverty, against ignorance, against disease, blight, pollution and discrimination cannot become casualties of the Viet Nam war. We are a nation that is wealthy enough to carry on every one of these commitments without any particular strain on our economy or the needs of Americans."

Labor Day 1966 is not far from Election Day 1966, Schnitzler noted, calling on the country to express its faith in the future "by choosing as lawmakers men who have a similar faith." The moment that the country halts forward progress and decides to rest on its past deeds, he declared, "national senility has claimed us."

"We can elect men who will protect our gains and go on to greater accomplishments," he said, "or we can listen to the voices of frightened men who have lost faith in the greatness that is America.

"The decision in this democracy is up to us."

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey's Labor Day statement hailed the trade union movement's victories in "great battles" for all the people.

Just as organized labor won over the sweatshops of the past, he said, "so shall it succeed against substandard conditions which have no place in modern America."

"Bright, constructive goals are ahead," he said. "A truly Great Society is being built under the leadership of Pres. Johnson. I am proud to work with him and to work shoulder-to-shoulder with labor and with all right-thinking Americans in meeting the needs before our nation."

Humphrey paid tribute to the advances won through "the dynamic force of collective bargaining," and added that the "good fight" must be continued.

"We seek a good life for everyone," he declared. "We seek an America in which all our citizens can live in dignity, can learn, can earn, can work at their highest potential.

"A just paycheck with strong purchasing power, a comfortable home or apartment good enough to raise children in, high quality schools, good health care, opportunity for sports and other recreation, clean air to breathe and water to drink and swim in, a wholesome environment—these are but a few of our many objectives."

'Holiday from Discontent'

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz called Labor Day a holiday from "the discontent that comes from having raised our sights and our standards as a nation."

Racial discrimination and disadvantage "become intolerable when we have finally found the courage of our convictions," he said, and poverty "finds its voice of protest when we finally get around to recognizing it as unnecessary and wrong."

"A slum become more insufferable in a country which has announced its purpose is to rebuild its cities," he said, "and a ghetto worse in a time when a nation's credo is that men are not only created equal but have a right to live equal. . . .

"We have chosen not to let sleeping dogs of inequality lie any longer."

Because labor has always been "an instrument of change, a force for constructive dissatisfaction with things as they are," Wirtz declared, this year's holiday is a time for reaffirming labor's central purpose—"to raise the common standard of human equity and human dignity."

"Labor's eternal discontent will be shaped to serve that purpose constructively at a time now ripe with new promise," he concluded.

Sec. of Defense Robert S. McNamara said Labor Day gives the Defense Dept. an opportunity "to acclaim again the contribution of the American worker to our nation's defense."

"His skill and dedication provide our armed forces with military equipment and weapons of unsurpassed quality so essential to the security of our country and the rest of the free world," he said.

"Labor is a vital partner on the national defense team."

"Fondest greetings" were sent the working men and women of North America by Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse of the Intl. Labor Organization.

"The common interests of the North American labor movement and the ILO must continue to be directed towards the achievement of the welfare of working people everywhere under conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and of equal opportunity," he said.

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress urged organized workers to dedicate Labor Day to strengthening the trade union movement, "for there is no doubt it will be called on to make as great a contribution in the future as in the past."

He rejected the suggestion that unions soft-pedal some of their "more vigorous" activities, and said the holiday "must be a time for trade unionists to consolidate their forces, strengthen their ranks and express their collective views in a loud and clear voice."

Sees Labor Lulled

"We have been going through a period in which there has been too much tendency to lull the labor movement into an atmosphere of satisfaction," Jodoin said. "The kind of attacks to which our movement is subjected often are far more subtle than they used to be; but they are there and we must be prepared to meet them."

"The pattern of profits has been steadily rising and it is not surprising that Canadian workers are insisting on obtaining their share," he added. "This is a trend which is going to continue."

Greetings to the U.S. and Canadian labor movements also were extended by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and by its Western Hemisphere arm, the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers.

Meany Reasserts Stand On Emergency Controls

The AFL-CIO will cooperate with emergency controls of prices, profits, dividends and wages if Pres. Johnson decides he needs them, Pres. George Meany told a nationwide television and radio audience.

Labor took the position at the beginning that a curb on wage increases expressed in a specific figure "could not work in this economy of ours" and "that position has been pretty much vindicated by the unanimous vote of the President's Labor Management Advisory Committee," he said.

The committee in effect said that "the specific figure was impossible to apply right across the board" to all industry, Meany declared on the NBC program, Meet the Press.

"There are quite a few of our unions that would like very much to get the 3.2 percent guidelines increase and are unable to get it at the bargaining table," he said. "The figure of 3.2 percent didn't guarantee anybody 3.2 percent; it was a figure just based on productivity increases and sort of arbitrarily imposed on the system."

"We favor some kind of a system that will bring us wage and price stability. We have said many times that if the President feels that the situation warranted it and that we are in an emergency situation, we would take the same position that we took in World War II and in the time of the Korean war. We will cooperate 100 percent."

Meany under questioning made it clear he was not urging the imposition of economic controls, saying the decision "would be up to the President and his economic advisers." During discussion of the economic policy resolution the AFL-CIO Executive Council had adopted at its meeting in Chicago the previous week, he denied the statement was an "indictment" of the Johnson Administration and said the Administration had been trying to hold down prices and wages, although it hasn't been successful.

The trouble, he said, lies with corporate profits, up 67 percent after taxes over the last five years, and dividends, up 43 percent, while take home pay is up only 21 percent.

"This is why the AFL-CIO feels the first thing that has to be done is to restore the balance between wages, prices and profits," he declared.

"It is a little bit ridiculous to say that every wage increase must bring a price increase. It is quite obvious that in some cases there could be a wage increase and at the same time a reduction in prices."

Meany was questioned by Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post; John Grimes, Wall Street Journal; Richard Harkness, NBC News, and Lawrence E. Spivak, permanent panel member. Neil Boggs of NBC News was the moderator.

THE REAL PROBLEM in the American economy is to get profits down to a reasonable figure and to do "something legislatively" about the interest rate, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told nationwide television and radio audiences on the NBC program, Meet the Press. The panel that questioned him was composed of (left to right) Richard Harkness, NBC News; John Grimes, Wall Street Journal; Hobart Rowen, Washington Post, and Lawrence E. Spivak, permanent member. The moderator was Neil Boggs of NBC News, seated beside Meany.

'Superior Strength' Key to Containment

America and its free world allies must continue their policy of containment of Communist subversion and aggression while at the same time maintaining their "superior strength" and increasing their devotion to social justice and human freedom, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 48th annual convention of the American Legion.

In calling for containment and "whole-hearted" support of Pres. Johnson's Southeast Asia policy, Meany firmly rejected the alternatives of isolationism, appeasement or preventive war.

He said this nation should continue the containment policy of Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson in the hope that history will lead to "developments that could insure genuine co-existence and harmony" among the world's people.

"When I speak of co-existence," Meany told the Legion, "I speak of real co-existence and not of the phony co-existence peddled by the Kremlin" whose "meaningless and hypocritical" nature, he said, was exemplified by demonstrations against the American embassy in Moscow organized "by the very same Soviet government which we recognize and which seeks our economic assistance."

Foreign Policy Backed

He noted labor's basic agreement with American foreign policy through the last four national administrations in recognition of the fact that "the gravity and permanence of the present world crisis are rooted in the unchanged, fundamental aim of the Communist imperial powers"—to dominate the world and reshape it on the totalitarian pattern.

U.S. elements he called "more noisy than numerous" would have the world believe that the Viet Nam conflict is Johnson's war, a reactionary war for gain, Meany declared, adding "I know of no more dangerous package of outright falsehoods" prefabricated "in many instances" in Moscow and Peiping.

All the world knows, he said, that this country "does not seek an inch of territory, a dollar of commercial advantage or even the smallest military base" in Viet Nam nor are we seeking to overthrow the Ho Chi Minh dictatorship because "this is a job for the Vietnamese people themselves."

An effective containment policy requires the maintenance of superior strength—militarily, politically, economically, scientifically, and also "demands the greatest unity, determination and total strength," Meany continued.

Johnson deserves the "wholehearted support of the American people—and freedom-loving people everywhere—for his policy of determined resistance to Communist aggression while striving tirelessly for a negotiated peace" and helping the people of Viet Nam rebuild their war-torn country, the federation president said.

Even under the "vicious Viet Cong terror" against civilians, progress is being made in building a democratic government, Meany said, and the forthcoming elections could "well be the first big step" toward a responsible, representative, stable civilian government, he said.

"No such government could ever be possible in Communist North Viet Nam because all Communists fear free elections," Meany declared. He added:

"Humanity urgently needs genuine efforts for peace in Viet Nam and throughout the world. Mankind is sick of the continuing threat of aggression and danger of war."

Any sincere move for peace by Moscow, Peiping or Hanoi "would be welcomed by American labor" and the nation, but "every sinister maneuver by the Communist regimes should be rebuffed and rejected," Meany emphasized. He declared:

"Mankind, yearning for peace and freedom, must not be sold down the river—neither down the Elbe, the Yangtse nor the Saigon river. Mankind must be led to peace and freedom. Let us help our government, our country, provide this leadership."

The continued cooperation of the AFL-CIO and the Legion, called by Meany the two largest voluntary organizations in the country, can contribute "decisively" to the building of a "truly stronger and ever better" land, he said.

AMERICAN LABOR and the American Legion should continue active cooperation in the building of a "truly stronger and ever better America," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells the 48th national Legion convention in Washington.

Institute Class Urged To Spur Latin Unions

The development of strong trade unions in Latin America is primarily the job of the labor movement itself, Sec. Gen. Jose A. Mora of the Organization of American States (OAS) told the 14th graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"The principal responsibility must always be yours and that of the organizations which the workers themselves have created to defend their interests and to render more effective their action at the national and international levels," he said.

The class was the second to be graduated from the AIFLD training center at Front Royal, Va., and was made up of 14 union leaders from 10 Latin American countries and five AIFLD staff members. It raised to 455 the number of students who have completed three months of intensive training at Front Royal or, earlier, in Washington.

Mora voiced the OAS's consciousness of its responsibility in the area of "strengthening of the trade union movement in the Americas and of the bonds of solidarity between our countries," declaring that "it is necessary to assure the triumph of justice . . . for the benefit of all."

Changing Continent

Lincoln Gordon, assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs, told the graduates they were returning to a continent in a state of transition from a stable society with little concern for social justice to a dynamic society "searching for new and more effective ways of solving its social, economic and political problems."

It is the duty of organized labor in Latin America, he said, "to participate actively in the raising of productivity, to encourage vigorous and healthy management, and to become responsible and active participants in the whole process of economic and social development."

"For unless this is done," he added, "wages can be eaten away by inflation, and the social fabric torn apart by vain efforts to redivide a national product which is shrinking instead of growing."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stressed the AIFLD's ties with the Alliance for Progress. Efforts to raise living standards will fail, he said, unless "the people on the lowest rung of the economic ladder can be moved up."

"When you go home," he said, "don't go back home to serve the AFL-CIO; don't go back to serve any company; don't go back to serve the United States. Go back to serve the working people of your own countries and by virtue of helping to develop strong, democratic unions, help all the people of your countries."

Meany also read a letter of greetings and congratulations to the graduates from Pres. Johnson.

Salvador Ramos Alvarado of Honduras, speaking for the graduates at the commencement exercises, which were held in AFL-CIO headquarters, declared the institute "will reap results today and tomorrow in giving the Latin American labor movement visible and effective tools to be used in the consolidation of free and democratic unionism."

At a following luncheon the speaker was William Barlow, president of the Council for Latin America, a business organization representing the bulk of U.S. investment in Latin America. He urged labor to participate in the expansion of production there.

"Unless the gross national product can be doubled and then quadrupled," he said, "there's very little hope for either labor or business. . . . The pie just isn't there yet. If you took the whole pie and divided it among the poor, they'd still be poor. What we need is a bigger pie."

On behalf of the class Vicente N. Sosa Lopez presented a trophy to Meany and the AFL-CIO which was accepted by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks. Mario Castillo Parada presented AIFLD Administrator William C. Doherty, Jr., with a portfolio containing outlines the students developed at the institute and which they will use in labor education classes at home. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne presided at the commencement exercises.

Meany Joins Board Of Churchill Fund

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has been appointed to the executive committee of the Winston Churchill Memorial Fund, founded to help perpetuate the ideals for which the British wartime leader spoke and fought.

The appointment was announced by Air Force Gen. Lauris Norstad (Ret.), chairman of the fund, which is sponsored by the English-Speaking Union and the United States Churchill Foundation.

The fund supports the Winston Churchill Traveling Fellowships and the Churchill College Scholarships and Overseas Fellowships. The former enable Americans in all walks of life to work, study and live with people in British Commonwealth nations, thus helping to create a closer community of interest and understanding; the latter enable American science and engineering graduate students to do advanced work at Churchill College, Cambridge University.

Labor, Rights Ties Praised As Effective

Plainfield, Vt.—An alliance between civil rights groups and trade unions to lift Negroes and poor whites out of the cycle of poverty and ghetto life is the only effective answer, Bayard Rustin told a labor institute at Goddard College here.

It is the labor movement "which has done the most and is doing the most and will continue to do the most to lift the Negro out of his condition," Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, declared.

The call for an alliance that would include church, student and intellectual groups, was Rustin's answer to the "black power" calls of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE).

Rustin commented that CORE "is all but destroyed" and that "nothing creative can come out of SNCC" because, he said, both groups have lost contact with the Negro population.

Stairs to Success

The only way to start Negroes on the path to first-class citizenship, he said, is to build "stairs" to better jobs, better housing and better education. This can only be accomplished, he asserted, by a broad coalition of trade union and civil rights groups.

The "black power" cry, he asserted, is "nothing but an emotional reaction to 300 years" of segregation, discrimination and rejection. It contains no answers to any of the pressing social problems.

Rustin recalled that trade unions were behind the successful bus boycotts Dr. Martin Luther King organized in 1955 and that unions have led the drive for a higher minimum wage and civil rights legislation.

The institute was sponsored by Goddard College and the League for Industrial Democracy. Participating in the various sessions besides Rustin were Don Slaiman, director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Nathaniel Goldfinger, AFL-CIO research director, representatives of unions and the LID.

CLC Editor Takes Political Post

Ottawa, Ont.—Clifford A. Scotton, editor of the Canadian Labor Congress magazine Canadian Labor and the CLC's director of provincial federations and labor councils, has been named federal secretary of the New Democratic Party.

Scotton, who also has been secretary-treasurer of the CLC Union Label Dept., has been active in the NDP and its predecessor, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. Before coming to Canada from his native England, he was also active in the British Labor Party.

Before joining the CLC staff in 1959 as assistant public relations director, he was Canadian press representative for the Machinists. He has been a member of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

LBJ Acts to Cool Off Investment Boom

Calls For Tax Credit Suspension

Pres. Johnson called on Congress to put the brakes on heavy business investment by suspending for 16 months special tax credits on new machinery and equipment and depreciation benefits on business and commercial construction.

The capital goods boom—building of new plants and machinery—has been singled out by the AFL-CIO and leading economists as the key factor in "heating up" the economy and setting off an inflationary trend.

The AFL-CIO called for suspension of the 7 percent investment tax credit in February and has in statements by Pres. George Meany, Executive Council resolutions and testimony before Congress stressed the need for action to keep the economy in balance. The AFL-CIO has been generally opposed to fast write-off depreciation laws.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany welcomed the President's action to suspend the investment tax credit and the depreciation formula terming it a wise move to eliminate the "super-heat" from the economy.

Johnson's call on the Federal Reserve Board to roll back interest rates "is long overdue," Meany commented. The 33⅓ percent rise in the cost of money since last December is "the fault" and "lies directly at the door of the FRB," he said.

The AFL-CIO would reserve judgment on federal spending "and examine each of these on its individual merits," Meany added. The federation is convinced, he said, that the country can afford both to defend freedom in Viet Nam and "achieve a better standard of living for millions of deprived Americans."

The President's action came in a special message to Congress which in addition to the two specific requests on tax credits and depreciation said the Administration is reviewing government spending and studying the possibility of withholding federal securities from the tight money market, and will ask the Federal

Profits Boom Held Peril To Economy

By Gervase N. Love

A six-point program for getting the economy back on a sound course and stemming the rise in the cost of living was offered by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a Labor Day address over the Columbia Broadcasting System's radio network.

Meany declared the whole economy is in danger "because profits and interest rates have risen enormously while wages have barely kept pace with the cost of living."

"An expanding economy—an economy where productive capacity is soaring, where man-hour output is breaking records—demands a comparable growth in the real buying power of

House Defeats GOP Bid To Delay Wage Bill Date

ENTERING THE GROUNDS of the state capitol at Austin, Tex., to press a demand for a $1.25 minimum wage law are striking farm workers from the Rio Grande Valley who had marched 400 miles across the state to dramatize their plight—and some 20,000 other Texans, many of them union members, who had joined them three miles from their goal.

Jobless Rate For Negroes Moving Up

Unemployment among Negroes, especially teenagers, and unskilled workers has been worsening for the past four months despite a generally booming job situation, the Labor Dept. reported.

Although the jobless rate remained unchanged at 3.9 percent in August, unemployment among Negro workers continued to climb from the 7.0 percent rate in April 1966 to 8.2 percent last month.

Among unskilled workers the rate has moved from 6.9 percent in April to 8.0 percent in August.

And although one million more jobs were held down this summer by 16 to 19 year olds, the department reported that the sharp improvement was concentrated among white youth. The white youngsters had an unemployment rate of 12 percent compared to 27 percent for Negroes in the same age bracket.

This counter-trend among the Negroes and unskilled took place as total employment in the nation reached 76,369,000, including agricultural workers, and non-farm employment climbed to 64.6 million, up 3.25 million over a year ago. Manufacturing employment among production workers climbed also to 14.4 million.

The Labor Dept. reported that the job situation for workers with good professional or manual skills and with good training and experience continues "very strong." In August the unemployment rate was only 2.1 percent for white

20,000 Texans Join Farm Worker March

Austin, Tex.—Twenty thousand Texans marched to the State Capitol here Labor Day to demand a $1.25 state minimum wage law and to show their sympathy for a band of farm workers who had walked 400 miles from the Rio Grande Valley to dramatize their low wages and their strike against two corporation farms.

They also wanted to show the state's conservative Democratic organization that many Texans were ready for massive socio-economic changes.

At a barbecue that followed Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO, which collected more than $16,000 from unions to sustain the marchers and the farm strike and which arranged the Labor Day march and rally, said, "This is Texas labor's greatest day."

Only five days before, Gov. John Connally, accompanied by State Atty. Gen. Waggoner Carr, who is a candidate for U.S. Senate, and state Speaker of the House Ben Barnes, had met the farm workers' march 50 miles from their destination urging them not to go on.

"There might be trouble," Connally warned.

There was none, as the biggest protest march in modern Texas history moved the last three miles to the State Capitol. Six blocks from the Capitol grounds, Texas Democratic Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough, a member of the Senate Labor Committee, joined the march.

From the steps of the Capitol, Yarborough told the workers, who had come from all over Texas, "a hundred years ago we ended physical slavery. We are here today to end . . . economic slavery.

"Texas has more people living at the poverty level than any other state.

"We are here today to lift Texans out of poverty."

Speaker after speaker said that the rally was just the start of a movement to change things.

Measure Cleared for Senate Vote

By David L. Perlman

The House beat back a last-ditch Republican attempt to delay a $1.60 minimum wage and approved a House-Senate conference report extending coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act to 8 million additional workers.

Final Senate approval is expected within a few days, to clear the labor-sought legislation for the President's signature.

The key vote in the House was the 183-163 rejection of a motion by Rep. William H. Ayres (R-O.) to send the bill back to conference. Ayres wanted to instruct the House conferees to insist on an additional year stretchout of the two-step minimum wage increase for nearly 30 million workers now covered by the $1.25 pay floor.

Ayres had won a similar battle last May, when the House accepted his amendment to put off the $1.60 date from Feb. 1, 1968—as contained in the House Labor Committee bill—to Feb. 1, 1969. His amendment then carried on a 205-193 roll call.

The AFL-CIO led the fight to restore the earlier date and the Senate voted 42-40 for the 1968 date. Democrats on the House conference committee—over Ayres' objection—accepted the Senate version. In fact the bill came out of conference in better shape—from labor's standpoint—than either the House or Senate versions. It included the broader coverage contained in the House bill, coupled

CWA Wins Pay Hike For 23,000 Installers

Wage increases ranging from 13 to 20 cents an hour and other contract improvements were agreed to by the Communications Workers and the Bell telephone system's Western Electric Co. in a settlement reached just in time to head off a scheduled walkout of 23,000 equipment installers.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne told a press conference the three-year agreement provides a pattern that can be applied by union and management negotiators to contracts covering most of the 400,000 workers in CWA jurisdiction at Bell Telephone locations.

He put the value of the wage-benefit improvements at 7 percent for 18 months, or 6 percent "figured on a yearly basis." The contract may be reopened for money items 18 months from now, after which CWA will have the right to vote a strike.

The pact, subject to membership ratification in a mail referendum, is non-inflationary, Beirne asserted. It does not violate the guideline concept of the Johnson Administra-

Rail Strikers Return Under Canadian Act

Toronto, Can. — Canada's railways are getting back to normal service after emergency government legislation ended a week-long strike of 122,000 rail workers that had stopped all the trains and the telegraph system.

Despite being legislated back to work, the 16 non-operating railway unions and one operating trade scored a major triumph by forcing the government of Prime Minister Lester Pearson to grant an 18 percent interim raise. The government had earlier tried to get through a back-to-work order with an increase of only 8 percent.

The strikers also won government appointment of Canada's outstanding mediator, Montreal attorney H. Carl Goldenberg, to try to produce a full settlement before Nov. 15. If there is no agreement by then, the government's return-to-work law calls for compulsory arbitration.
